About 3,500 troops with the Alaska-based 172nd Stryker Brigade were nearing the end of their 12-month combat tour in July when they were informed that they'd have to stay in Iraq for as long as four more months. The troops were moved from a base near Mosul in northern Iraq to Baghdad to help rein in sectarian violence.

This marks the third time that U.S. forces have been notified that they'd have to stay in Iraq beyond their original return date. The first time occurred in December 2004, when more than 12,000 soldiers and Marines were told that they would have stay for two additional months in order to bolster security for Iraq's first round of parliamentary elections. The second was the Stryker Brigade extension in July.

Last month, the Marine Corps announced that it would recall as many 2,500 inactive reservists back to service, the first time the Marines have recalled inactive reservists to duty since the 1991 Gulf War.

DOJ_NMG_0069343

Army policy has been to give units that have served in Iraq a break of at least 12 months at their home base so that soldiers can rest, reunite with their families and have sufficient time to train before they deploy again. The Army at times has violated the policy.

Dan Goure, a defense analyst with the Lexington Institute, a public policy research group in Arlington, Va., said the rotation policy isn't working as planned.

"A month or two here or there isn't that bad, but if you're going to hold them back so that somebody else can get their rest, then the system isn't working," he said.

U.S. Extends Iraq Tour For Another Army Unit (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Order Reinforces Doubts About Troop Cuts

The Pentagon yesterday delayed for six weeks the return home of about 4,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq's volatile Anbar province -- the second extension of U.S. forces in Iraq in two months -- as the insurgency and rising sectarian violence exert heavier demands on a stretched American ground force.

A brigade of the Army's 1st Armored Division, operating in Anbar's contested capital of Ramadi, has been ordered to stay on for 46 more days. Another brigade -- from the 1st Cavalry Division based at Fort Hood, Tex. -- will depart a month early, in late October, for a year of combat duty in Iraq.

"There's no question but that any time there's a war, the forces of the countries involved are asked to do a great deal," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said when asked about the troop decisions at the Pentagon yesterday.

According to a Pentagon announcement, the shift is necessary to "maintain the current force structure in Iraq into the spring of next year." That confirms an assessment last week by Gen. John P. Abizaid, the senior U.S. commander in the Middle East, that no cuts in the more than 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq are likely before the spring of 2007.

It also demonstrates the increasingly tough trade-offs U.S. commanders face between the imperatives of war fighting and the need to retrain and recuperate the taxed Army and Marine Corps.

In this case, commanders had to choose between extending thousands of U.S. troops serving in one of Iraq's deadliest cities -- the 1st Armored Division brigade in Ramadi -- or requiring another combat-hardened unit that has already served two tours in Iraq, a brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, to return to the desert after less than a year at home. They opted for the former.

"The chief of staff of the Army refuses to compromise on the one-year dwell time," said an Army official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record. The chief of staff is Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, and "dwell time" refers to the amount of time troops have at home between deployments to retrain, repair equipment and reconnect with their families.

"If they didn't do this, the . . . dwell time for 3rd Infantry Division would be 11 months, so that's a no-go," the official said.

Still, the extension prolonged the hardship for the 1st Armored Division soldiers, based in Friedberg, Germany, and their families, who were notified yesterday, the official said. The Pentagon statement acknowledged the "continued contributions" of the soldiers in Ramadi and their families, saying the "extension reflects the continued commitment of the United States to the security of the Iraqi people."

In July, the Pentagon extended the Iraq tour of the 172nd Stryker Brigade, based at Fort Wainwright, Alaska, for about four months.

The Army set a goal in 2003 of allowing active-duty soldiers to spend two years at home for every year overseas. But that aim has proved elusive because of the limited number of active-duty combat brigades available to deploy -- currently 36 -- as well as the continued high troop levels in Iraq and Afghanistan. More than 20,000 U.S. troops are now serving in Afghanistan, according to Army figures.

Active-duty soldiers today can expect to spend no more than a year at home between deployments, said Lynn Davis, a senior Rand Corp. analyst and lead author of a 2005 report on Army deployments titled "Stretched Thin." The number of Army combat brigades in Iraq and Afghanistan would have to fall by about half -- to 10 -- to achieve the Army's goal of two years at home, she said. In contrast, soldiers in today's armored, mechanized and Stryker brigades, which are most in demand, can expect to be away from home for "a little over 45 percent of their career," she said.

US Forces In Iraq To Exceed 140,000 (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069344

US officials said on Monday that American troop levels in Iraq were likely to remain well above 140,000 for the next few months, although they would not confirm reports that the 3,500-strong First Armoured Division had been ordered to remain in Iraq beyond its official tour of duty.

Growing sectarian conflict between Iraqi militias in the last few months and the continuation of the mostly Sunni insurgency against US forces has complicated the Bush administration's goal of "standing down as the Iraqis stand up". The overall US troop presence in Iraq has risen from 127,000 in July to 142,000 this week.

Last week John Abizaid, the US commander in the region, said that US troop deployment in Iraq was likely to remain at these levels well into 2007 in order to wrest Baghdad and other provinces from the day-to-day control of sectarian death squads and insurgent groups.

In August, General Abizaid, the most senior Arab-American in uniform who has a reputation for being a straight talker, surprised many when he told the Senate armed services committee that Iraq could be heading towards civil war. This contradicted the Bush administration's view that the situation was gradually improving. As many as 20,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed in 2006 – although estimates vary drastically.

"The Bush administration has complicated its task in Iraq by talking up the rhetoric at home of 'standing down as they stand up'," said Tony Cordesmann, a senior analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "But in practice Mr Bush has responded to what the commanders are requesting on the ground, which is more troops and, to a lesser extent, more equipment."

However, the increase in deployment comes amid growing complaints from senior generals about the overstretch of US military units, some of which have served more than one tour of duty in Iraq and also in Afghanistan, where US troop levels have also risen this year from 15,800 to 20,000 owing to the resurgence of Taliban forces.

There are also concerns about pressure to send regular military and National Guard units back to Iraq within the one-year pause that is customary. In addition, the army and National Guard have both recently relaxed recruiting standards by raising the maximum age and improving the one-off cash payment as an incentive for new recruits.

Worries about the Bush administration's handling of the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq intensified at the weekend when the New York Times and Washington Post leaked contents of a classified US National Intelligence estimate from April that said America's invasion of Iraq in 2003 had exacerbated the threat from Islamist terrorist groups.

The report, which was submitted to Mr Bush in April, also said that the overall threat from Islamist terror groups had grown since the attacks of September 11 2001.

The disclosure comes just six weeks before critical mid-term elections, where Mr Bush's Republicans face the threat of losing control of the House of Representatives. The opposition Democrats have fielded a number of Iraq war veterans in order to bolster their credibility as patriotic critics of the war in Iraq.

Mr Bush has ignored continuing calls by retired US generals – most recently on Monday – to sack Donald Rumsfeld, secretary of defence, over his handling of the war in Iraq.

Army Extends Troops' Iraq Duty Yet Again (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

The Army is stretched so thin by the war in Iraq that it is again extending the combat tours of thousands of soldiers beyond the promised 12 months — the second such move since August.

Soldiers of the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division had been expecting to return to their home base in Germany in mid-January. Instead, they will stay an extra 46 days in Iraq, until late February, the Pentagon announced Monday. The soldiers are operating in western Anbar province, one of the most violent parts of Iraq.

The Pentagon also announced that the 4th Brigade, 1st Cavalry Division will deploy to Iraq 30 days earlier than scheduled, starting in late October. The announcement did not say why the speedup was deemed necessary, but three officials who spoke on condition of anonymity said it is part of a plan to beef up forces in Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi troops are struggling to contain insurgent and sectarian violence.

The Pentagon said troop rotations could be changed even further "based upon changes in the security situation." Sectarian killings in Baghdad and continuing insurgent violence elsewhere in Iraq have foiled Pentagon plans to begin a troop reduction this fall.

"The Army is coming to the end of its rope in Iraq," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a private research group. "It simply does not have enough active-duty military personnel to sustain the current level of effort."

Of the 142,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq, nearly 120,000 are Army soldiers.

The tour extension affects about 3,800 soldiers in the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0069345

Asked about the matter at a news conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld declined to confirm the extension but said that "from time to time there may be" units required to stay in Iraq longer than scheduled. He spoke before the Pentagon issued its written announcement.

Last month, the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade was ordered to extend its tour in Iraq by up to four months. Some members of that unit had already returned to the brigade's home base in Alaska when the decision was announced. About 300 soldier had to go back to Iraq, drawing public complaints from some families.

Rumsfeld also appeared to hint at other adjustments to the troop rotation plan.

"We're also bringing some other units in earlier, which is another way of dealing with that issue" of how to keep a sufficient number of troops in Iraq with a limited number of combat brigades available, Rumsfeld said.

The extension reflects a dilemma for Army leaders: either keep one group of soldiers in Iraq longer than promised, or replace them with another group that has not yet had its minimum 12 months at home between combat tours. Either choice risks upsetting some soldiers and their families. And the fact that the choice cannot be avoided is a sign that troop rotations in Iraq are squeezing the Army from several directions.

Some members of Congress are expressing concern that the military is over-stretched by the war. On Monday, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said the situation in Iraq is "disintegrating" into a civil war. "My instinct is once the (November) election is over there will be a lot more hard thinking about what to do about Iraq and a lot more candid observations about it."

The pinch is evident also in closed-door deliberations between the Army and administration officials over the size of the service's budget for 2008. The Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, took the highly unusual step in August of delaying submission of the Army's budget plan, arguing that the service requires either a much bigger budget than the administration has proposed or relief from some of its worldwide commitments.

The Los Angeles Times reported in its Monday editions that Schoomaker is seeking $138.8 billion for 2008, or nearly $25 billion more than the limit originally set by Rumsfeld. The Army's budget this year is $98 billion.

The 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division is being extended in Iraq because the unit that is scheduled to replace them — the 1st Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, from Fort Stewart, Ga. — needs more time to prepare. If it had deployed as originally scheduled, it would not have had the minimum 12 months at home between combat tours.

The 3rd Infantry has already served two tours in Iraq, including the initial invasion of the country in March 2003.

Last week, the top American commander in the region said the U.S. military is likely to maintain and may even increase its force of more than 140,000 troops in Iraq through next spring. Gen. John Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command, said he would consider adding troops or extending the Iraq deployments of other units if needed.

The Army has a stated goal of giving active-duty soldiers two years at home between overseas combat tours. However, the Army is unable to achieve that "dwell time," as it's called, because it does not have enough brigades to meet the demands of simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. It would not be a problem now if the situation in Iraq had improved enough to allow the Army to reduce its presence as originally planned.

Military Intensifies Troop Deployment (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday said the military will deploy some combat units to Iraq earlier than previously planned, to meet a commander's new need for more than 140,000 troops in country until at least next spring.

Mr. Rumsfeld made the comment to reporters at the Pentagon on the same day it was announced that another Army unit was staying in Iraq beyond its scheduled departure date.

Army Gen. John Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command, said last week he needs the increased troop level to deal with sectarian violence in the Baghdad area that could push the country into a civil war if not stopped. The U.S. troop level had been fairly constant at about 130,000 during the summer. Commanders had hoped to announce a big reduction in troop levels, perhaps to as low as 100,000, but those plans are now shelved.

Mr. Rumsfeld said the Pentagon is dealing with the new demand by delaying the departure of some units. He then added, "On the other hand, we're also bringing some other units in earlier, which is another way of dealing with that issue."

The defense chief did not identify the units that will deploy sooner than expected. Pentagon officials say a rotation schedule is likely to be announced in November.

The Washington Times reported yesterday that the Army was looking at accelerating the deployment of some units and adding others to the rotation mix to reach the 140,000-troop level.

"There's no question but that any time there's a war, the forces of the countries involved are asked to do a great deal," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

DOJ_NMG_0069346

The 1st Brigade of the 1st Armored Division was to return to its base in Germany in early January but now will stay several more months.

The Pentagon already revoked the departure of an Army Stryker armored-vehicle brigade and sent it to Baghdad to help quell the violence.

The service already is struggling to meet worldwide commitments and dealing with low-combat readiness among non-deployed units who lack adequate equipment at their home bases.

The Army is wearing out weapons systems so fast in Iraq's harsh environment that it needs more than $40 billion in the next three years to buy replacements.

2 Senior Commanders In Iraq Reassigned (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 26, 2006

Two of the Army's top commanders in Iraq have been selected for new assignments.

The second-in-command in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, will become a special assistant to the commander of Central Command with responsibility for developing the military capabilities of nations in the Middle East and Central Asia.

Chiarelli is due to be replaced in Iraq by Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno when Odierno becomes commander of Multi-National Corps-Iraq early next year. Chiarelli had previously commanded the 1st Cavalry Division in Iraq.

Also moving on from Iraq will be Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, the 4th Infantry Division commander, who has been chosen for promotion to the rank of lieutenant general and assignment as commander of 5th Corps, the Army's top organization in Europe. Thurman currently is commanding all forces in the Baghdad area.

The 4th Infantry is due to be replaced in Iraq by the 1st Cavalry Division in mid-November.

Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, who served a tumultuous year in Iraq as 5th Corps commander in 2003-04, relinquished command on Sept. 6 and is retiring soon, according to the U.S. Army Europe Web site. Sanchez had been a candidate to become the next commander of U.S. Southern Command but was passed over after the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal exploded into an international controversy. Sanchez has not been accused of any misconduct but has been criticized by some for not doing more to avoid mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners.

There has been no announcement about the next assignment for the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, but he has indicated in recent months that he may not stay much beyond the end of this year.

Also unclear is the future of Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander for U.S. troops throughout the Middle East.

U.S.: Sadr City Again A Militants' Haven (AP)

By Antonio Castaneda, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

U.S. soldiers trying to calm Baghdad say the sprawling Sadr City slum has once again become a haven for anti-American militants — and the source of most of the gunfire and mortars directed at them.

In the last two weeks, U.S. forces have suffered several casualties from dozens of shootings, mortar attacks and roadside bombings that American troops believe originated from Sadr City.

Yet the Americans have been restrained in their response, as U.S. and Iraqi leaders strive to avoid a third confrontation in two years with firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army — the biggest and most dangerous Shiite militia in Iraq.

Instead of venturing into Sadr City in strength, U.S. troops are concentrating instead on the mostly Shiite neighborhoods that surround the militia stronghold. All the while they are drawing fire from Sadr City.

As a result, some American soldiers believe the only way — in the end — to curb Shiite militias and halt the sectarian violence will be to confront the militia fighters in their sanctuary.

"I just want to see something done about Sadr City," said Staff Sgt. Brian Beem, 29, of Poughkeepsie, N.Y. "Send in the Iraqi army, the U.S. Army — send everyone in. ... They're going to need it. ... Something's going to have to be done about that place."

That won't be easy.

Al-Sadr and his followers managed to rebound from defeats suffered at the hands of the U.S. military during two previous uprisings in 2004 — and have now emerged as a major political force.

Al-Sadr's followers hold 30 of the 275 seats in the national parliament and five posts in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Cabinet and are a major pillar of the prime minister's political support.

In August, al-Maliki, a Shiite, publicly berated the Americans for a raid on Sadr City.

DOJ_NMG_0069347

With Americans facing political pressure to lay off al-Sadr, it appears unlikely the U.S. command will order a major operation against his base, home to an estimated 2.5 million people, without al-Maliki's approval.

"We notify the prime minister if we've got sensitive targets and we let the prime minister know," Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, the commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, told The Associated Press in a recent interview.

"We let him have a say, and we notify people. But if somebody is committing an act of violence, we're going to go deal with it," Thurman said.

In name, Sadr City is under the control of Iraqi forces, not the militia. When U.S. troops formally handed over the area to Iraqi soldiers in March, one Iraqi colonel promised, "We can handle the security inside Sadr City."

But in reality, al-Sadr and his Mahdi militiamen call the shots in Sadr City. Few U.S. troops saw Iraqi troops, most of whom are also Shiites, on the major avenues where they were repeatedly attacked.

All that is frustrating to American soldiers, who believe the militias have a virtual sanctuary in Sadr City.

The Mahdi Army "claims they control Sadr City, and all the attacks are coming from Sadr City. Then (either) the (Mahdi Army) is doing the attacking or allowing others to," said Capt. Chris L'Heureux, 30, of Woonsocket, R.I., a troop commander in the 4th Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment.

Over the past two weeks, L'Heureux's own soldiers have been regularly targeted by snipers and mortarmen operating from Sadr City.

The inability to fight back frustrates many.

"It's tough for a brigade like us that's been (winning) ... and here it's all touchy-feely and paws off," said 1st Lt. Bernard Gardner, 25, of Kinnear, Wyo.

Last week, al-Sadr delivered a speech urging his followers to take part in nonviolent resistance, possibly a gesture to divert attention away from Sadr City.

But U.S. troops on the ground say they — along with Iraqi troops — have been increasingly targeted by the Mahdi Army, which is growing more aggressive.

"We're seeing more instances, more indications that we have religious militias interfering with the Iraqi army and Iraqi police affairs," said Col. Greg Watt, the chief U.S. trainer for one of two Iraqi divisions in the city.

Some soldiers said they hope another fight could be avoided.

"I'll be honest with you. I hope for a political solution. Sadr can influence more through the mechanism of government than flexing his militia might," L'Heureux said.

But if the order comes to control Sadr City, "We are absolutely prepared to do it," he added. "There's no question about that."

Kurds, Sunni Arabs Clash In North -- A Small Echo Of Larger Dispute (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — Kurdish militiamen seized a police station in northern Iraq on Monday to prevent its transfer to a new Sunni Arab commander, igniting a daylong standoff that echoed the parliament's continuing unease over territory-sharing in the final administrative map of Iraq.

The clash in the town of Jalawla underscored the potential for violence as parliament prepared to study the contentious issue of creating autonomous regions in this multiethnic and heavily armed nation.

Though most of the biggest political disputes are likely to center on the oilfields in the south, in largely Shiite Muslim areas, and the northern city of Kirkuk, another oil-rich area claimed by the Kurds, the clash in Jalawla marked an early warning of what many fear could be a turbulent battle for the frontiers of a future Kurdish zone.

Authorities said the former Kurdish police commander in Jalawla, who was recently removed from his job by the Diyala provincial council, arrived at the station Sunday night accompanied by a force of Kurdish armed men and laid siege.

The Kurdish forces opened fire at the police station with heavy machine guns and rocket launchers, police sources said, destroying three cars and finally entering the building. The new commander and his men were reportedly locked in a room, but police had only sporadic communication with the station through the day and did not know whether any officers had been injured or killed.

Authorities in the nearby regional police headquarters had established a command post and were preparing a plan to retake the station, police sources said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Kurdish leaders say Jalawla, about 80 miles northeast of Baghdad, and about 20 miles from Iran, was primarily a Kurdish town years ago. Hundreds of Kurds were driven out during the 1980s by former President Saddam Hussein's Arabization campaign in northern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0069348

Since then, Kurds have been pushing to include such lands within the boundaries of an officially designated and largely autonomous Kurdistan. Most prominent has been Kirkuk, the scene of violence this month when six bombs exploded and killed 24 people. More than 80 others were injured.

The regional parliament of Kurdistan on Sunday forwarded a draft constitution to the government in Baghdad that includes Kirkuk and other disputed areas within Kurdishcontrolled territories. As presently organized, the northern Kurds have their own president, taxing powers and militia, and exercise primary authority over natural resources, including oil and water. Many Shiites would like similar powers in the south.

Like Kirkuk, Jalawla today is a mixed city, with Arabs and Turkmens living alongside Kurds. The local council has insisted that the town, on the southern edge of the Kurdish-dominated north, remain part of the Diyala province and outside an eventual Kurdistan.

As the dispute has mounted in recent months, Arab residents have complained of harsh treatment at the hands of Kurdish militia forces. Those complaints were followed by the Kurdish police chief's ouster Sunday, setting the stage for the clash over the installation of the Arab police commander.

The broader scope of the debate was underway in Baghdad, meanwhile, as the parliament began setting up a committee to review the constitution in preparation for proposed legislation that could clear the way for semi-autonomous regions not only in Kurdistan but elsewhere in Iraq.

Sunni Muslim Arabs, who are concentrated in the resource-poor central and western regions, have sought to block the creation of more federated regions. They fear it will cut them off from oil revenue and splinter the country.

An agreement over the weekend put off a political crisis by calling for the constitutional review and a delay in creating any such regions for at least 18 months after any new federalism law is enacted.

But parliament deputies immediately broke into arguments Monday morning over the timing of the constitutional review. Kurdish deputies at one point walked out in the face of accusations from one lawmaker that Kurds had driven Arabs out of the northern city of Mosul.

The parliament ultimately agreed to the proportional composition of the review committee and was set to name its members today. Parliament speaker Mahmoud Mashadani, a Sunni Arab, urged lawmakers not to lose sight of the significance of the compromise on an issue that had threatened Iraq's 4-month-old national unity government.

"I think the agreement is like a gift presented by parliament to the Iraqi people for Ramadan," he said, referring to the Muslim holy month of fasting that began over the weekend.

A Shiite-sponsored federalism bill is scheduled for debate this week, but under the weekend agreement can't be implemented if it passes until at least 2008. Sunnis are hoping the constitutional review will produce amendments forestalling the federalism process or at least limiting the powers of autonomy granted to federal regions.

Meanwhile, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani warned that Iraq was prepared to "make trouble" with its neighbors if nations such as Iran, Turkey and Syria did not "stop interfering in our internal affairs."

In an interview with NPR's "Morning Edition" to be aired today, Talabani, a Kurd, said Iraq was prepared to support opposition groups in neighboring countries as a recourse for what he said was meddling in Iraq. Iran and Turkey each have sizable Kurdish minorities that have been pushing for increased self-determination.

If foreign governments continue to promote violence in Iraq, he said, "the Iraqi people will respond in the same way — we'll support the opposition of other countries [and] try to make trouble for them as they are doing for us…. Iraq can help opposing forces of our neighboring countries."

In other developments Monday:

· Another police station came under fire in the town of Musayyib. More than 15 mortar shells were lobbed at the Jurf Sakhar police station in the latest of many attacks challenging the control of central authorities.

· In Baghdad, a small bomb exploded under a parked car near a well-known pizzeria, followed by a bigger explosion a few moments later when police came to investigate. Three policemen were injured.

· In the ongoing trial to determine the responsibility of Hussein and some of his lieutenants for a violent campaign against Kurdish guerrillas and civilians in the 1980s, the defense team again boycotted the proceedings. Hussein, represented by stand-in defense lawyers appointed by the court, eventually was ejected from the courtroom.

On Sunday evening, the former mayor of Fallouja was gunned down with his 18-year-old son as they were driving in the eastern part of the city, where U.S. forces have battled heavy insurgent activity since the beginning of the war. Najm Abdallah had served as head of the city council after the killing of his predecessor by unidentified armed men.

Al-Qaeda Figure Killed In Raid In Basra, British Military Says (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0069349

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Prison Escapee Was Believed by U.S. to Be a Top Bin Laden Aide

BAGHDAD, Sept. 25 -- British troops killed a man U.S. officials believed to be a top lieutenant to al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden during a pre-dawn raid on Monday in the southern city of Basra, a British military spokesman said.

Omar al-Farouq, an al-Qaeda leader in Southeast Asia who escaped from a prison in Afghanistan last summer, was killed during crossfire that began when he shot at about 200 British troops storming the home where he was hiding, according to the spokesman, Maj. Charlie Burbridge.

"He was a terrorist of considerable significance," Burbridge said.

Farouq's death was announced during another tumultuous day in the genocide trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein, culminating in his expulsion from the courtroom for the second time in as many sessions.

The proceedings began with Hussein and his six co-defendants, who are charged with attempting to annihilate the country's Kurdish minority, vigorously protesting the absence of their attorneys. Last week, the entire defense team boycotted the trial to protest the Iraqi government's dismissal of the chief judge for saying that Hussein was "not a dictator."

The eight new court-appointed defense attorneys appeared to struggle Monday during simple cross-examinations of witnesses. The new chief judge, Mohammed al-Uraibiy, frequently told them to rephrase their questions or simply dismissed their queries as "irrelevant." Ali Hassan al-Majeed, a co-defendant known as "Chemical Ali," complained that his attorney had a weak grasp of military terminology central to the case.

"I don't acknowledge this attorney!" another defendant, Sultan Hashim Ahhmad al-Jabburi al-Tai, shouted as his newly appointed attorney tried to speak. He jabbed his finger in the air. " I don't want to be associated with this lawyer!"

But the most heated clash came after the judge rebuked defendant Sabir Aba al-Aziz al-Duri for referring to al-Tai as a brigadier general.

"Don't mention his title," the judge said. "None of you have a title or rank now."

As Hussein prepared to interject his opinion, the judge instructed him to remain silent and respect the court.

"I'd respect the session if it was a respected court," Hussein retorted.

Then he held up a folded piece of yellow paper that he said was a request not to attend the trial as long as Uraibiy remained the presiding judge. "I don't want to sit inside this cage. It is a shame to be here. It is a dishonor to talk to you," Hussein said.

The judge angrily ordered Hussein to be removed from the courtroom and refused to accept his petition. "I am the one who decides to receive the request or not," he said.

"Take him out!" the judge decreed.

Violence continued to flare across Iraq on Monday. At least 13 people were killed in attacks throughout the country, police said.

The U.S. military also announced that a soldier attached to Task Force Lightning was killed by enemy fire near Mosul on Monday. No further details were released.

Special correspondent Saad Sarhan in Najaf, Iraq, contributed to this report.

Baghdad Isn't Birmingham (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

"Nobody can go back and reinvent the past," Condoleezza Rice told Katie Couric on "60 Minutes" Sunday night. But this nugget of truth came amid a flood of retrospective reinvention in which Rice equated the war in Iraq with the civil rights struggle of the 1960s -- and left me wondering whether I was hearing polished sophistry or a case of total denial.

That quote from the secretary of state came in response to a question about whether the administration would handle Iraq the same way if it had known then what it knows now -- that there were no weapons of mass destruction, among other inconvenient facts. Rice has acknowledged that mistakes were made in the conduct of the war, but she made clear Sunday that even now she would support the decision to invade.

The interview was prerecorded, so Couric didn't get to ask about the new National Intelligence Estimate -- representing the consensus view of the government's 16 spy agencies -- concluding that the Iraq war has poured fuel on the jihadist fire worldwide and that the threat from terrorism is rising, not ebbing. But we can assume that this obvious fact has not escaped Rice's attention, and I wouldn't expect one of the officials who ordered the invasion (she was national security adviser at the time) to confess that the whole thing was a tragic misadventure.

What I would expect from Rice, however, is a better understanding of the history of the civil rights movement and the lessons it taught, or should have taught, the nation and the world.

DOJ_NMG_0069350

Rice famously grew up in Birmingham at the height of the movement. I say famously because she has used her personal biography as a tool of diplomacy, drawing this parallel between the crusade to win freedom and opportunity for African Americans and the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Rice equates the racists who bombed Birmingham's 16th Street Baptist Church in 1963, killing four young girls -- including Denise McNair, a childhood playmate -- with modern-day suicide bombers who kill in the name of jihad. "Some people say, 'Well, they do it to prove a political point,' " she said. "Then why go after little girls? Or innocent people standing at a bus stop in Britain or in Madrid?"

That sounds good, but when you think about it, it doesn't mean much of anything. Yes, terrorism in every instance is abhorrent. But you don't fight terrorism, you fight terrorists, and not all terrorists are alike.

More to the point, I, too, grew up in the South during the last throes of Jim Crow segregation. I don't see how anyone could come out of that milieu without feeling that the violence waged back then by the Ku Klux Klan and other white racists was a very specific, highly personal form of terrorism.

Just a few hundred yards from my house, three black students were killed in a 1968 demonstration that had begun over a segregated bowling alley. I remember waking up one morning and seeing a dozen highway patrol cars parked across the street, the officers crouched with their rifles trained at a house two doors from mine. They were looking for the supposed "outside agitator" who was stirring up all the local colored folk, but fortunately he was long gone.

That's one essential difference that Rice ignores -- that during the civil rights era, the terrorism was of the kind we would now call "state-sponsored." It was of the powerful over the powerless, not the other way around.

In her interview with Couric, Rice went on to argue that critics of the administration's Middle East policies are like the racists who contended that black Americans were not ready to participate in democracy because they were "kind of childlike" and couldn't handle the vote. But that's a bizarre analogy. The last stand by white racists against integration and voting rights for African Americans wasn't about patronizing attitudes some whites might have held -- it was about power. It was about the knowledge that blacks were not just ready but also determined to exercise the right to vote.

She makes it sound as if those who disagree with the administration are standing in the schoolhouse door. But no one wants to deny Iraqis or anyone else the chance to practice democracy. The question is whether democracy should, or can, be imposed at the point of a gun.

If Rice really believes what she says, then why does she shun the democratically elected Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority? Are the Palestinians childlike and not ready for the vote?

Or is our Middle East policy such a mess that it has to be veiled in rewritten history?

Afghan Leader Slams Musharraf's Policies (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

The political divide between Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf became increasingly acerbic yesterday, with the Afghan leader accusing his counterpart of pursuing policies that foster terrorism.

The outburst came on the eve of a critical meeting in which the two men will join President Bush in the Oval Office to discuss ways to improve their cooperation in fighting a revitalized Taliban insurgency.

In a reference to Pakistan, Mr. Karzai said in an address at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars yesterday that there will be no peace in the region until nations stopped using religious extremism as a means of promoting policy.

"For all of us in the world to be safer, we must remove the need for groups, organizations or state entities -- and here I am beginning to be very careful in my remarks -- of reliance on religious radicalism as instruments of policy," he said.

"The increased attacks on Afghanistan and the cross-border activities; the loss of U.S., Canadian soldiers; the burning of mosques and attacks on children ... is the continuing of reliance on radicalism as an instrument of policy," Mr. Karzai said.

Many Taliban fighters escaped into Pakistan when U.S. troops landed in Afghanistan in December 2001 and worked with anti-Taliban Afghan forces to drive the al Qaeda-backed government from Kabul within weeks.

Pakistan, one of three countries that had recognized the Taliban regime, quickly joined the United States in its war on terror. According to Gen. Musharraf's memoirs, published yesterday, Pakistan has handed over hundreds of al Qaeda suspects to the United States.

Gen. Musharraf, in the United States to address the U.N. General Assembly, insisted in an interview on Friday that the problem of terrorism in Afghanistan was rooted in Afghanistan itself.

Pakistani officials also have said that a recent agreement with tribal leaders along the Afghan border should put an end to cross-border raids and Taliban violence. But the pact has done little to stem terrorist attacks in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0069351

That violence continued yesterday in the southern city of Kandahar, where two men on a motorbike fatally shot Safia Ama Jan, a longtime women's rights advocate who had run an underground school for girls while the Taliban was in power.

The Taliban had outlawed education for girls.

A funeral was held later yesterday at a crowded Shi'ite mosque for Mrs. Ama Jan, a provincial director for the Ministry of Women's Affairs.

"The enemy of Afghanistan killed her, but they should know it will not derail women from the path we are on. We will continue on our way," said Fariba Ahmedi, a parliament member from Kandahar, according to the Associated Press.

In his Washington address yesterday, Mr. Karzai said many of the terrorists afflicting his country get their start in religious schools, or madrassas, in Pakistan.

"Young, poor, unaware, uneducated children from the poorest of families are taken and preached hatred against me, against you, against any other person" in these schools, said Mr. Karzai, who urged Gen. Musharraf to shut down the madrassas and imprison those who teach there.

"Military action in Afghanistan alone is not going to free us of terrorism. Going to the source of terrorism -- where they get trained, motivated, financed and deployed -- is necessary now," he said.

"They are told: 'Go kill yourself in Afghanistan. Commit suicide and kill as many internationals and Afghans as you can, and the instant you are dead you will be in heaven.' To a boy of 7, keep preaching that until he is 14, and you will have a suicide bomber," Mr. Karzai said.

Gunmen Kill Afghan Official Who Backed Women's Rights (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, Sept. 25 — A senior Afghan official specializing in women's rights was gunned down here on her way to work on Monday morning by suspected Taliban gunmen. It was the highest-level assassination of a woman in Afghanistan in the five years since the Taliban were ousted from power.

Safia Amajan, 65, had served as chief of the women's affairs department in Kandahar Province for five years, working for women's rights and education and vocational training. A former teacher and high school principal, she was well known and much liked in Kandahar.

"It is a very tragic loss," said Sonja Bachmann, a United Nations political officer who knew Ms. Amajan well. "She did a good job, she worked in a very low-key way and worked hard to raise awareness about women's issues."

A spokesman claiming to speak for the Taliban claimed responsibility for the killing in a telephone call, [a news organization] reported

Hundreds of women gathered at the city's main Shiite mosque, where Ms. Amajan's body lay wrapped in a white shroud decorated with golden Koranic script, to mourn her loss. "There is no security for anyone now in Kandahar," one woman said, sobbing through her veil.

Ms. Amajan was shot as she was walking from her house up a narrow street to the main road shortly after 7 a.m., said shopkeepers in the area.

A gunman shot her four times with a pistol, said Muhammad Haidar, an official who worked in her office.

Her nephew, Muhammad Asif, 45, said that no one reported seeing the gunmen. "A carpenter was close to the scene and heard the shots and he called people," he said. Her husband also heard the shooting, came out of their house and found her lying in the street, Mr. Asif said.

The police were looking for two men, who escaped by motorcycle, said the provincial governor, Asadullah Khaled, who went to the crime scene. The police found tracks of the motorcycle driving away from the scene, he said.

Ms. Amajan preferred to take a taxi or public transport, even though her office had cars and drivers, her nephew said. "She wanted to keep a low profile," he said. "We wanted her to come and live with us in town, but she used to say, 'If it's God's will, they will take me anywhere.'"

Mr. Haidar said that she had not received specific threats but that everyone in the office knew of the danger posed by the Taliban, who have in the past attacked teachers and government officials. In another recent high-level assassination, a suicide bomber killed the governor of Paktia Province.

But to gun down a woman in the street, in this strictly conservative tribal society, is rare and shocking to many, and it has reinforced the fear in this southern city, which was once the Taliban spiritual headquarters, at the continuing violence and growing Taliban threats. A United Nations official noted that five people were kidnapped Sunday in the city.

"People are scared, of course," Mr. Haidar said. "How can we feel secure when the head of our department is killed in front of her house?"

DOJ_NMG_0069352

Ms. Amajan's relatives and employees ruled out any personal enmity as a motive, saying she was a religious woman, the mother of an 18-year-old son and a person of unimpeachable character.

"She was a poor woman, from a poor background and was very well connected to the local women's networks in Kandahar," Ms. Bachmann said. "In the south things are very difficult, and she worked to improve things for women — and she worked very well with us in the United Nations."

President Hamid Karzai, on a visit to the United States, condemned the killing. "The enemies of Afghanistan are trying to kill those people who are working for the peace and prosperity of Afghanistan," he said in a statement released in Kabul.

DOJ:

Worcester Federal Prosecutor Honored (WORCT)

By Lee Hammel

Worcester (MA) Telegram, September 26, 2006

Helped on Enron

David H. Hennessy, acting chief of the U.S. Attorney's Worcester branch , has been given the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, the Justice Department's highest award.

Mr. Hennessy, an assistant U.S. attorney since 1995, was among two Massachusetts assistant U.S. attorneys and a former assistant U.S. attorney from Massachusetts to be given awards Sept. 12 at DAR Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. Mr. Hennessy was given the award for his service on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, which investigated and prosecuted individuals considered most responsible for fraud in the energy company.

Mr. Hennessy served on the task force, which had about 40 prosecutors and FBI agents, from August 2003 through June 2004. The task force had offices in Washington and Houston, Enron's base. During part of that time he continued with some of his duties in the federal courthouse in Worcester, but for much of it he left Worcester early each Monday not to return from Houston until Thursday or Friday.

Mr. Hennessy served on the team that prosecuted Lea Fastow and the so-called Barge case defendants. Ms. Fastow, a former Enron assistant treasurer and wife of Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, was sentenced to a year in prison on a misdemeanor tax charge.

Former officials of Enron and Merrill Lynch were imprisoned for their roles in a sham sale of Nigerian energy-generating barges that enabled Enron to inflate its earnings and boost its stock price.

Referring to the Enron prosecutions, the Justice Department said, "This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions."

Massachusetts U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said, "These awards are given to a relative handful of recipients nationally and recognize their very high level of commitment and professionalism."

Before arriving in Massachusetts in July 1999, Mr. Hennessy was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of New York, centered in Brooklyn, for 4-1/2 years. While in Worcester, he investigates and prosecutes a variety of crimes, including economic, firearms and narcotics violations. Mr. Hennessy specialized in Russian and traditional organized crime in New York.

His role in prosecuting Gambino capo Nicholas "Little Nick" Corozzo in federal court in Brooklyn earned him mention in Jerry Capeci's Gang Land column.

Before that Mr. Hennessy was an assistant district attorney in the Office of the Special Narcotics Prosecutor and the office of District Attorney Robert Morgenthau in New York. Andrew Weissmann, Mr. Hennessy's supervisor in the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn, became deputy director of the Enron Task Force and recruited Mr. Hennessy for the Houston court cases.

Mr. Hennessy is a 1985 graduate of Fordham University School of Law and the State University of New York Plattsburgh campus.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P Is Urged To Overhaul Board In Wake Of Probe (WSJ)

By Don Clark And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. should overhaul its board in the wake of the leak-investigation scandal, corporate-governance experts say, and four public pension funds are proposing a way for shareholders to help do that.

The four funds -- representing public workers in Connecticut, New York, North Carolina and Washington, D.C. -- said they filed a proposal asking H-P to change its bylaws to allow any shareholder group holding 3% of the company's stock for at least a year to nominate one or more board candidates.

Backers of the proposal are the New York State Common Retirement Fund, the Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds, the North Carolina Retirement Systems and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Pension Funds. Their proposal relies partly on a recent appeals court ruling that sided with AFSCME.

Separately, a House committee studying the H-P imbroglio said it issued subpoenas to two H-P executives and a private investigator it had invited to testify at a hearing Thursday. Several other senior H-P executives -- including Chief Executive Mark Hurd and former Chairman Patricia Dunn -- are expected to appear.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee said it issued subpoenas to H-P Senior Counsel Kevin Hunsaker and H-P Global Security Manager Anthony Gentilucci; an H-P spokesman said Mr. Gentilucci plans to resign today. The other subpoena recipient is Ron DeLia, operator of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., a Boston-area private investigation firm that H-P used.

Miles Ehrlich, who represents Mr. Gentilucci, said "we have not decided whether he's going to testify. We will be there at the hearing." A lawyer for Mr. Hunsaker acknowledged receiving the subpoena but declined to make additional comment. Mr. DeLia's lawyer didn't return calls.

Ms. Dunn resigned last week at the request of the board in the wake of disclosures about investigation tactics that have prompted several government probes. Director Thomas Perkins resigned in May to protest the H-P leak investigation; George Keyworth, a focus of the probe, also has resigned.

Mr. Hurd announced Ms. Dunn's immediate resignation Friday at a news conference, outlining a series of tactics used by the company in investigating board leaks, including obtaining phone records of journalists under false pretenses.

Mr. Hurd, who assumed the chairman's role from Ms. Dunn, promised H-P employees earlier this month that he would try to improve the board. "You have a board here right now that is crippled in every way imaginable," said Ralph D. Ward, a Michigan author who publishes a newsletter called Boardroom Insider.

Even before finding new directors, Mr. Ward said, the board should get outside assistance in thoroughly investigating what it did wrong in the leak investigation. He then proposes Mr. Hurd lay out a plan for giving up the chairmanship eventually to an outside director.

H-P should give over about one-third of its board seats to newcomers, said Kirk O. Hanson, executive director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara (Calif.) University.

Mr. Perkins expressed his opinions about Ms. Dunn in a July 17 email to Mr. Hurd, being reported by The Wall Street Journal's editorial page today.

HP Officials, Contractor Ordered To Testify For House Panel (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Yuki Noguchi, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Congressional investigators have subpoenaed two Hewlett-Packard Co. employees and one contractor to testify before a House investigative subcommittee Thursday as part of the panel's probe of an HP spying scandal that has spawned two criminal investigations. The scandal grew out of a series of media-leak investigations at the Silicon Valley computer giant.

The subpoenas, the first issued by the panel in this case, went out over the weekend to HP senior counsel and ethics director Kevin Hunsaker; former HP global security director Anthony Gentilucci; and Ronald R. DeLia, owner of Security Outsourcing Solutions, a Boston investigative firm HP hired to help identify the sources of media leaks.

Hunsaker, who ran HP's leak investigation this year, has been on paid leave for at least a week, said his attorney Michael Pancer.

Gentilucci has resigned effective today, HP spokesman Ryan Donovan said.

Congress is questioning HP executives and its investigators as part of a broader examination into companies that sell or obtain unauthorized access to phone records.

Hunsaker and Gentilucci were both involved in HP's leak probe, which the company has said involved obtaining private phone records by impersonating directors and journalists. Other tactics, documents show, included secretively following board members and journalists, and embedding tracer software in an e-mail sent to a reporter. The legality of some of those techniques is under investigation by the FBI and California attorney general's office.

Thursday, the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee will question HP chief executive Mark V. Hurd, former chairman Patricia C. Dunn and others.

DeLia's lawyer, John Kiernan, did not return a call seeking comment. Hunsaker committed no crime, his lawyer said. "Everything that Kevin did, everything that Hewlett-Packard employees did, was legal and aboveboard," Pancer said. "And by that, I mean it was consistent with approved and usual investigative techniques."

Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

House Panel Subpoenas 3 To Testify In HP Spying Scandal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Three people involved in Hewlett-Packard Co.'s efforts to unmask a boardroom leak have been ordered to testify at this week's congressional hearing on the corporate spying scandal that's so far claimed the company's chairwoman and two directors.

The subpoenas are the first issued by the panel in its investigation. They were served over the weekend, according to a congressional aide who asked not to be identified because the investigation is continuing.

Until now, the invitations to testify at Thursday's hearing had been voluntary and other witnesses had accepted them.

The subpoenas from the House Energy and Commerce Committee went to Kevin T. Hunsaker, the technology company's chief ethics officer; Anthony R. Gentilucci, who manages HP's global investigations unit in Boston; and Ron DeLia, the operator of a detective firm hired by HP in the elaborate and intrusive investigation to trace the source of a boardroom leak.

Determined to protect confidential board discussions, then-HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn hired investigators who impersonated board members, employees and journalists to obtain their phone records. The detectives also spied on an HP director and concocted an e-mail sting to dupe reporter Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks Inc.'s technology news site.

Federal and California prosecutors are pursuing criminal investigations of the company's leak probe.

DeLia, who runs Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. of Needham, Massachusetts, previously signaled that he would appear at the hearing but might invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to answer lawmakers' questions. He had requested a subpoena from the committee as a legal formality, the congressional aide said.

Both Hunsaker and Gentilucci are likely to lose their jobs as part of a housecleaning planned by HP's chief executive, Mark Hurd, a person familiar with the matter said Friday. The person asked not to be identified because the terms of their departure are still being negotiated.

DeLia and HP representatives did not return messages seeking comment Monday.

Documents have shown how deeply the investigators intruded into the personal lives of seven HP directors, two employees, nine journalists and family members of the targeted individuals.

Dunn, who authorized the company investigation but has insisted she wasn't aware of the extreme tactics used, resigned Friday. Hurd, who immediately succeeded her while retaining the CEO and president positions, called the investigators' tactics "very disturbing" and apologized to those who were targeted in the investigation.

Dunn and Hurd have agreed to testify at the hearing.

Hunsaker in February pointed DeLia toward two board members he suspected of leaking information to journalists and made specific requests that the hired investigator obtain personal telephone records, a company document obtained by The Associated Press shows.

The Feb. 3 e-mail from Hunsaker to DeLia contrasts with a Jan. 30 message in which Hunsaker, a senior attorney in HP's legal department, expressed his concerns about the legality of the investigators' methods in pursuing the company's leak probe.

"Thanks Ron. I now strongly believe it's Keyworth," Hunsaker wrote, referring to director George Keyworth, who resigned this month. He also suspected another board member, Tom Perkins, who quit the board this spring to protest the investigation's tactics. He also asked DeLia to find out more about Keyworth's wife.

"I also think Perkins is leaking info for personal reasons, but I think BOTH January 23rd articles by Kawamoto were leaked by Keyworth," the e-mail continued. "Can you please see if we can find out Marion Keyworth's cell number and pull those records?"

HP shares, which took a hit Thursday after news reports indicated Hurd might have played a greater role in the probe, gained 60 cents, or 1.7 percent, to close at $35.71 in Monday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

AP Business Writer Michael Liedtke contributed to this report from San Francisco.

HP Scandal Figure Resigns After Being Subpoenaed (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 26, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A key player in the Hewlett-Packard spying scandal submitted his resignation Monday hours after he and two others were subpoenaed by federal officials, HP said.

Anthony Gentilucci, a global security manager for the computer giant, was part of a team assigned to find out who inside HP was leaking confidential information to the press. The team, which included HP staffers and outside detectives, used unsavory tactics to obtain confidential phone records, physically tracked board members and reporters, and tried to plant electronic tracking software on a reporter's computer.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee is investigating whether those actions were illegal. Monday, it said it issued subpoenas compelling Gentilucci, HP senior counsel Kevin Hunsaker and outside private investigator Ronald DeLia to appear at a hearing Thursday.

The committee had earlier asked the three men to attend. The subpoenas make the request mandatory. (Witnesses can still decline to answer questions by citing their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.)

Subpoenas can sometimes be used to compel a reluctant witness but can also be a legal formality. Committee spokesman Terry Lane wouldn't say why the subpoenas were issued.

Monday evening, Hunsaker was still employed by HP, spokesman Ryan Donovan said. DeLia did not return e-mail messages.

Six others involved in the scandal have also been asked to appear before the committee but have not been subpoenaed. HP CEO Mark Hurd, former chairman Patricia Dunn, and general counsel Ann Baskins will all testify, HP's Donovan says. He wouldn't comment on whether a fourth HP employee, computer security investigator Fred Adler, would show up.

Also on the list are Larry Sonsini, a prominent Silicon Valley attorney who counts HP as a client, and Joe Depante, owner of Florida detective firm Action Research Group. Sonsini intends to testify. Depante didn't return phone calls.

Several government agencies, including the FBI and the Securities and Exchange Commission, are investigating HP. But the House Committee has been one of the most aggressive. It has a 7-month-old investigation into phone-record fraud and is using the HP scandal to publicize the effort.

This Friday, one day after the HP hearing, the committee has asked representatives from most major cellphone companies to testify about phone fraud. Executives from Verizon Wireless, Sprint Nextel, Cingular Wireless, T-Mobile and US Cellular are among those planning to attend.

Such fraud has been around nearly forever but has been made much easier by the Internet and online bills, says Robert Douglas, a security consultant.

HP shares have fallen 2% since news of the scandal broke earlier this month.

Dunn And Dusted (WSJ)

By Viet D. Dinh

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

Justice Felix Frankfurter once wrote, "Wisdom too often never comes, and so one ought not to reject it merely because it comes late." So it is with Hewlett-Packard's decision on Friday to come clean with the available facts about Chairman Patricia Dunn's ill-advised investigation into board members and journalists, as well as to replace her with CEO Mark Hurd and appoint respected prosecutor Bart Schwartz to mop up the mess. Belated but welcome, these actions show that Mr. Hurd's steady hand will guide H-P out of the scandal and back to its rightful place as the icon of Silicon Valley.

For me the whole saga started in June with dinner at a London restaurant. The News Corporation was welcoming Spanish President José María Aznar to its board, on which venture capitalist Tom Perkins and I also serve as independent directors. Between drinks and glimpses at a World Cup match, as this paper has reported, Mr. Perkins asked me for advice on a confidential matter. He had resigned several weeks earlier from the H-P board, where he chaired the Nominations and Governance Committee, to protest an investigation into disclosures of board information and the decision to ask a fellow director, George "Jay" Keyworth, to resign.

H-P Sauce

That night and on the plane the next day, Mr. Perkins described a four-month operation instigated by Ms. Dunn, which we now know as Kona, to uncover contacts between members of her board and reporters covering H-P. That investigation, according to Mr. Perkins, pointed to Mr. Keyworth as the unnamed source for a January article on the trade Web site CNET.com.

My immediate reaction was that it was unconscionable for a chairman to spy on her own directors. Having participated in and observed a number of leak investigations as a Justice Department official, I also thought it nearly impossible to uncover a confidential source without using government subpoenas, which H-P did not have, or resorting to likely illegal methods, which at the time was unthinkable. Mr. Perkins asked me to serve as his counsel, and I agreed.

Most perplexing was the supposed trigger for this unfortunate foray into corporate intrigue. The CNET article, if anything, burnished the image of H-P and its management. There was no disclosure of material nonpublic financial information to trigger regulatory or legal issues. Amid banal details about how long the days were and how hard the directors worked were glimpses into the company's general strategic and competitive vision. Mr. Hurd was engineering an impressive turnaround, and the article showed that H-P was not simply cutting costs and laying off workers but rather executing a shrewd strategic plan to best its competitors.

It is difficult to see how a puff piece with nuggets already publicized by H-P could be viewed as harmful. The board has since acknowledged that "at H-P's request, Dr. Keyworth often had contacts with the press to explain H-P's interests. The board does not believe that Dr. Keyworth's contact with CNET in January 2006 was vetted through appropriate channels, but also recognizes that his discussion with the CNET reporter was undertaken in an attempt to further H-P's interests." And there is no general duty of confidentiality for directors, only a duty of loyalty to act in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholders.

So the whole thing boils down to Mr. Keyworth deciding to speak favorably to a reporter without asking for permission. The answer to this question of authority is not self-evident as a legal matter. The chairman of the board is first among equals -- entrusted with the responsibility to set agendas, conduct meetings and interact with management. But each board member individually owes a legal duty to act in the best interests of the corporation, a personal duty that cannot and should not be delegated or transferred to anyone else.

It is true that unauthorized disclosures of board information would violate a mutual commitment of confidentiality that H-P directors made to prevent such disclosures following the ouster of Carly Fiorina as chairman and CEO. This is a serious matter, but one that could and should be handled, as Mr. Perkins suggested to Ms. Dunn early on, by a direct personal conversation with the directors. It is therefore understandable for Mr. Keyworth to reportedly exclaim, when confronted with the CNET investigation results, "I would have told you all about this. Why didn't you just ask?" * * *

Overlaying these minutiae is a broader morality tale for the modern era of corporate governance. Enron and WorldCom prompted Sarbanes-Oxley, SEC regulations and a host of corporate "best practices." These requirements emphasized internal controls, divided corporate authority and instituted checks and balances. Essential as these requirements may be to ensure technical compliance with the new rules, they cannot substitute for the guiding light of director conduct: business judgment.

Patricia Dunn reportedly is a "governance perfectionist." When Mr. Perkins's objections to Ms. Dunn's investigation surfaced publicly, she called the conflict "part of the board's progression from one that was more personality driven to one that is process driven and capable of upholding today's highest governance standards." Her supporters whispered that Mr. Perkins had challenged her proposal for a mandatory director education program on corporate compliance. And in resigning last week she emphasized, "I followed the proper processes by seeking the assistance of H-P security personnel." Left unanswered was whether the sub rosa investigation was a good idea or whether the reaction was reasonable to the infraction.

Meanwhile, in June, Tom Perkins wrote to Larry Sonsini, outside counsel to the H-P board, and passed on my view that the investigation was unconscionable and likely illegal. After conversations with staff, Mr. Sonsini confirmed that Ms. Dunn's Kona investigation "did obtain information regarding phone calls made and received by the cell or home phones of directors" and that it was "done through a third party that made pretext calls to phone service providers." Questions have been raised about Mr. Sonsini's role, but Mr. Perkins's and my impression is that Mr. Sonsini was simply a good, honest lawyer doing his best to represent his client in very difficult situations.

It was Mr. Sonsini's candid acknowledgment of pretexting that prompted Mr. Perkins to contact telephone companies and obtain evidence that his records had been accessed. Wherever responsibility for such actions lie are for prosecutors to determine, but one thing is clear: Using false pretenses to obtain telephone records without the subscriber's consent is illegal under state and federal law.

The Department of Justice wrote to Congress in March that pretexting of telephone records is, under current law, a violation of the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, the wire fraud statute and the identity theft statute. The Bush administration nevertheless advocated passage of H.R. 4709, the "Law Enforcement and Phone Privacy Protection Act of 2006," because it "would impose sanctions for certain sales of phone records, would criminalize some conduct that is harmful to consumers but that is not addressed by current criminal law." The House heeded the call and unanimously passed the bill, which is currently pending in the Senate.

What happened to Tom Perkins is unique only because of the players involved. Thousands have had their phone records illegally accessed. Ironically, the pervasiveness of the trade in illegally obtained phone records has led many buyers of illicit records to believe that they were not dealing in stolen goods. Perhaps that is one silver lining to this episode: Henceforth, no one, least of all corporate America, should be able to claim that they didn't know that obtaining telephone records without consent is improper and illegal. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0069357

H-P is now charting the right course, with Mark Hurd firmly at the helm. There is no better indication of his commitment to doing the right thing than the appointment of Bart Schwartz as counsel to review and revamp H-P's security processes. "Bart is an outstanding lawyer and investigator with excellent judgment and immense integrity," former FBI director Louie Freeh told me. "He will act independently and provide to H-P a 'best practices' architecture for investigations and procedures which is thorough, fair and sensitive to privacy requirements."

Mr. Hurd himself has frankly acknowledged his specific interactions with Ms. Dunn's investigation. Like any good scandal, Kona has sucked everything and everyone, however peripheral, into its vortex. But based on all available information, I believe that his knowledge was tangential and his involvement indirect. It would be surprising -- and much more disturbing -- if Mr. Hurd had zero knowledge of, or involvement in, actions of H-P employees and contractors under the direction of the board chairman.

One may well ask whether Mr. Hurd should have done less to help or could have done more to stop the investigation. But here, too, I think he should get the benefit of any doubt. As CEO, Mr. Hurd was charged with the management and operations of H-P, in the process engineering one of the most remarkable turnarounds in recent corporate history. Even if he had the will, he did not have the unilateral authority to challenge Ms. Dunn's management of the board. Mr. Hurd was, and should have been, doing his job to increase shareholder value; and the machinations of an increasingly dysfunctional board were a distraction.

Hopefully, those distractions are now over. By stepping aside, Ms. Dunn proved her personal commitment to H-P and its shareholders. It is never easy to let go under pressure, and her decision speaks volumes about her courage, her grace and, in Mr. Hurd's words, "her ability to put the interests of H-P before her personal interests."

In the final analysis, the best thing that the H-P board did was to appoint Mark Hurd as CEO. But then it failed him. Ironically, the three persons most instrumental in recruiting Mr. Hurd -- Patricia Dunn, Jay Keyworth and Tom Perkins -- have all resigned, and he is now in charge of both the company and the board. The task may be more challenging, but the odds are good that he will succeed in leading the board as he did in leading the company.

'Dear Mark'

On July 18, the same day that Tom Perkins formally confirmed his protest to the entire board, he wrote Mr. Hurd a personal email that bears quoting in its entirety:

"Dear Mark: A while back I promised you that we directors would clean up our act, and free you from worries about the H-P board. I am really sorry that I didn't deliver on this, and I apologize for the necessity of raising the issue of illegal activity by the board chairman in today's email to the board. But, it's an extremely serious matter, and I have legal obligations.

"Aside from this, I worry that Pattie, as new chair of N&G, will 'pack' the board with the kind of directors she so admires -- ciphers from high cap companies, with no fast-cycle technology background, and certainly no Valley entrepreneurial genes.

"I worry that you will wind up with a 'blue ribbon' board that will be of zero, or even negative, value to you when the going gets tough. I don't wish you bad luck -- but life eventually delivers tough scenarios to CEOs of big companies -- and I doubt if H-P will prove to be the exception.

"Anyway, I am rooting for you still, and I hope everything works out as you wish best.

"Sincerely, -- Tom."

As Mr. Perkins has said, "This, too, shall pass." Hopefully, soon.

Mr. Dinh, a Georgetown law professor and principal of Bancroft Associates PLLC, is the attorney for Tom Perkins. He was assistant attorney general for legal policy in the U.S. Department of Justice from 2001 to 2003.

Hewlett-Packard's Sonsini Hires Ex-Bush Lawyer For Probe Advice (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt

Bloomberg, September 26, 2006

Sept. 25 (Bloomberg) -- Lawrence W. Sonsini, a legal adviser to Hewlett-Packard Co., hired President Bush's former election counsel Michael Madigan to help him as he faces a Congressional investigation of the company's probe of boardroom leaks.

Sonsini, 65, chairman of the Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati law firm, hired a team that includes Madigan and former Congressman Bill Paxon, both of the Washington, D.C., office of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld. Madigan was chief litigation counsel for Bush's campaign in the Florida recount during the 2000 election.

Sonsini and officials at Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard are scheduled to appear Thursday before a subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is investigating whether company tactics used to determine the source of news leaks to its board were illegal.

Wilson Sonsini ``is working with Akin Gump, under the leadership of former Congressman Bill Paxon and Mike Madigan to help understand the congressional process," firm spokeswoman Courtney Dorman said in an e-mail.

DOJ_NMG_0069358

Sonsini built Wilson Sonsini from a four-lawyer shop he joined in 1966 to a 600-attorney firm based in Palo Alto. He conducted initial interviews of Hewlett-Packard's board members in January, 2005, to determine the source of news leaks, Dorman said. Results from those interviews proved inconclusive.

Hewlett-Packard then undertook its own inquiry, employing investigators who used fake identities to obtain telephone records of directors, employees and journalists to identify the source of the leaks. California's attorney general Bill Lockyer and the U.S. Justice Department are reviewing the tactics, called pretexting, to see if crimes were committed.

Also scheduled to appear at the hearing are Hewlett-Packard Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd, former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, General Counsel Ann Baskins, and Fred Adler, a company investigator. Earlier today two other company executives, Kevin Hunsaker, the senior counsel, and Anthony Gentilucci, its global security manager, and an outside investigator were served subpoenas to testify.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-largest personal computer rose 60 cents to $35.71 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They've risen 25 percent this year.

To contact the reporter on this story: Joel Rosenblatt in San Francisco at jrosenblatt@bloomberg.net .

Sentencing Of Former Homestore CEO Delayed (INMAN)

Inman News, September 26, 2006

Stuart Wolff faces maximum sentence of 175 years

Sentencing for Stuart Wolff, the former CEO of Homestore Inc. who was convicted in June on charges ranging from conspiracy to fraudulent insider trading, has been delayed until at least Oct. 10.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said today, "At the defense's request, the hearing has been postponed" and could be delayed until Oct. 10 or Oct. 16.

Wolff, 43, reportedly faces a maximum statutory sentence of 175 years in federal prison for the crimes at Homestore, now known as Move Inc. The company operates popular home-search Web site Realtor.com.

Wolff served as CEO and chairman of the board at Homestore from 1997-2002, when he resigned during an internal investigation. A jury found Wolff guilty of conspiracy, filing false statements with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, lying to accountants, fraudulent insider trading, and falsification of corporate books and records.

He had originally been scheduled for sentencing Sept. 11.

There are 11 other defendants who also await sentencing related to past problems at Homestore, including Peter Tafeen, the company's former executive vice president of business development who pleaded guilty in March to one count of securities fraud and organizing fraudulent advertising transactions through which Homestore artificially inflated its revenues.

The SEC and U.S. Justice Department in April 2005 announced criminal and civil cases against Wolff and Tafeen.

Fund Manager Charged In CompuDyne Trading (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Trades Said to Use Inside Information

NEW YORK, Sept. 25 -- A former hedge fund manager has been charged with criminal insider trading for allegedly profiting from confidential information she had received from Arlington investment firm Friedman Billings Ramsey Group Inc.

Hilary L. Shane, 39, was indicted earlier this month on five counts of securities fraud, and she was arraigned on Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. She pleaded not guilty.

The charges stem from a two-year investigation into a 2001 private stock offering that FBR managed for CompuDyne Corp., a publicly traded Annapolis security company. Such a transaction is known as a private offering in public equity, or PIPE, and plans for them are kept confidential because they can cause the public share price to fall.

Shane, who now lives in Jupiter, Fla., has already paid $1.45 million to settle a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and been banned from the industry by the NASD. Her lawyer, Robert Gold, declined to comment outside of the courtroom.

FBR co-founder Emanuel J. Friedman abruptly retired in 2005 during the investigation, and two other top executives resigned. An FBR spokeswoman declined to comment Monday.

According to the indictment, Shane, who was then working for First New York Securities LLC, was contacted by an FBR salesman to see if she would be interested in buying shares in a CompuDyne private equity placement. Shane told the salesman she was interested in buying up to 500,000 shares at up to $14 apiece. At the time, CompuDyne shares were trading above $17.

DOJ_NMG_0069359

Eventually, FBR priced the PIPE at $12 a share, and Shane agreed on Oct. 8, 2001, to buy a total of 475,000 shares, including 237,000 for her personal account. The next day, she began to sell the stock short -- Wall Street slang for selling a promise to deliver shares at a later date, the indictment alleged.

Shane sold 122,900 shares short and received an average of $14.59 per share, the indictment said. She then covered those sales using shares she bought in the PIPE transaction for $12 a share, pocketing the difference of $315,216.

Not Guilty Plea To Illegal Short Selling (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

A former New York hedge fund manager pleaded not guilty yesterday to illegally short selling shares of CompuDyne hours before the company announced a private share offering.

An indictment said that Hilary L. Shane, 39, bought shares for herself and her clients, agreeing to keep the offering secret until it was announced. Hours before the announcement in 2001, Ms. Shane sold 122,900 CompuDyne shares short for about $14.59 apiece, according to the indictment, which was dated Sept. 12 and unsealed Thursday. Short sellers borrow shares and sell them, and make money if the stock price falls.

Weeks later, Ms. Shane used shares she had bought in the private offering for $12 each to return the borrowed shares, making a profit of $315,216 for herself and her clients, prosecutors said. Ms. Shane, of Jupiter, Fla., made her plea before Magistrate Judge Henry Pittman of Federal District Court in Manhattan. She was released without bail, and her next court date is Oct. 10, a Justice Department spokeswoman said. A call to CompuDyne, a security system company based in Annapolis, Md., was not returned.

In May 2005, Ms. Shane paid more than $1 million in fines and restitution to settle a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit arising from the same transactions, without admitting or denying the accusations, the S.E.C. said.

Scrushy's Lawyers Say Jurors Discussed Case (WSJ)

By Betsy Mckay And Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

Some of the jurors in a corruption trial involving HealthSouth Corp. founder and former chief executive Richard M. Scrushy discussed the case in emails before convicting him, and used evidence gleaned from the Internet in their deliberations, defense attorneys said in a motion seeking a new trial.

The motion, filed yesterday in U.S. District Court in Montgomery, Ala., by lawyers for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Donald Siegelman, included copies of four emails that the attorneys said were sent to them anonymously, as well as an affidavit from an unidentified juror alleging that some jurors had introduced information about the case to other jurors that they had gotten off the Internet.

Mr. Scrushy was convicted June 29 of paying $500,000 in bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Mr. Scrushy was found guilty on all six charges he faced in the trial, including bribery, conspiracy and mail fraud. Mr. Siegelman was convicted on 10 corruption-related counts.

David A. McDonald, a Mobile lawyer representing Mr. Siegelman, said the defense teams began looking into outside influence after the jury foreman said in a post-verdict news interview that he'd researched his duties on the Internet. At least three jurors discussed the case by email apart from the other jurors, with two of them engaging in dialogue "indicative of an orchestrated effort to ensure that guilty verdicts" would be delivered to Messrs. Scrushy and Siegelman, according to the motion.

U.S. District Judge Mark Fuller admonished jurors repeatedly throughout the trial not to discuss the case among themselves outside of formal deliberations. On May 29, a month before Mr. Scrushy's conviction, one juror, using a Google g-mail account, wrote to another that "some of the kounts r confusing 2 our friends" and that two other jurors were "still off trac."

On June 25, an email from the same Google g-mail account said that "penalty 2 severe ... still unclear on couple of counts against pastor & gov." The term "pastor" appears to refer to Mr. Scrushy, who has a religious cable TV show.

In the affidavit, the unidentified juror recalled being confused by the Internet information others had brought in. "I thought that the governor had put money from HealthSouth in his personal account. But now I know that ain't true," the affidavit said.

The attorneys are asking Judge Fuller for permission to authenticate email addresses and text messages of jurors, Mr. McDonald said. "We are entering an entirely new era where people are so reliant on email and text messaging," he said. "I believe this will be a landmark case."

A spokesman for Mr. Scrushy declined to comment. Louis V. Franklin Sr., the criminal-division chief of the U.S. attorney's office in Montgomery who led the case for the prosecution, couldn't be reached to comment. Messrs. Scrushy and Siegelman have until Friday to file additional grounds for requesting a new trial and have not ruled out doing so. Judge Fuller would have two weeks to respond to the request.

DOJ_NMG_0069360

Ebbers To Head To Prison Today (USAT)

By Jayne O'donnell

USA Today, September 26, 2006

Bernie Ebbers, the founder and former CEO of one-time telecom giant WorldCom, reports to federal prison today to begin serving a 25-year term for accounting fraud.

It could be a life sentence for Ebbers, who is 65.

It's the harshest sentence in the recent wave of white-collar convictions and is being contested by Ebbers' defense lawyer, Reid Weingarten. But Ebbers was ordered to report to prison anyway.

In August 2005, U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones recommended that Ebbers serve his sentence at the minimum-security prison in Yazoo City, Miss.

Bureau of Prisons officials on Monday would not say where Ebbers will be sent. But because of the sentence length, Ebbers won't be going to a prison camp. Minimum-security prison camps have a more campuslike atmosphere, and inmates are allowed to move somewhat freely on the grounds.

Increasingly, federal prisons are filled — overcrowded, in fact — with young drug- or immigration-law violators. Even low-security prisons house a mix of criminals, including some serving the last few years of sentences for murder.

Ebbers was blamed for the $11 billion accounting fraud at WorldCom, now known as MCI. Other executives shared the blame, but to a lesser extent at sentencing time:

·Former CFO Scott Sullivan, who cooperated with prosecutors, is serving a five-year sentence and is expected to be released in 2010.

·Former controller David Myers has already served his sentence of a year and a day in prison.

·Troy Normand, a former accountant, got three years probation, while his boss, Betty Vinson, got five months in prison.

·Vinson's boss, Buford “Buddy” Yates, is serving a term of a year and a day.

Ebbers was convicted of fraud and conspiracy in March 2005 for his role in the scandal. A three-judge panel for the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan upheld the conviction and sentence.

The panel rejected defense arguments that he was denied a fair trial and that his sentence did not fit the crime.

The Jackson, Miss., Clarion-Ledger reports Ebbers can seek a rehearing by the three-judge panel that upheld his sentence and a hearing by the full 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. He also can appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Fastow Takes Aim At Banks He Says Helped Enron (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

HOUSTON, Sept. 25 -- Former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow soon may be headed to prison -- but not without a parting shot at the banks that he says helped the company disguise its financial problems.

As he moved to wrap up his personal affairs before he is sentenced Tuesday, Fastow, 44, has agreed to assist lawyers representing shareholders who lost billions of dollars when the energy trader filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2001, according to documents reviewed by The Washington Post.

Wary of being branded the primary scapegoat for Enron's demise, Fastow is pointing to several investment banks that have rebuffed efforts to settle a class-action shareholder lawsuit. The banks, all of which have denied wrongdoing in court filings, include Merrill Lynch & Co., the Credit Suisse Group, and the Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC.

Shareholders' lawyers have collected a record $8 billion for Enron investors in settlement agreements with J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Citigroup Inc. and Bank of America Corp., among others.

But U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon dealt the shareholders a significant setback earlier this year, when she dismissed Barclays PLC from the case. In legal reasoning embraced by other investment banks still fighting the lawsuit, the judge declared that shareholders had to prove more than just that bankers had aided or abetted Enron in concealing its financial woes.

Instead, the investors' lawyers, led by William S. Lerach, would be required to produce evidence the banks were directly involved in Enron's manipulations of its financial statements or in misleading investors -- a much higher burden of proof.

That's where Fastow, who often dealt with bankers as Enron's finance chief, comes into the picture. Fastow has consented to sit for an extensive deposition with plaintiff lawyers to tell them what he knows and to point them to documents that flesh out the bankers' role in helping Enron in exchange for hundreds of millions of dollars in fees, the documents indicate.

DOJ_NMG_0069361

The former executive has said that he viewed banks as "problem-solvers" and that based on conversations he had with certain bankers, certain banks worked with Enron "intentionally and knowingly" to engineer deals that would affect the company's financial statements and reach technical accounting goals of questionable substance, according to a formal declaration by Fastow to be presented at his sentencing.

A representative from Lerach's firm is expected to appear at Fastow's sentencing Tuesday in Houston, where the lawyer plans to ask the judge for leniency from Fastow's expected 10-year prison sentence, citing the unusual amount of help Fastow is providing investors. Citing Fastow's participation, Lerach's firm said it intends to ask Harmon to reinstate Barclays and Deutsche Bank AG, which also was dismissed earlier this year, as defendants in the shareholders' lawsuit.

A Senate investigations subcommittee and a bankruptcy examiner previously studied the role of banks, which investigators said helped Enron structure billions of dollars in hidden loans and manufacture millions more in cash flow. By aggressively employing accounting tricks, with the assistance of friendly banks, Enron reported $10 billion in debt at the end of 2000, rather than the more accurate figure of $22 billion, according to a 2003 report by examiner R. Neal Batson.

Representatives for banks that have not settled the case, including Credit Suisse and Merrill, declined to comment about Fastow's assistance to plaintiffs. But legal analyst David Berg cast doubt on the credibility of the former Enron executive, who has admitted that he lied to auditors and stole from the company. Berg, a Houston lawyer representing Deutsche Bank, said in an e-mail that "enlisting Fastow is like inviting the devil to dinner."

Lerach, who is spearheading the plaintiffs' case, asserted in an e-mail that Fastow has provided key insights into "how the Enron banks actively participated in the creation of financial structures that were designed to deceive the markets, credit rating agencies and analysts -- and cheat investors out of billions and billions of dollars. Andy Fastow's sworn statements, which are corroborated by contemporaneous documents, directly implicate some of our nation's largest banks in the Enron corruption."

FBI Promises Crackdown On Stock-Option Fraud As Cases Increase (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 26, 2006

By Robert Schmidt

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- The FBI is conducting probes of 52 companies that may have illegally backdated stock options and more cases are on the way, its new criminal investigative chief said.

The number of criminal cases has increased 16 percent in less than two months, said Chip Burrus, an assistant director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. ``We're going to knock that pretty good," he said in an interview. ``We're going to go after those."

Burrus signaled the Justice Department will oppose efforts to water down the corporate-governance overhaul adopted in the wake of the scandals involving Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and others. In the interview, he praised the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley accounting law, which has been under attack from business groups and Wall Street, and said the FBI is paying close attention to fraud in the $1.2 trillion hedge-fund industry.

The FBI is investigating 486 corporate fraud cases this fiscal year, up from 423 in 2005, according to the agency. It has also opened 1,160 securities fraud probes, compared with 1,139 last year. Twenty of the bureau's corporate-fraud cases allegedly involve more than $1 billion.

``There is a general idea that this has sort of gone away," Burrus said. ``It's not going away."

The bureau works closely with the Securities and Exchange Commission, U.S. attorneys' offices, the Justice Department's fraud section and other agencies.

Burrus's comments echo those of Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who said in a June 29 interview that corporate fraud remains a priority for the Justice Department.

FBI at the Door

For executives, Burrus said, a knock on the door from an FBI agent sends a strong message.

``I'm not interested in civil fines," he said. ``If I'm coming in and I'm looking, there are allegations of criminal misconduct. There's obviously a different pucker factor that comes when you start talking to an FBI agent."

Illegal manipulation of stock options is one of the biggest growth areas, Burrus said. Backdating occurs when companies reward executives by retroactively setting the grant date to a time when the stock was cheap, increasing the potential for profit. At least 130 companies have disclosed internal probes or federal investigations into their options practices.

The first criminal charges in the options scandal were brought against former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc., based in San Jose, California, and New York-based Comverse Technology Inc.

Admit Wrongdoing

Burrus said the Justice Department is encouraging companies to come forward and admit wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0069362

``Honest corporate executives want fast resolution to this so they can move on with what they do best, and that's the business that they're in," he said. ``If we linger around these things, then it's not good for them, it's not good for us."

On hedge funds, Burrus said the FBI is concerned about the number of smaller investors gaining access, mostly through pension funds, to the private partnerships meant for the wealthy. President George W. Bush's corporate fraud task force, including the FBI, has identified hedge funds as ``an emerging threat."

The assets of largely unregulated hedge funds have more than doubled over the past five years. An attempt by the SEC to set up minimal requirements for the investment pools, such as periodic inspections, was struck down in June by a federal appeals court in Washington.

`Emerging Threat'

``It is an emerging threat because of the dollar value and the number of institutions that are actively taking a look at this," Burrus said. ``People that maybe aren't expecting to have this type of a risky investment in their portfolio end up taking a bath."

Several high-profile hedge funds have collapsed in the past two years, including Stamford, Connecticut-based Bayou Management LLC and Atlanta-based International Management Associates LLC, which counted professional football players among its investors. Earlier this month, Greenwich, Connecticut-based Amaranth Advisors LLC informed clients that it lost $6 billion on natural gas trades.

As the Justice Department's investigative arm, the FBI has some 260 agents working on corporate, securities and commodities fraud cases.

Still, business investigations take a back seat to terrorism and counter-intelligence probes. In Burrus's own division, corporate fraud ranks third in importance behind combating gangs and investigating public corruption, he said.

White-Collar Crime

That doesn't deter Burrus, 49, who said he ``cut his teeth" at the bureau on white-collar criminal investigations in the 1980s and 1990s, especially bank fraud. He joined the FBI in 1983 and rose to head its office in Salt Lake City. Burrus became acting head of the criminal investigative division in February and was appointed to the permanent job last month by FBI Director Robert Mueller.

``Our goal has always been to maintain the integrity of the markets to protect the average investor," Burrus said, citing retirees who ``just get fleeced right and left" and those who lose their jobs due to corporate malfeasance.

Burrus said the agency learned valuable lessons from the accounting scandals, including where to locate resources. Most of the bureau's financial expertise is in major cities like New York, Los Angeles and San Francisco, and the agency was forced to play ``catch up" in places like Clinton, Mississippi, home to WorldCom, and in Houston, where Enron had its headquarters.

``It took us a while to get peddling on Enron and WorldCom," Burrus said.

Response Teams

Karen Spangenberg, chief of the FBI's financial crimes section in Burrus's division, has created four, 10-person regional response teams. They include lawyers, accountants, financial analysts and asset forfeiture specialists. They can be deployed at the first sign of trouble.

``In corporate fraud cases, especially ones that are disintegrating in front of your eyes, there is a real need to quickly get all the evidence," Burrus said.

He also said the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which increased penalties for financial fraud and required executives to certify that their books are in order, ``has been a big help."

The law ``brings a seriousness to the company's financial statements, where corporate executives are held accountable," Burrus said. ``It puts some real teeth into what they knew, when they knew it. And I think it does a great service to the American investor."

To contact the reporter on this story: Robert Schmidt in Washington at rschmidt5@bloomberg.net .

Lawyers Get Fat On A Case Of French Fries (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Maybe there's something about the smell of french fries sizzling in a deep-fat fryer that sets off the protectors of the estate of Fleming Cos .

The wholesale food distributor, once the largest in the United States, quickly paid off some $45 million in bills from fresh-fruit and vegetable suppliers after seeking bankruptcy protection in 2003. Among other companies, it paid Chiquita Brands International Inc. $548,326.94 and Dole Fresh Fruit $2.3 million.

DOJ_NMG_0069363

Yet Fleming balked at claims, totaling some $1.6 million, of H.J. Heinz Co. , J.R. Simplot Co. and Cavendish Farms on the grounds that their product -- frozen french fries -- shouldn't be covered by an arcane U.S. Department of Agriculture regulation that falls under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act.

The law lets agribusiness suppliers collect first in such cases as long as they provided fresh vegetables. That can mean the difference between getting paid in full or standing with the unsecured creditors and getting pennies on the dollar.

The fries folks had lost claims in earlier bankruptcy cases, so they succeeded in getting "batter and coating" added to the list of processes allowed in the rule governing what constitutes "fresh" vegetables.

A Sept. 14 ruling by a federal judge in Delaware, following earlier court precedents in Texas, handed victory to the frozen spuds industry. It ordered Fleming to pay the three companies some $3 million in claims, interest and attorney fees.

"Billions of dollars of french fries are sold every year," said Michael Keaton , a Chicago lawyer who specializes in PACA claims and represented the fries' makers. "Now, companies don't have to write this off as bad debt. It has been elevated to gold-star status."

He said the lawyers from Chicago-based Kirkland & Ellis LLP representing the Fleming bankruptcy trust probably spent more fighting the issue than the cost of paying the original claims.

"The interest and attorneys' fees are probably closing in on -- if not exceeding -- the amount of the underlying claim," Keaton said.

The law firm responded that the court-appointed trustee for the creditors felt that Fleming's legal position was worth pursuing to try to preserve assets for other claims.

When it filed for bankruptcy, Lewisville, Tex.-based Fleming listed assets of $4.2 billion and $3.5 billion of debt.

It supplied about 45,000 retail locations including supermarkets, convenience stores and big-box retailers such as Kmart . The company reorganized as Core-Mark Holding Co .

In late 2003, long before french fries became a legal sticking point, U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Mary F. Walrath criticized Kirkland & Ellis and another Fleming law firm for what she called "improper" fee requests and inefficient use of resources. She said Kirkland & Ellis was getting more than $400 an hour and that the law firm was billing at twice the monthly rate as the creditors' committee.

Richard Wynne of Kirkland & Ellis, an attorney for the Fleming trust, said the firm reduced its fees by $401,000 in response to the judge's request. He said she approved the final fee request of $31.7 million as well as $2.8 million in expenses without further reductions.

The PACA law that became such a contested issue was passed in 1930 to protect farmers at a time when many made deals with a handshake and never got paid. Over the years, the key to being paid was what qualified as perishable. Curing, cutting, dicing, drying, seed removal, and slicing were allowed by the Department of Agriculture as long as they didn't change the character of the produce.

Therein lies the dispute, which has been going on since the 1960s. Over time, questions have arisen about whether water and oil blanching and battering and coating turned a fresh spud into a cooked fry. On several occasions, the USDA amended the rule to include them.

The potato industry had lost the legal argument in earlier cases. A court decided in 1999 that Long John Silver's Restaurants Inc. didn't have to pay PACA claims because a certain kind of batter coating was really more like breading than blanching.

That was compounded by the bankruptcy of Ameriserve Food Distribution Inc. in 2000. In that case, Ameriserve didn't pay $11 million in frozen french fry claims. Keaton, who also represented the fries' firms then, said: "They walked away and settled cheap."

The Frozen Potato Products Institute went back to the regulatory well, this time asking the USDA to explicitly state in the rule that battering and coating didn't change the character of the product. In 2003, with no opposition, such a rule was issued.

With this new authority in hand, conditions for recovery looked more favorable in the Fleming case.

But Fleming lawyers contested the potato claim in separate court cases twice, and lost an appeal in Texas. In testimony in the Delaware district court case, Fleming and its lawyers brought in Ed O'Neill , a food scientist, who told the court that battering and coating introduces non-potato products into the french fry and oil blanching amounts to beginning the cooking process. In short, he said, the product is not fresh.

Simplot hired its own expert, Charles Berry , who has a doctorate in cereal chemistry, and it secured affidavits from employees who said that after oil blanching, the product remained "raw and perishable."

With U.S. District Judge Sue Robinson in Wilmington ruling for the french fry claims, the long legal battle would seem to be over.

DOJ_NMG_0069364

But not so fast with that ketchup. The Fleming trust attorneys say the court should have looked at the physical and chemical properties to see if the frozen fries were indeed being cooked to some degree.

Christopher Casamassima , a lawyer with Kirkland & Ellis, said, "We're evaluating our options." That sounds as if an appeal might not be out of the question.

Cindy Skrzycki is a regulatory columnist for Bloomberg News.

Judge Delays Sale Of Insurance Exec's Landmark Mansion (CHIT)

By Courtney Flynn

Chicago Tribune, September 26, 2006

A federal judge on Monday gave prosecutors more time to accept offers for the Highland Park estate of convicted insurance executive Michael Segal after an attorney for a developer who won an auction to buy the property expressed concerns about a potential federal historic review process.

Jeffrey Mayer, lawyer for developer Orren Pickell of Lincolnshire, said his client was unaware a historic review might be necessary.

He said a review would have "serious implications" on financing and other issues related to the sale and it could create a breach of an agreement to buy the estate for $17.6 million.

U.S. District Judge Ruben Castillo gave prosecutors, who are seeking to recoup part of the $30 million Segal was ordered to forfeit after his 2004 conviction on racketeering, fraud, embezzlement and other charges, until Oct. 3 to consider other offers. Castillo has not ruled on whether proceedings for historic properties would apply to the Segal property.

Earlier this month, preservationists made a last-minute plea to delay Castillo's approval of the sale pending the federal historic review process, which they maintain is required for the property.

But prosecutors have argued that the historic review process would not apply because the court is to determine what happens to the estate.

Segal's 17-acre lakefront property on Sheridan Road is listed on the National Register of Historic Places and includes grounds designed by landscape architect Jens Jensen and a Prairie-style Tudor Revival home designed by Howard Van Doren Shaw.

Street Sleuth SEC Financial-Reports Database To Undergo $54 Million Upgrade (WSJ)

By Judith Burns And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Securities regulators are planning a $54 million upgrade of the computer database on corporate financial reports that officials say will revolutionize the public-disclosure system.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis and Retrieval system, known as Edgar, will be transformed and likely will be renamed, said SEC chief Christopher Cox.

The overhaul will rely on interactive data "tagging" that makes it easier for investors, analysts and the agency to find, search for and compare information.

For more than a year, Mr. Cox has been pushing interactive data as a way to change how companies communicate information to investors. Mr. Cox hopes to see some changes in six months, with the entire financial-reporting system overhauled within 18 months.

"It's the basic mission of the SEC to provide quality disclosure to investors. There are really only two ways we can improve SEC regulation," said Mr. Cox, in an interview. "One is by reducing the costs of regulation. The other is to improve the quality of the output. Interactive data let us do both," he said.

The SEC awarded Keane Federal Systems Inc., a McLean, Va., subsidiary of Keane Inc., a $48 million three-year contract to overhaul the Edgar system. The contract may be extended for an additional three years. Keane is expected to work with other technology companies on the project.

The SEC also announced separate contracts to Rivet Software and Wall Street on Demand to develop interactive tools that will be available free of charge on the SEC's Web site that allow users to view and analyze corporate financial reports prepared using extensible business reporting language, or XBRL.

To speed development of XBRL, a kind of computer language that "tags" pieces of data, Mr. Cox said the SEC has committed to spending $5.5 million to finish writing taxonomies that define data, so that firms in all industries can file their financial reports using XBRL. He predicts XBRL will cut down on errors and make it easier and less expensive for companies to file results to the SEC, and for SEC staffers to analyze them.

DOJ_NMG_0069365

The SEC's Edgar system, created in the 1980s, receives huge amounts of data each year, but Mr. Cox compared it to a low-tech electronic file cabinet. The SEC's upgrade will convert existing forms to an XBRL format, allowing the forms and information to be searched and downloaded into software applications.

It also will allow users to receive real-time streaming data using RSS feeds and other automated Web tools to receive the latest corporate data from newly-filed corporate reports.

The SEC has urged public companies to voluntarily file their quarterly and annual reports using XBRL, and Mr. Cox said he prefers to "use honey and not vinegar" to encourage broader use of the new data-tagging technology.

He didn't rule out mandating XBRL filing. "That's a decision we'll take down the road."

Write to Judith Burns at judith.burns@dowjones.com1 and Kara Scannell at kara.scannell@wsj.com2

Ousted CEOs At Viacom, Kraft Help Set Record For Departures (BLOOM)

By Jason Kelly

Bloomberg, September 26, 2006

Sept. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Chief executive officers are falling faster than ever this year. In just the first 12 days of September, leaders at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Ford Motor Co. and Viacom Inc. were deposed -- fueling the breakneck pace in which one CEO departs every six hours.

U.S. companies are on track to fire or lose a record 1,400 chiefs in 2006, up from 1,322 last year and 663 in 2004, says executive recruiting firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas Inc. in Chicago. From Sun Microsystems Inc. and Pfizer Inc. to Kraft Foods Inc. and RadioShack Corp., most types of firms have felt the rash of CEO departures.

Chiefs are being pushed out the door as directors abandon their laissez faire approach to governance following the prosecutions at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other companies. About 96 percent of companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index now have independent lead or presiding directors, up from 36 percent in 2003, says a survey by Spencer Stuart Inc., an executive search firm in Chicago.

``Boards are under a lot more pressure, and they're being hypervigilant," says Donald Hambrick, a management professor at Pennsylvania State University's Smeal College of Business in University Park. ``They are cleansing."

For a price. The average severance package for a departing CEO totaled about $16 million in the past three years, according to the Corporate Library, a governance watchdog group in Portland, Maine.

Trap-Door Treatment

At New York-based Bristol-Myers, a board with nine independent directors pushed out CEO Peter Dolan for botching a deal to keep a generic version of the drugmaker's top-selling heart pill, Plavix, off the market. Dolan, 50, served for five years, an eternity compared with other firings in 2006.

Sumner Redstone, chairman of New York-based Viacom, booted CEO Tom Freston after just eight months. Redstone told investors that Freston's failure to translate the MTV network's success to the Internet helped drive the stock down 7.6 percent during his tenure.

Philip Knight, chairman of Beaverton, Oregon-based Nike Inc., employed the same trap-door treatment on William Perez. Knight hired Perez, 59, to replace him as CEO and canned him one year later, in January.

Leaders don't get the deference once reserved for the likes of former General Electric Co. CEO Jack Welch, says John Challenger, head of Challenger, Gray & Christmas.

``The days where you learn from your mistakes, those days are over," Challenger says. ``The results have to be immediate, strong and consistent."

Mulally's Time

William Clay Ford Jr. failed to get those results after taking over the No. 2 U.S. carmaker in 2001. As global competitors such as Toyota Motor Corp. reduced Ford's market share every year since 1995, its chairman and chief executive set out to cut 30,000 jobs during the next six years.

With that plan sputtering, Ford, 49, handed the CEO job to Alan Mulally, a former executive vice president at Boeing Co., on Sept. 5. Two weeks later, the automaker said it would offer all hourly workers buyouts and finish the previously announced firings four years ahead of schedule.

Mulally, 61, more than doubled operating profit in two years by speeding production and slashing employment by more than half in Boeing's commercial airplane division. At Ford, the first outsider to run the company in 60 years doesn't have much time to show he's capable of a repeat performance.

Options Backdating

``The golden boys get more opportunity and more time, but he still only has about two or three years," says Allan Cohen, a professor who studies chief executives at Wellesley, Massachusetts-based Babson College.

DOJ_NMG_0069366

The year's biggest scandal -- the backdating of stock options -- has added to the executive upheaval. At least three chiefs -- including Comverse Technology Inc.'s Jacob Alexander, a fugitive charged with conspiracy to commit fraud by the U.S. Justice Department -- have quit or been fired because of option issues.

More executives will likely fall following the disclosure by 130 companies of federal or internal investigations into alleged changes in the dates of option grants to increase their value.

As Nortel Networks Corp. discovered, replacing a CEO may please shareholders without boosting a company's performance. After cleaning up an accounting scandal, Nortel named former Motorola Inc. President Mike Zafirovski as its new CEO in October 2005. The shares rose 5.4 percent on the day of the announcement, and the telecommunications equipment maker said the company was on solid footing.

Hurd's Scandal

Seven months later, Zafirovski, 52, said it may take five years to turn around the Brampton, Ontario-based firm. In June, he cut 1,100 jobs. The stock has plunged 25 percent in 2006.

Even leaders who turn around companies are vulnerable. Hewlett-Packard Co. chief Mark Hurd took over the struggling computer maker from CEO and Chairwoman Carly Fiorina last year. Hurd, 49, has taken market share from rival Dell Inc. and boosted the stock price 80 percent from the start of his tenure in April 2005.

``You're rewarded if you turn things around like Hurd," says Daniel Morgan, who helps manage $5.45 billion, including HP and Dell shares, at Synovus Investment Advisors in St. Petersburg, Florida.

Those rewards may be short-lived as the Hewlett-Packard spying scandal engulfs Hurd. The board on Sept. 22 removed Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who oversaw a probe in which private investigators spied on directors and reporters to stop media leaks.

Dell's Rollins

At a press conference on that day, Hurd revealed details of his involvement, saying he attended a meeting about the investigation and approved the sending of an e-mail from a fictitious employee to a reporter to identify the journalist's source.

The disclosures have worried investors. The shares have fallen 2.9 percent since Sept. 20, the day before the Washington Post reported that the company had understated Hurd's involvement.

Hurd, Dunn and two other Hewlett-Packard executives are set to testify before the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee in Washington on Sept. 28. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he has collected enough evidence to file criminal charges against officials and outside investigators.

Dell CEO Kevin Rollins is also on shaky ground. Rollins, 53, took charge of Round Rock, Texas-based Dell in 2004. This year, he's facing a stock price that's down 26 percent, plummeting profit and two federal accounting probes.

If Rollins doesn't improve Dell's performance soon, Morgan says, he may become yet another casualty in a year in which directors have given up on the idea of a second chance.

To contact the reporter on this story: Jason Kelly in Atlanta at jkelly14@bloomberg.net .

Regulating Risk (WP)

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

LAST WEEK it emerged that one Ferrari-driving 32-year-old lost $6 billion of investors' money in less than a month. But this spectacular trouble at Amaranth Advisors LLC, a medium-size hedge fund that specialized in energy trading, did not roil the financial markets or destabilize the banking system. Back in 1998, the loss of a similar fortune at another hedge fund, Long-Term Capital Management, triggered panicky intervention by regulators. This time the world barely hiccuped.

Amaranth's story illustrates both the danger and the safety of hedge funds. These unregulated investment shops can trade in just about anything -- there's one in Portugal that bets on the prospects of soccer players -- and they can magnify their risks by borrowing money. Not surprisingly, their bets can backfire: Last year 848 hedge funds were forced to close up shop, often imposing losses on investors. Because the funds' trading strategies are secret, and because their positions change quickly, regulators can't know when the next Amaranth will blow up.

But the Amaranth story also shows why this might not matter. The rich individuals who invest in these funds understand the risks and should not complain when they lose. Pension funds are also starting to put money into hedge funds, but this might actually reduce the overall volatility of their investments. The worry for regulators is that a huge loss at a hedge fund could not only wipe out investors' money but also leave the fund incapable of repaying bankers. If the banks lose too much, their ability to lend to other clients might suffer, damaging the economy. But in Amaranth's case the banks did not lend dangerous amounts. Hence no panic from the regulators.

Regulators deserve credit for pushing banks to limit their exposure to hedge funds. They are also right to push for improvements in the back offices that settle hedge fund trades; disputes about who sold what to whom could cause chaos in markets. But it's equally important to praise regulators for what they haven't regulated, since freewheeling hedge funds do a lot to stabilize the financial system. Because they can invest in anything and can bet on declines in prices as well as increases, hedge funds scour the world for illogically priced assets, and their buying or selling moves prices to a rational level. Hedge funds that believe markets are overvalued can slow the inflation of a dangerous bubble. Hedge funds that believe markets are undervalued can push prices up, reducing the cost of capital to firms. Mutual funds, which don't bet against the market and which mainly aim for average performance, contribute far less to this process of price discovery, which allocates the world's savings to the countries, companies and individuals who are likely to use it best.

DOJ_NMG_0069367

CRIMINAL LAW:

Video Maker Pleads Guilty (LAT)

By Claire Hoffman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

The case stems from the use of underage girls in soft-core 'Girls Gone Wild' footage. The judge imposes a $500,000 fine.

Joe Francis, the founder and chief executive of the "Girls Gone Wild" empire, pleaded guilty Monday to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws by failing to document the ages of young women in his racy videos.

The pleas in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles were the result of an agreement announced this month between Francis and the Justice Department after an investigation into whether his Santa Monica companies filmed minors.

Francis agreed to personally pay a $500,000 fine to settle charges that he failed to keep records of the ages and identities of the women who appeared in his soft-core sex videos. Francis earlier this month acknowledged that footage of minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct appeared in at least two DVDs he released.

Francis' Mantra Films Inc. pleaded guilty this month in Panama City, Fla., to 10 felony counts stemming from the same violations and agreed to pay $1.6 million in fines.

MRA Holdings Inc., another company owned by Francis, entered into a so-called deferred prosecution agreement under which the government would dismiss all charges if MRA abided by the accord for three years and hired an outside monitoring company.

The 33-year-old Francis spent about 30 minutes in the downtown Los Angeles courtroom. He stood before U.S. District Judge Margaret M. Morrow with his hands tucked in his pockets, shifting from foot to foot, responding briskly to the judge's questions.

But when Morrow asked Francis if he understood that, given the felonies he was admitting to, he could be sentenced to as many as 10 years in prison, he seemed surprised. "Um, I don't understand that," he said. His lawyer, Aaron S. Dyer, stepped forward, explaining to him that it was not the sentence he would be receiving because of the agreement, but the maximum sentence allowed for the felonies. Under the agreement he will serve no jail time.

Francis admitted that "Girls Gone Wild' videos such as "Totally Exposed Uncensored and Beyond," Volumes 1-12, failed to comply with federal laws requiring producers not only to maintain proof of age and identification for performers but also to carry labels on videos saying where those documents can be found.

Francis' attorneys have said that his companies tightened business practices before the Justice Department launched its investigation, which focused on violations with material filmed and distributed throughout 2002 and part of 2003.

After the arraignment, Dyer reiterated to reporters that the charges were for record-keeping violations, not the intentional sexual exploitation of children.

Dyer said that the underage girls who had appeared in the videos, which feature young women exposing their breasts and engaging in other sexual activities, had lied about their age to the company. "No 17-year-old will ever be allowed to lie to Mantra films to appear on camera again," he said.

Francis, standing beside him, wearing a dark pinstripe suit and a pink tie, said he was happy to put the incident behind him. "It's all over and no one went to jail," he said with a smile.

claire.hoffman@latimes.com

*

Times staff writer Charles Duhigg contributed to this report.

'Girls Gone Wild' CEO Pleads Guilty (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069368

LOS ANGELES (AP) - The founder of the company that produces the "Girls Gone Wild" videos of women appearing in sexual situations pleaded guilty Monday to charges of failing to document the ages of young women engaging in sexual acts in the videos.

As part of the plea deal, Joe Francis, 33, agreed to pay a $500,000 fine.

A judge will decide whether to accept or reject the deal at a sentencing hearing scheduled for Dec. 18.

Outside court, Francis told reporters he thought the chances are "pretty slim" that the judge would reject the deal.

"We are thrilled to have this stuff behind us," Francis said.

Francis' attorney, Aaron Dyer, said underage girls who had appeared in the videos had lied about their age to the company.

Francis' Santa Monica-based company, Mantra Films Inc., pleaded guilty earlier this month in U.S. District Court in Florida on similar charges. According to court papers, Mantra Films admitted to violating record keeping and labeling laws while producing and distributing the videos during all of 2002 and part of 2003.

A second company owned by Mantra's founder, MRA Holdings LLC, entered into a deferred agreement on charges of improper labeling.

Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines. It must also hire an outside company to monitor its records and production facilities to ensure compliance with federal law.

Separate state charges in Florida alleging that two 17-year-old girls were videotaped by a "Girls Gone Wild" cameraman in sexual situations remain pending against Francis and Mantra Films.

Magistrate Judge OKs Search Of Coca-Cola Theft Suspect's Home (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

ATLANTA -- A federal magistrate judge has recommended that a former Coca-Cola employee's request to throw out evidence seized from her in a trade secrets theft case be denied.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn Brill said in a report dated Thursday but not entered until Monday that investigators had sufficient probable cause to search Joya Williams' home, and therefore, evidence seized should not be suppressed.

The recommendation to deny Williams' motion goes to a federal district judge for a final decision.

Williams, Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney were indicted July 11 on a federal conspiracy charge that accuses them of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from Coke and trying to sell them to PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged crime was foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, the world's largest beverage maker. The three defendants have pleaded not guilty.

The prosecution says a box containing two undisclosed Coca-Cola product samples and other confidential company documents was found in Duhaney's home during a search on July 5, the day all three were arrested and the same day a $1.5 million transaction was to occur.

Coke has declined to say what product or products the samples relate to.

Williams, who has since been fired as an administrative assistant for Coke's global brand director at its Atlanta headquarters, allegedly took the information from the company and gave it to Dimson and Duhaney.

Williams' lawyer, Janice Singer, had filed a motion asking a judge to suppress evidence seized from her client's Norcross, Ga., home, alleging that FBI agents provided insufficient probable cause in obtaining a warrant to search the home.

An inventory of items seized from Williams' home shows agents removed Coca-Cola and Fanta documents and Coca-Cola memos and e-mail, among other things.

Judge Brill said the search was proper.

Daily Briefing (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 26, 2006

AUTOMOTIVE: Three-way alliance to be discussed

Carlos Ghosn, the head of Nissan and Renault, and General Motors CEO Richard Wagoner plan to hold talks this week in Paris as they assess the possibility of an alliance among the three automakers, Nissan said Monday.

Chrysler moves away from trucks

Detroit —- Chrysler is moving to become a company that's less reliant on trucks for profits and more competitive internationally with a portfolio of smaller cars, its top executive said Monday. Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group, said trucks and bigger sport utility vehicles historically have accounted for more than 70 percent of Chrysler's U.S. sales. So the company has been hit harder than any other manufacturer by the shift toward more fuel-efficient vehicles, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0069369

CORPORATIONS: Burns to run HR consulting firm

M. Michele Burns, the former Delta Air Lines and Mirant executive who got controversial perks from both Atlanta companies, has a new job: chairman and chief executive officer of Mercer Human Resource Consulting. She was named to the post Monday by Marsh & McLennan, which owns Mercer. Burns was hired by Marsh & McLennan in late 2005 as executive vice president and chief financial officer of the insurance and consulting giant. Burns, 48, will give up the CFO post at the parent to take the helm of the Mercer unit. Burns was Delta's CFO during the start of the financial slump that became a crisis in late 2001. She also was part of the Delta executive team that got hefty cash bonuses and protected pension trusts amid deepening losses, sparking a firestorm of criticism and prompting a top management overhaul. She left Delta in 2003 for Mirant and was chief financial officer during a Chapter 11 reorganization at the Atlanta energy company. She left after 20 months, having gotten at least $8.2 million in severance pay, salary, bonuses and other payments, according to reports at the time.

DEALS: VistaScape Security to be acquired

VistaScape Security Systems, an Atlanta provider of automated video analysis technology for use in security systems, is being acquired by Siemens Building Technologies for an undisclosed amount. VistaScape, which was founded in 1999, focuses on providing its clients with surveillance equipment, software intelligence and security applications to protect high-risk environments. The company will operate as a wholly owned subsidiary of Siemens Building Technologies.

Tender offer for Inco extended

Sao Paulo, Brazil —- The purchase of the world's second-largest nickel miner for $19 billion Canadian ($17 billion U.S.) by Brazil's CVRD seemed all but assured Monday as CVRD extended its tender offer for shares of Canada's Inco Ltd. With only regulatory approval pending to seal the deal, Companhia Vale do Rio Doce SA said it would give shareholders until Oct. 16 to tender their shares for $86 Canadian ($76.90 U.S.) each —- beyond the original Thursday deadline.

ECONOMY: New Orleans' job recovery slow

New Orleans —- A year after Hurricane Katrina devastated southeastern Louisiana, the state has 175,100 fewer jobs than it did before the storm, with virtually the entire toll coming from the New Orleans region, the state Labor Department reported Monday. Non-seasonally adjusted job figures for August did indicate something of a comeback in the statewide labor market, which was down more than 234,000 jobs for a time after Katrina hit on Aug. 29, 2005, followed by Hurricane Rita on Sept. 24.

FINANCE: Interest rates fall in Treasury auction

Interest rates on short-term Treasury bills fell in Monday's auction, with rates on six-month bills dropping to the lowest level since early May. The Treasury Department auctioned $18 billion in three-month bills at a discount rate of 4.770 percent, down from 4.815 percent last week. An additional $16 billion in six-month bills was auctioned at a discount rate of 4.810 percent, down from 4.920 percent last week. The three-month rate was the lowest since three-month bills averaged 4.710 percent on June 5. The six-month rate was the lowest since these bills averaged 4.780 percent on May 1.

FOOD / BEVERAGES: Ex-Coke employee likely to lose ruling

A federal magistrate judge has recommended that a former Coca-Cola employee's request to throw out evidence seized from her in a trade secrets theft case be denied. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn Brill said in a report dated Thursday but not entered until Monday that investigators had sufficient probable cause to search Joya Williams' home, and therefore, evidence seized should not be suppressed. The recommendation to deny Williams' motion goes to a federal district judge for a final decision.

MARKETS: SEC to upgrade data filing system

The Securities and Exchange Commission has awarded three contracts worth $54 million to maintain and upgrade EDGAR, its electronic filing system, the commission said Monday. The contracts will significantly change how companies and investors access EDGAR by transforming it from a static, text-based system to an interactive database with greater search capabilities, the SEC said in a written statement.

Hedge fund losses don't affect ICE

IntercontinentalExchange, an Atlanta-based online energy trading market best known by its trading symbol, ICE, said Monday its revenue has not been affected by losses of almost $6 billion by the Amaranth Advisors hedge fund. Those losses, announced last week, stemmed from the Greenwich, Conn., fund's investments in the natural gas market, where prices have plummeted. In a brief announcement, ICE said "Amaranth's business is not individually material to ICE's revenue. In addition, Amaranth's losses do not appear to have resulted in any disruption to the operation of the natural gas markets."

MEDIA: Mother-friendly benefits increase

Working Mother magazine released its annual list of the top 100 places to work, with its chief executive touting an improvement in mother-friendly benefits in corporate America. Working Mother CEO Carol Evans, who authored the book "This

DOJ_NMG_0069370

Is How We Do It: The Working Mothers' Manifesto," said that in order to retain female employees, a growing number of companies are offering customized schedules. The magazine used five main criteria as the basis for its judgments: flexibility, leave time for new parents, child care, elder care and the number of women occupying top jobs. The top 10 companies that best satisfied the five criteria were Abbott Laboratories; Bon Secours Richmond Health System; Ernst & Young LLP; HSBC USA Inc.; IBM Corp.; JPMorgan Chase & Co.; Patagonia Inc.; PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP; Principal Financial Group; and S.C. Johnson & Son Inc. Turner Broadcasting and Children's Healthcare of Atlanta joined Columbus insurer Aflac as the Georgia companies on the list.

RETAIL: Walgreen profit up, but stock falls

Chicago — Walgreen Co. posted 25 percent fourth-quarter earnings growth to cap its biggest-ever expansion year, but its stock tumbled on continuing investor concern about fallout for drugstore chains from Wal-Mart's plan to sell discounted generic drugs. The profit gain was fueled by an 18 percent increase in prescription drug sales from a year earlier and a 16 percent jump in total revenue.

SEC probe of Zale yields no charges

Dallas — Zale Corp., the nation's largest jewelry store operator, said a Securities and Exchange Commission inquiry into the company's accounting practices has ended without any penalties recommended. "Although we are clearly focused on the business at hand, we are pleased to put this matter behind us," Chief Executive Betsy Burton said in a statement.

TECHNOLOGY: Dell to hire 500 engineers in Texas

Austin, Texas — Computer maker Dell Inc. plans to hire another 500 engineers to work in its central Texas product development operations, founder and Chairman Michael Dell announced Monday. Dell joined Gov. Rick Perry at the Texas Capitol to announce that the company would immediately begin hiring new electrical, software and mechanical engineers and program managers.

Ex-chief defends Telecom Italia

Milan, Italy — Telecom Italia SpA's former chairman denied on Monday that the company was involved in a massive case of alleged illegal wiretapping and illicit data gathering involving an official at Italy's largest telephone company. An investigation into an alleged spy ring has led to the arrest of 20 people, including former Telecom Italia chief of security Giuliano Tavaroli and Emanuele Cipriani, head of a private investigation agency in Florence, Italy.

Yahoo to close final week of year

Yahoo Inc. plans to close its U.S. offices during the final week of the year, a cost-cutting measure that will require most of the Internet icon's 10,500 workers to use their vacation time if they want to be paid for the time off. It will mark the first time in Yahoo's 11-year history that its U.S. employees have been required to burn up vacation time during the week between Christmas and New Year's — a traditionally slow period for most businesses outside the retailing and hospitality industries.

World Gaming loses 2 from board

Internet gambling company World Gaming PLC said Monday that Chairman James H. Grossman and outside director Clare Roberts resigned from the company's board. World Gaming had announced earlier this month that it was in the early stage of talks with Sportingbet PLC about being taken over in a deal worth about 56 million pounds ($106.4 million).

UTILITIES / ENERGY: New Jersey utility picks next CEO

New Jersey utility executive Ralph Izzo was chosen Monday to head Public Service Enterprise Group Inc., parent company of the state's largest utility, when CEO E. James Ferland retires next year.

US Arrest Fears Spark Gambling Departures (FT)

By Roger Blitz, Leisure Industries Correspondent

Financial Times, September 26, 2006

A retired lawyer in the US who served under former US President George H.W. Bush resigned yesterday as chairman and director of an online gambling company, highlighting fears among executives in the sector that they face arrest by travelling to the US or other countries taking a tough line against gambling.

World Gaming, an Aim-listed company whose operations are almost entirely US-facing, announced the resignation of James Grossman, along with that of Clare Roberts, a fellow non-executive director, after a board meeting of the company, which has offices in Antigua, London and Vancouver.

Mr Grossman, 66, a former practising attorney, was a special representative for the United Nations Development Programme and was appointed by former President Bush in 1992 to the US Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

The resignations come at a critical time for the gaming industry, hit in the past two months by the arrest in the US and France of four senior executives and non-executives on various anti-gambling charges.

Senators are engaged in a struggle over a bill to tighten US laws against gambling.

DOJ_NMG_0069371

On Thursday, Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet, the UK-listed company with a US sportsbook, is due in New York for a hearing on whether he should be extradited to Louisiana to face charges of "gambling by computer". Although Mr Grossman is a US citizen and domiciled in the US, it is understood that he has not been living there for months. He had been World Gaming's chairman since 2003.

Like Mr Grossman, Mr Roberts has outside interests that require him to travel frequently to and from the US.

Mr Roberts, born and resident in the Caribbean, is a former attorney-general in Antigua and Barbuda and is president of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

Several online gambling companies have stressed to investors that their executives have either been advised not to make trips to the US or had no plans to do so.

But the arrest of Mr Dicks and the indictment issued by the US justice department in July against UK-listed Betonsports have raised fears in the sector that it may prove impossible to shield executives, non-executive directors or suppliers from anti-gambling legislation.

The resignations at World Gaming are not understood to be connected to continuing talks between the company andSportingBet over a takeover. Those talks, which stalled over the resignation of Mr Dicks, are said to be back on track.

In its last trading update in July, Daniel Moran, chief executive, warned that a change in sentiment by regulatory authorities or new legislation "may severely and adversely impact the business and financial position of online gaming companies" such as World Gaming.

Figure In Pellicano Case Acquitted On 4 Perjury Counts (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

The jury finds the former SBC worker not guilty on four counts of lying to a grand jury and deadlocks on a fifth.

In a setback for government prosecutors, a federal jury in Los Angeles on Monday acquitted a former SBC employee on four felony counts of lying about her contacts with a central figure in the wiretapping case against onetime Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano.

The eight-man, four-woman jury also told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that it was deadlocked on a fifth perjury count against Joann Wiggan of Burbank, who was fired in March after 34 years with the telephone company, now known as AT&T.

Wiggan had been charged with lying to a federal grand jury about her contacts with co-worker Ray Turner, who is awaiting trial with Pellicano for allegedly providing the Hollywood private eye with confidential telephone records used in wiretapping.

Wiggan was not charged with participation in the wiretapping conspiracy and denied any involvement in illegal conduct involving telephone company records.

"In all honesty, I always believed that if you are not guilty you will be found not guilty," Wiggan said later. "When you are in a situation and putting your life in the hands of 12 strangers, you don't know what will happen. But I never believed they would come back with guilty. I always believed I would be exonerated."

Her attorney, David R. Reed, celebrated outside the courtroom as a speechless federal prosecutor and several FBI agents looked on. He compared Wiggan's acquittal after seven hours of deliberation "to David beating Goliath."

"We had a soccer mom who withstood a tremendous amount of pressure [from the government] over this … and it took a jury to extricate her from this nightmare," Reed said.

The U.S. attorney's office released a statement from Daniel Saunders, the government's lead prosecutor.

"We are disappointed by the verdict, but of course we accept the jury's decision," he said, adding that the government would consider the evidence related to the unresolved count and decide in the next few days whether to proceed with the case.

In the statement, Saunders sought to distance Monday's courtroom loss from the larger Pellicano case.

"The charges against Ms. Wiggan are completely different from those contained in the separate indictment against Anthony Pellicano," Saunders said. "Today's verdict does not impact the prosecution or the ongoing investigation of Mr. Pellicano and his associates."

But with the same judge, prosecutors and agents involved in the pending Pellicano racketeering case, several legal observers saw the verdict Monday as a clear setback for the government.

By losing even a tangential prosecution, they said, the government could be hurt in its larger case because Monday's verdicts will embolden attorneys who represent Pellicano and six other defendants and could even affect the government's credibility with the court.

"The fact that you can't win in a peripheral case does not mean you won't win the main case," said Loyola Law School professor Laurie Levenson. "But it is not an auspicious beginning. And it tells the prosecution they better not be overconfident, that they are in for a fight."

DOJ_NMG_0069372

Unlike the two other former phone company employees who admitted helping Turner, Wiggan always insisted that she had not helped Turner and, in fact, had not spoken to him in years. That claim became the foundation of the government's accusations of perjury.

Throughout the four-day trial, Saunders and fellow prosecutor Kevin Lally built their case on a 23-page summary of phone calls that they said proved that Wiggan deliberately and repeatedly lied about her contacts with Turner.

The prosecutors charged that on three separate occasions last October and twice in February, Wiggan committed perjury by telling the grand jury that she had not spoken to Turner since December 2000 and had not retrieved any voice mail messages from him for several years.

Between late 1998 and late 2002, phone records showed, more than 1,000 calls were made from Wiggan's home, office and cell phones to her voice mail. The logs also showed 117 calls from Turner's home number to her office and other calls between phone numbers assigned to Turner and Wiggan.

But Wiggan and her attorney attributed her misstatements to the grand jury to forgetfulness or innocent oversights. Wiggan took the witness stand in her own defense, and Reed called her ex-husband and their oldest son as witnesses to testify that they had called Wiggan's office voice mail on numerous occasions.

In the end, it may have been the high threshold required for a perjury conviction — as much as the disputed evidence — that led to the jury acquitting Wiggan on four counts and being deadlocked 6 to 6 on the remaining count that she had never accessed one voice mail account during the entire time it was assigned to her.

In brief interviews after they were excused, two jurors said that although they and their fellow jurors believed that Wiggan may have misspoken during her grand jury testimony, the government failed to prove that the misstatements were "willful and deliberate," as the law demands.

"We did not see evidence of that," said jury foreman Stephen Cathey, a 31-year-old real estate agent from Lancaster. "We didn't believe [her grand jury testimony] was willfully dishonest."

*

greg.krikorian@latimes.com

Gotti Mom, Prosecutor Exchange Verbal Hits (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 26, 2006

The fur flew at the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti when his mother had sharp words for a woman prosecutor as the jury continued its deliberations.

As assistant U.S. attorney Miriam Rocah was exiting the well of the courtroom yesterday, Victoria Gotti, 65, widow of the late Gambino crime boss and mother of the defendant, stunned the quiet courtroom with a remark to the prosecutor.

"Who the hell do you think you are talking to?" said Victoria Gotti.

A startled Judge Shira Scheindlin overheard the outburst and had a warning for all spectators.

"I ask that you behave in my court room," said Scheindlin.

Gotti's television reality show star daughter Victoria, sister of the defendant, then told her mother to calm down and stay quiet.

Outside the courtroom, the elder Victoria Gotti explained that Rocah gave her a disrespectful remark in court that shocked her.

"'What the hell are you looking at?'" Rocah allegedly said, according to Victoria Gotti. Other spectators heard parts of Rocah's remarks, but not the entire comment.

"I wasn't even looking at her," said Gotti. "What makes her think she is so good-looking that I would look at her? I am not into women."

"Mrs. Gotti's version of events is inaccurate and we are not going to comment beyond that," said a spokeswoman for Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia. The spokeswoman declined to elaborate.

The angry flash occurred just after the jury, which finished its fifth full day of deliberations yesterday, asked for a clarification on the law.

Rocah, along with assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, has been prosecuting John A. Gotti, 42, in the third trial of his indictment for racketeering. The first two trials ended in mistrials. The defense contends that Gotti withdrew from mob life in July 1999, a date outside the statute of limitations.

After lunch yesterday, the jury sent out a note asking for clarification on two legal points. In one question the jury wanted to know the standard by which the government had to prove Gotti was part of the charged racketeering conspiracy. The jury also questioned whether Gotti had to prove that he left the Gambino crime family by July 21, 1999 or just the specific conspiracy charged in the indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0069373

Scheindlin answered that the government had the burden of proving "beyond a reasonable doubt" that Gotti was part of the conspiracy beyond the crucial 1999 date. She also said that Gotti didn't have to prove he left the crime family by that date, just that he opted out of the racketeering conspiracy. Scheindlin also noted that Gotti has a lower standard of proof to show that he withdrew from the conspiracy.

Rocah tried unsuccessfully to argue that the Gambino crime family was the enterprise in the conspiracy. Outside the courtroom, defense attorney Charles Carnesi noted that membership in a mob family is not by itself a crime.

3 With Mob Ties Busted In Roundup (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, September 26, 2006

Reputed mob boss Arthur Gianelli's bride and two alleged members of his crew were arrested yesterday in connection with a 520-count federal indictment charging their alleged criminal enterprise with illegal gambling, extortion and arson.

Mary Ann Gianelli, 49, an MIT nurse and the sister-in-law of convicted ex-FBI Agent John Connolly Jr., turned herself in to state and federal authorities after reputed loan shark Philip Puopolo was busted at the Revere Businessmen's Association by the state police Organized Crime Unit shortly after noon.

Authorities allege Puopolo, 50, operated illegal video poker machines at the social club.

According to a superseding indictment unsealed yesterday, Puopolo operated a sports betting office for Arthur Gianelli, 49, of Lynnfield and threatened witnesses to lie to a grand jury.

Gianelli's gang reportedly pays "rent" to the New England Mafia in order to stay in business.

Mary Ann Gianelli is charged with laundering the money brought in by her incarcerated husband's "illegal businesses" and of "knowingly" filing false federal income tax returns.

Also arrested yesterday at his home in Revere was Stephen "Moon" Russo, 48, who allegedly managed Puopolo's betting office. The Secretary of State's office lists Russo as the clerk of the Revere Businessmen's Association.

After appearances in U.S. District Court in Boston yesterday, Russo and Mary Ann Gianelli were released on $100,000 unsecured bonds. Puopolo was held pending a Sept. 27 detention hearing.

The Internal Revenue Service and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives assisted with yesterday's roundup.

New Charges, Defendants In Federal Racketeering Probe (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 26, 2006

BOSTON --A Lynnfield man who is also the brother-in-law of convicted former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. is facing additional charges in connection with a federal probe into a racketeering, gambling and extortion ring.

Arthur Gianelli, 49, was charged in an indictment unsealed Tuesday with arson to commit extortion and loansharking. Gianelli and three other men allegedly plotted to burn down a sports bar in an attempt to intimidate the owner into selling them another bar, federal prosecutors said.

Two previous federal indictments returned last year alleged that an offshore gambling ring operated by Gianelli, who is married to the sister of Connolly's wife, thrived because he paid the New England Mafia for protection. Prosecutors also allege the ring tried to bully bar owners into selling their establishments.

The new indictment also names four new defendants on racketeering and other charges. They are Gianelli's wife, Mary Ann Gianelli, 49, of Lynnfield, who also faces money laundering and income tax charges; Michael Pinialis, 48, of Costa Rica; Philip Puopolo, 50, of Revere, who also is charged with loansharking; and Stephen Russo, 25, of Revere.

Mary Ann Gianelli and Russo were released Tuesday on $100,000 bond, while Puopolo was detained pending a detention hearing on Sept. 27.

Mary Ann Gianelli is the sister of Elizabeth Connolly, wife of John J. Connolly Jr. Connolly was convicted in May 2002 of racketeering, obstruction of justice and lying to an FBI agent about his handling of criminal informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

A total of 13 people are charged in the gambling case. The new indictment dropped three defendants who have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing.

Man Charged With Sending Threats To Federal Judges In Tacoma (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069374

SEATTLE -- A man about to be released from state prison after serving several years for harassing a judge has been charged with sending a threatening letter to federal judges in Tacoma.

Charles Gary Felts, 64, had been scheduled to be released from Stafford Creek Corrections Center in Aberdeen over the weekend. Instead, he was charged with mailing threatening communications to U.S. Magistrate Judge J. Kelley Arnold and U.S. District Judge Ronald B. Leighton, in which he said "the people need to delcare marshal (sic) law ... and shoot any and all of you filth on sight or stench."

The letter was sent in June as part of a civil rights claim Felts is pursuing in federal court in Tacoma, aspects of which have come before the judges. Though his complaint is rambling, Felts appears to argue that he was improperly placed in segregated custody after a jail guard found a razor blade affixed to a toothbrush handle in his cell.

In charging papers made public Monday, FBI Special Agent Ryan Bruett said Felts admitted sending the letter, which was signed, "Sincerely, Charles Gary Felts."

Felts signed a statement saying he did not mean to threaten anyone, Bruett said. The letter was a "metaphor" designed to "wake them up and make them think," Felts wrote.

Felts, who also had a 1977 conviction for threatening a federal judge, had been in prison since 2000, when he was convicted in Pierce County Superior Court of intimidating a judge and harassment.

Lawmaker Asks Criminal Probe Of U.S. Reading Program (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, September 26, 2006

Sept. 25 (Bloomberg) -- A Democratic congressman called for a criminal investigation after an audit found that a $1 billion federal program to improve reading among grade-school children was run by staff who steered contracts to favored publishers.

The Education Department's inspector-general last week recommended an overhaul of the ``Reading First'' program, part of the ``No Child Left Behind'' law, including removing directors and reviewing the propriety of their contract awards.

``The inspector-general's report raises serious questions about whether Education Department officials violated criminal law, and those questions must be pursued by the Justice Department,'' said Representative George Miller of California, the top-ranking Democrat on the House Education Committee.

Miller, in his statement, called the audit part of pattern in which the Education Department under President George W. Bush ``has repeatedly run afoul of ethical standards.''

Miller's office also cited an independent analysis published last year by the Washington-based American Institutes for Research that found the program favored by Reading First directors, a product of the McGraw-Hill Companies Inc., was one of only two programs to receive AIR's highest rating.

Billion-Dollar Program

Reading First distributes about $1 billion a year to states to spend on reading programs that the government agrees have scientifically proven effectiveness.

The head of the program, Chris Doherty, resigned in advance of the release of the audit, and others involved also have left, Education Department spokeswoman Katherine McLane said.

The audit describes Doherty as a former executive director of the Baltimore Curriculum Project, which has implemented the McGraw-Hill product, known as ``Direct Instruction,'' or DI, in the Baltimore schools system since 1996.

Auditors said they reviewed the resumes of 25 people who served on the panels charged with evaluating eligible reading programs. Six of them had ``significant professional connections'' to DI, and Doherty ``personally nominated'' three of them, the audit said.

The audit cited examples such as Massachusetts, where Doherty questioned the quality of reading programs in four school districts, while state authorities approved them. One district refused to change and lost its federal funding; the other three agree to change and kept their funding, the audit said. None use the DI program, said Cheryl Liebling, director of Reading First in Massachusetts.

Liebling said she agreed with Doherty that the programs chosen by the four Massachusetts school districts were of lesser value to struggling readers.

`Highest Regard'

``There was nothing in our situation that would suggest any impropriety,'' Liebling said. ``I have the highest regard for Chris Doherty.''

Michael Petrilli, who helped the administration implement the No Child Left Behind law and now serves as vice president at the Thomas Fordham Foundation, a Washington-based research group, said he believes Education Secretary Margaret Spellings ``is hanging Chris Doherty out to dry.''

Both Petrilli and Liebling said they believe Spellings wanted Doherty to run the program strictly. Federal officials were justifiably rejecting reading programs that emphasize literary skills ahead of those stressing basic skills, which are more important to struggling readers, Liebling said.

Baltimore Program Cited

The report issued last November by the American Institutes for Research gave only DI and the Baltimore-based Success for All program its top rating, ``moderately strong evidence of positive effects,'' out of 22 popular comprehensive elementary school reform models. Miller's office cited the report to highlight Success for All as a quality alternative.

The counsel to the Education Department's inspector-general, Mary Mitchelson, said she could not comment on the findings. At Miller's urging, the inspector-general plans within coming weeks to publish five more reports on the Reading First program, including examinations of its operations in Wisconsin, Georgia and New York.

Education is a prime topic of concern for voters, and such allegations may have some effect on the Nov. 7 congressional elections, especially in states or districts where the incumbent already faces accusations of impropriety, said Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia.

``Reading this makes anyone angry, assuming it's true,'' Sabato said.

McLane today reiterated that Spellings supported Doherty's work and said he left voluntarily.

Spellings's Response

Miller cited investigations last year showing the department used taxpayer dollars to pay media commentators for friendly coverage, and an audit this year showing the department directed education grants to political allies rather than alternatives endorsed by career peer reviewers.

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Jaclyn Lesch, said she had no immediate reaction to Miller's request.

Spellings, in her response to last week's audit, defended the Reading First program as proven effective, while promising to make all changes recommended in the audit.

``I am deeply committed to the highest levels of integrity and ethics for the Department of Education and all its programs,'' Spelling said. Some department actions described in the report ``reflect individual mistakes,'' she said.

``Our reading programs have been successful in driving student achievement for decades, and that's why there are held in such high regard,'' McGraw-Hill spokeswoman Mary Skafidas said.

To contact the reporter on this story: Paul Basken in Washington at pbasken@bloomberg.net

Jury Indicts GUEA Directors, Adds Tax Charges (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

GARY, Ind. - A federal grand jury indicted two former directors of the Gary Urban Enterprise Association and issued new tax charges against the group's previously indicted former executive director and former fiscal manager, federal prosecutors said Monday.

Former directors Johnnie Wright, 76, and Derrick Earls, 51, both of Gary, have been charged with 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of conspiracy and one count of federal program theft, the Justice Department said in a news release.

Former Director Jojuana Meeks and the group's former fiscal manager, Charmaine Pratchett, were indicted on identical charges in June, accused of embezzling more than $800,000 to pay for cars, trips and funeral expenses.

Wright and Earls were expected to surrender Tuesday, when they are due to have their initial hearings on the charges, said Mary Hatton, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Joseph Van Bokkelen.

Telephone calls to Wright's home went unanswered Monday. Earls does not have a published home telephone number.

The two served as directors from 1999 to 2004 for the group, which was created to attract new investment to the Gary area.

A superseding indictment in the case also charged Meeks with four counts of tax evasion for not filing tax returns for the years 2000 to 2004. It charged Pratchett with four counts of filing false tax returns for the same years.

The indictment said the group's board dissolved itself and no longer reviewed the group's activities, allowing Meeks, Pratchett, Wright and Earls to embezzle funds.

It cited instances in which Wright stole $95,920 and used the money for a variety of personal expenses and in which Earls stole $66,710, using some of the money to pay for a relative to attend modeling school.

Jurors Won't Hear About Bus Blaze (HC)

By James Pinkerton

Houston Chronicle, September 26, 2006

Judge approves defense motion to limit testimony to allegations of mismanagement

MCALLEN - Jurors today will hear about maintenance and safety practices of charter bus company Global Limo Inc. but not about the bus fire that killed 23 nursing home residents evacuated from Houston last year as Hurricane Rita bore down.

U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa granted a defense motion to limit testimony to alleged mismanagement that occurred during a four-month period before last year's accident.

James H. Maples, president and director of Pharr-based Global, faces charges he falsified driver time records and failed to adequately inspect and maintain his fleet of buses. The company was shut down for safety violations two weeks after the September 2005 accident.

Lawyers for Maples, a 67-year-old retired NFL player, have said that he looks forward to clearing his name.

An eight-woman, four-man jury was selected late Monday after two hours of questioning.

"I believe it's going to a fair and impartial jury," said defense attorney Charles Banker.

During jury selection, Justice Department prosecutors informed the court they plan to call Juan Robles Gutierrez, an undocumented immigrant from Monterrey who was driving the bus when the fire erupted near Dallas. His family has said Robles did all he could to stop the fire, but oxygen bottles needed by many elderly nursing home residents exploded as the fire spread from a rear wheel well.

Based on the judge's statements Monday, it appears testimony from Robles will be limited to his experiences with the company before the accident.

Robles was arrested on an immigration charge — unlawful entry to the U.S. — shortly after the accident, but he has been allowed to remain in Texas to testify.

Maples is accused of conspiring to falsify driver time records. If convicted, he could receive up to five years in prison on that charge alone.

The three-count indictment alleged that Global falsely recorded its drivers as "off-duty" when they were actually riding as passengers, a violation of Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration regulations.

After the jury was excused Monday, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Kinchen of Houston received permission from the judge to introduce documents Maples signed in 2002 and 2004 acknowledging federal bus safety standards and agreeing to comply with them.

In May, victims of the bus fire reached a $11 million settlement with Global and BusBank, the Chicago travel broker that hired the bus company. At the time of the Sept. 23 fire, Global Limo had filed for bankruptcy.

Drug Lord's Sister Charged With Lying About 1996 Murder (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, September 26, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — The sister of admitted drug lord Frankie Estrada is under arrest and indictment for lying to the federal grand jury investigating the 1996 murder of a local prostitute.

Frances Estrada, 44, was arrested recently in Greenville, N.C., where she now lives. Federal marshals on Monday brought her into U.S. Magistrate Judge William I. Garfinkel's courtroom, where she pleaded not guilty to four perjury charges — each carrying a maximum five-year prison term.

At the request of Assistant U.S. Attorney Karen Peck, Garfinkel ordered Estrada detained without bond pending a hearing Wednesday.

The indictment alleges that Estrada committed perjury while appearing before a federal grand jury in New Haven on May 10, 2005. At the time, the grand jury was investigating the Jan. 30, 1996, murder of Aida Escalara.

The indictment accuses Frances Estrada of lying to the grand jury when she denied knowing Escalara or seeing her on the night of the murder.

It further alleges she lied while denying knowing Eddie Mercado and Billie "The Kid" Gomez, Escalara's convicted murderers.

Finally, the indictment accuses Frances Estrada of lying by telling the grand jury that her daughter, Star, was not living with her at the time of the murder.

During Mercado's trial last fall, there was testimony that Frances Estrada was having a lesbian affair with Escalara, that she knew Gomez and Mercado, and even brought the prostitute to the P.T. Barnum Housing project shortly before the murder.

There also was testimony that Frances Estrada was living in a Poplar Street rooming house with her daughter around the time of the murder.

On several occasions during previous trials, her brother, Frank Estrada, who is cooperating with federal authorities, testified that he ordered Mercado and Gomez, two of his enforcers, to kill Escalara as a favor for his attorney, James Ruane Sr. Frank Estrada, Gomez and Mercado all have convictions stemming from the woman's murder and are serving federal prison terms.

Advertisement

Ruane, through his lawyers H. James Pickerstein and Joseph Martini, has repeatedly denied any involvement in the murder. He has never been charged with any crime.

However, Frank Estrada testified, most recently on Nov. 29, 2005, during Mercado's trial, that his sister Frances shot a man, Ralph Green, to death during an argument in a Poplar Street rooming house on Jan. 23, 1996.

After police came looking for his sister and her daughter to question them about Green's death, Frank Estrada said he called Ruane to represent his sister. Estrada claimed Ruane then told him he was busy preparing for a murder trial in which Escalara was to testify for the state.

"I wanted him to take care of my sister Frances' murder case," Frank Estrada testified in court. "He told me if I take care of Aida Escalara he would take care of Frances' case."

Mercado, testifying on his own behalf last November, claimed Frank Estrada, and not Frances Estrada, killed Green. Mercado also maintained he turned down Frank Estrada's order to kill Escalara.

Delivering Small-Town Justice With A Mix Of Trial And Error (NYT)

By William Glaberson

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

DUANE, N.Y. — Gary Betters thought he understood the law as well as any average American. A school psychologist, he wanted $1,588.60 he said the nearby village of Malone owed him for helping run a summer recreation program. When he brought a small claim in Duane Town Court, he expected that the judge would listen to both sides, then rule.

Like many others who go to court across New York State, he got a crash course in the strange ways of small-town justice.

Although no one showed up to defend the village, Justice William J. Gori started the trial anyway. Although the judge had Mr. Betters testify at length, he neglected to have him swear to tell the truth. And although Justice Gori told Mr. Betters he had another week to submit more evidence, the judge went ahead and decided the case anyway.

Mr. Betters received the news in a letter from the court: his case had been dismissed. No reason was given. “I cannot understand how a defendant can win when they don’t even show up,” he said in an interview.

The State Commission on Judicial Conduct figured out how. Justice Gori, it seems, had gone to the village offices in Malone before the trial, interviewed the village’s chief witness, then informed the village lawyer that he had decided to throw out the case.

Justice Gori told the commission that he had never heard of the elementary legal rule that bars a judge, except in the most extraordinary circumstances, from secret contact with one side of a case. “It’s not even explained in my manual,” he said.

An unfamiliarity with basic legal principles is remarkably common in what are known as the justice courts, legacies of the Colonial era that survive in more than 1,000 New York towns and villages.

For generations, justices have hailed them as “poor man’s courts,” where ordinary people can get simple justice with little formality or expense. But there are few more vivid spots to view their shortcomings than here in one of New York’s poorest corners: Franklin County, a place of rugged beauty on the Canadian border where only one of the 32 local justices is a lawyer.

The county’s justices have repeatedly drawn the attention of state judicial conduct officials, with 15 publicly disciplined since the late 1970’s, some twice. Justice Gori’s errors pale in comparison with those of some others: One justice freed a rape suspect on bail as a favor to a friend. Another sentenced a welfare recipient to 89 days in jail after she failed to pay a $1.50 cab fare. Franklin County justices have presided drunk, fixed cases and denied lawyers to defendants. One failed to appoint a lawyer for a 19-year-old mentally retarded alcoholic.

Here in Duane, a speck of a town in the center of the county, Justice Gori is in many ways a typical small-town New York justice.

A bricklayer and a former dog trainer with a high school education, he is an approachable man of 59, in jeans hitched up with suspenders. On Thursday nights he ambles down to the volunteer firehouse to hold court, such as it is. His grasp of the law is somewhat shaky. His temper sometimes gets the better of him.

He has no judge’s bench, few law books and no court clerk. He is something of an accidental judge, occupying the position for nearly a decade largely because no one else wants it, people here say. Although state officials have reprimanded him twice for fundamental lapses in the conduct of his job, few Duane voters seemed to know or care. “Nobody’s ever asked a question about it,” Justice Gori said.

He seems well-intentioned enough. Like many justices, he describes his job as public service, and he says he studies the law for several hours every week.

DOJ_NMG_0069378

But there is evidence that that may not be enough. When the judicial conduct commission called Justice Gori to account for his handling of Mr. Betters's case, his defense was startling, a transcript of the hearing shows. His own lawyer blamed the state for running the justice courts as it does: Judges, he said, with so little training — six days of classes, and a 12-hour refresher course once a year — could not possibly know the basic rules for handling a lawsuit.

The county's district attorney, Derek P. Champagne, says that when he took office five years ago, he had to drop hundreds of criminal cases because justices had failed to take any action for so long. Mr. Champagne says his staff of four full-time prosecutors is too small even to regularly visit the justice courts, which are separated by great distances.

Franklin County is bigger than Rhode Island. But it has only one higher court judge, in the county court in Malone. So the part-time town and village justices — plumbers, meat cutters and school bus drivers — are often the last word on the law here, with the power to issue search warrants, conduct trials, put some people in jail and let friends go free.

"The reality is, you basically have to have no qualifications other than be a voter to put someone in jail, and that's a very alarming situation," Mr. Champagne said. "To throw a layperson — some of whom don't have a high school degree — in that position is just a recipe for disaster."

A Night in Court

"Town of Duane Justice Court is now in session," Justice Gori announced.

Four bare fluorescent bulbs provided the only light in the roughly finished meeting room that becomes a court every few weeks. There was a portable bar against one wall, and a glimpse of the firehouse kitchen, with its jumble of old soda bottles and coffeepots. The American flag tacked to the wall had to be pulled back to allow the judge to get at the thermostat on this icy winter night.

At two pushed-together folding tables sat a nervous teenager, in court to answer speeding tickets, next to his clench-jawed father. A state trooper, there as chief witness against the teenager, doubled as the court security officer.

And behind a battered wooden desk was Justice Gori. Fleshy, with eyes that water at sentimental moments, he was wearing an open brown shirt, his T-shirt visible at the neck.

The court computer that he bought with his own money was at home; it took him two months to figure out how to turn the thing on, he said. He had no judge's robe. They are too expensive, he said. His judicial salary is $3,750 a year.

"There are certain things that are lacking," he said.

He moved to Duane, population 159, from Saratoga County in his 40's after a divorce, enticed by the chance to hunt with his dogs.

"Maybe it's the solitude," said Justice Gori, who has since remarried. "You get up here at night, when the highway quiets down, you don't hear anything."

Yet people cross paths in Franklin County in unlikely and sometimes volatile ways: Mohawk Indians, the owners of lavish new vacation homes, Adirondack tourists and fishermen, and others who cross the border on less savory business. Drugs and domestic violence seem to be on the rise, and state prisons are big employers.

When Justice Gori moved here about 20 years ago, the prison construction boom offered jobs. After years as a dog trainer, "I picked up my tools and went back to the bricklaying, mason trade," he said.

Like a lot of newcomers to small towns, he wanted to get involved. But he didn't like the sight of blood, so that ruled out volunteer firefighting. He was attracted instead to the court in the weathered firehouse. "Law has always been kind of an interesting thing to me," he said.

That interest, however, does not include a fascination with the technicalities that occupy lawyers. "If you look at the laws, it's all common sense," he said.

Most of his work, since his first election in 1997, has been traffic cases. If there were many serious crimes in Duane, he said, they may have gone unnoticed out in the vast Adirondack nights. "Either we're a nice, quiet town or two people duked it out and one won and one lost, they got up and shook hands and nobody knows about it," he said.

There have been a handful of serious cases, the first phases of some felony prosecutions. Once, state troopers tracked him down on a bricklaying job. They said a local man was growing marijuana, and wanted a warrant to search his property. In the dust and cement, it fell to William Gori, dog trainer and mason, to put aside his tools and measure the rights guaranteed under the Constitution. "I sat down," he said. "Read everything. Looked at all the pictures." The troopers got their warrant.

In the makeshift courtroom on this winter night, he was warmly sympathetic to a woman who had forgotten to put the registration sticker on her windshield. Case dismissed.

But the teenager with the speeding tickets saw the stern Justice Gori. The boy had tickets in a half-dozen Franklin County towns, and his lawyer proposed combining the cases in another court.

No way. "What happens in the town of Duane," Justice Gori declared, "stays in the town of Duane."

DOJ_NMG_0069379

That is not always true. The other case that drew the attention of the Commission on Judicial Conduct involved Lucille K. Millett, a Mohawk woman from the reservation that straddles the county's border with Canada. She was outside the Duane court one night in 2004 waiting for her sister, whom she had driven there for a traffic case. Justice Gori summoned Ms. Millett inside, asked for her driver's license and called the state police to run it through their computer.

In an interview, Ms. Millett said she was frightened and embarrassed; no one else was asked for a license. The only sense the sisters could make of it, she said, was that they were the only American Indians in court.

She filed a complaint with the commission, which ruled last year that Justice Gori had no right to demand anything of someone outside his court who faced no charges.

Asked about the case, Justice Gori denied that he harbored any prejudice. He said he thought he was acting within his authority.

"You learn by mistakes," he said. "They say this is improper, I don't do it again."

It is a measure of his isolation that his disciplinary hearings have been among the few times he has had a chance to rub shoulders with the larger legal world. He attends the refresher course each year. But he said the town could not afford to send him to the annual state magistrates' convention, held last year in Niagara Falls, nor could he pay for the trip himself.

Still, he is convinced that he and the other justices across New York are honest people trying to do right. "Economicswise," he added, "you couldn't get the job done any cheaper."

A County at the Edges

The troubles of Mr. Gori and his fellow justices are nothing new. In 1973, the State Commission of Investigation arrived in the Franklin County village of Saranac Lake to examine the work of one justice, a maintenance worker and vacuum-cleaner salesman, whose "inept and mangled handling," it said, had bungled a felony grand larceny case.

What investigators found alarmed them. Money was missing. Records were sloppy. A pile of cash from fines sat in an unlocked drawer. The justice's relationship with the police seemed far too close, and one of his law books was 44 years old.

Astonished, the investigators widened their inquiry to include all the justice courts in the county and then expanded it across New York. Calling for statewide reform, they concluded that "such deficiencies and ineptitude" in the justice courts "simply must not be tolerated."

But little seems to have changed in Franklin County's justice courts since then.

Last November, one longtime village justice, Roy H. Kristoffersen, a salesman, resigned after officials began investigating charges, which he denied, that he "rendered favorable dispositions" for the son of the other village justice — in Saranac Lake, the same place that touched off the investigation 33 years ago.

Another justice, Marie A. Cook, a school-bus driver who is still on the town bench in Chateaugay, not only fixed a speeding ticket at the request of a fellow justice, but she was so oblivious to ethical rules, the commission said last fall, that she made an official record of the fix: "Reduced in the interest of Justice Danny LaClair."

Yet another, the town justice who released a rape suspect on bail as a favor to a friend, tried to explain things to the commission: "Maybe you are not familiar with what goes on in the North Country, but we are all more or less friends up there."

Such cases may only hint at the dimensions of the problem in Franklin's courts. A review for this article of rarely seen appeals files in Franklin County Court showed a disturbing trail of legal blunders and judicial ignorance over the last five years.

One justice seemed not to fully understand that criminal charges must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, wrote the county court judge, Robert G. Main Jr. Another justice skipped over the matter of the constitutional guarantee of a lawyer. Immediately after a woman charged with fraud said she could not afford an attorney, Judge Main said, the village justice took her guilty plea instead of appointing a lawyer.

Such problems are hardly news to many lawyers who make the rounds of Franklin County's justice courts. Some say they avoid the courts because the justices often have trouble following their arguments.

In a place as poor and remote as Franklin County, the failings of modest courts can loom large. Cases too minor to draw much interest from the rest of the legal system — evictions, misdemeanor charges, disputes between neighbors, driving infractions and applications for bail — come with real consequences for small-town residents who may have little money or access to a lawyer.

Alexander Lesyk, the Franklin County public defender for 15 years until a few months ago, said that while he had some successes for poor clients before local justices, "I don't believe any of them has enough training to handle a trial, to handle constitutional issues, to stand up to and control an attorney on either side when they need to."

But challenging a justice can be bad for business, some lawyers said.

The district attorney, Mr. Champagne, said that when his office hears about justices who stray from the law, it has to be careful. "We're not going to get into a confrontation with a judge we may have to go in front of next week on a very serious preliminary hearing in a murder case," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0069380

A Case of Confusion

When Gary Betters got the letter from Justice Gori in March 1999 saying that his claim for back pay had been dismissed, he was very confused. The message was a single paragraph, and garbled at that. Even the date on it was wrong.

But that was only the start of his troubles.

He wrote to Justice Gori, asking for a mistrial. The justice never replied.

Mr. Betters decided to appeal in county court. But he could not persuade any lawyer to take the case; several, he said, told him it would not be in their interest to take on a town justice.

On his own, Mr. Betters filed a complaint with the Commission on Judicial Conduct, and the truth emerged: The commission's investigators discovered that Justice Gori had gone to the Malone village offices before the trial and interviewed the defense's chief witness, the village treasurer, who told him that Mr. Betters was owed nothing.

Justice Gori told the village attorney that he need not show up for the trial because he had already decided to dismiss the case. The attorney was amazed. "A lot of bells and whistles went off," he told the commission.

But when Justice Gori explained himself to the commission in a closed hearing, he said he had never heard of the rule against contacting one side of a case to discuss the evidence. Further, the commission's lawyer argued, a legal motion filed by the village had completely bewildered Justice Gori, even after he made several calls to the state's help line for town justices.

"The whole concept I didn't understand," Justice Gori testified.

It was a damaging admission, but nothing compared with the case made by his own lawyer, John A. Piasecki. He said his client's error-riddled handling of Mr. Betters's suit was an indictment of the system, which put laymen on the bench, gave them little training and left them to interpret the law.

Mr. Piasecki asked whether the state had ever checked Justice Gori's reading comprehension. (It had not.) He even tried to cross-examine the Malone village attorney to show what he argued was the obvious difference between Justice Gori and someone who actually understood the law.

Mr. Piasecki, a Franklin County lawyer himself, urged a "long-overdue correction" for the justice court system, which he said "undermines confidence in the integrity of the judiciary."

The commission was not moved. Justice Gori, it said, had a duty to learn the law. "Town justices wield enormous power in civil and criminal cases," the commission said, "and it is not unreasonable to expect them to know and follow basic statutory procedures."

Yet Justice Gori received the lightest public penalty the commission can issue, an admonition.

As for Mr. Betters, he never found a lawyer to take his appeal. Today, he still feels that his education in Franklin County law cost him a lot more than $1,588.60.

"It broke down my belief in the justice system," he said.

Business as Usual

The judicial career of William Gori began humbly enough.

"Nobody was jumping out of the woodwork wanting this job," said Justice Gori, who raised his hand for the position in 1997 after the sitting justice announced his retirement.

With no opposition, he won the endorsement of the Republicans and then the Democrats in Duane. The Republican chairwoman, Pamela M. LeMieux, said he impressed party leaders as responsible and "very strict."

In the general election, his only opponent was Gary Anderson, a former accountant who ran as the candidate of what he named the Pine Tree Party. "Nobody wants the job," Mr. Anderson said.

Even the campaign was not especially interesting, Justice Gori recalled. "All I said was: 'I'm Bill Gori. I'm running for town justice and I'm only interested in doing a good job for the town.' " He won, 64 to 39.

If the process was not a model of meticulous judicial selection, that fact may carry an extra punch in Duane. The town, as it happens, was named for its founders, descendants of the first federal judge in New York.

When President George Washington selected the judge, James Duane, a prominent lawyer, for the post in 1789, he used the nomination to lay out his aspirations for selecting judges in a democracy. The choice of who would sit on a nation's courts was a matter of "the first magnitude," Washington wrote, and the judiciary was "the pillar on which our political fabric must rest."

Today, that fabric is a little frayed in Franklin County.

Thomas Catillaz, a former mayor of Saranac Lake, said that when political parties there find a nominee, "It's usually, 'Thank God somebody's running,' " he said. "And if you're in there, you're in there for 20 years."

When justices are publicly disciplined, that is often the end of the matter. As Justice Gori recalls it, when he received his second admonition last year, the local newspaper in Malone "put it way in the back."

DOJ_NMG_0069381

He faced an election after each ruling, but no opponent. Gary Cring, a retired schoolteacher who has lived in Duane for six years, said he had not heard that Justice Gori had been disciplined. Had that been better known, he said, voters might have been less enthusiastic about re-electing him. “People figure he must be doing a good job,” Mr. Cring said.

But Mrs. LeMieux, the Republican chairwoman, said it was not the town’s job to police its justice. “If he did something that was that serious, I figure the court system wouldn’t have allowed him to remain a justice,” she said. “If they didn’t throw him out, then who are we to judge?”

And so Justice Gori is working his way through a third four-year term, learning the job as he goes. He does not appear to share his lawyer’s disdain for how the justice courts are run.

“I really feel the justice courts are the courts closest to the people,” he said, and being a lawyer might interfere with that. “At times, lawyers get hung up in certain things, so that maybe you wouldn’t get true justice in certain cases.”

But a state police report from last year suggested that in Duane, true justice — and empathy for the people — might be works in progress.

It seems that Brandon L. Lucas, a scrawny 19-year-old from the next county, was trying to pay a ticket he had received in Duane for fishing with the wrong kind of bait. Since the firehouse court was empty, as it often is, Mr. Lucas went down the road to Justice Gori’s house.

Soon, Mr. Lucas was in the back of a state trooper’s car in handcuffs, and in tears. An angry Justice Gori had berated him and called the police, the young man recalled when a reporter tracked him down. He had evidently not seen the sign on the judge’s garage: “If you proceed past this point, you are subject to various trespass rules and regulations.”

The district attorney decided not to prosecute. And Mr. Lucas made his own decision about wandering into the jurisdiction of Duane Town Court: Don’t.

“I’ll never go fishing up there again,” he said.

Officers Reach Beyond Beat's Boundaries (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Northern Ohio is a long way from Northern Virginia, and it is especially off the beat for John Chapman, a police officer in the tiny Prince William County town of Dumfries.

Yet Northern Ohio -- a small town called Monroeville, to be precise -- is exactly where Chapman needed to go on a case a few weeks ago. Problem was, his bosses couldn't afford to send him there.

Chapman had just started a unit to use the Internet to investigate crimes against children. In fact, he was the unit, working on his days off or grabbing time between police calls to enter chat rooms, where he posed as a 13-year-old boy. Before long, he had struck up a conversation with an Ohio man, who sent him lots of nude photographs of young boys. It was time to make an arrest.

But the Dumfries Police Department, with just 15 officers including the chief, doesn't have its own dispatcher, much less an extensive travel budget. So Chapman finagled $150 in gas money from the town, and he and his partner, Detective Charlie Gardiner, climbed into Gardiner's red pickup and made the 400-mile trip through the night to Ohio. To save money, they stayed with Gardiner's parents and mooched food off local police.

"I was going to do everything in my power to catch this guy," said Chapman, 41. "If that meant spending my own money, so be it."

To call Dumfries small in the world of law enforcement would be an understatement. A town of 1.6 square miles and about 5,000 people, Dumfries straddles Route 1, about 30 miles south of Washington. The police department is in a tiny, almost ramshackle office in the basement of Town Hall.

Someone hoping to find it must drive to the parking lot in the back of the building, where the police entrance has cracked white paint around the door.

Around town, the chief, Calvin L. Johnson, is known by his first name. His 14 officers handle the usual traffic crashes, fights and domestic violence calls, but anything more serious -- homicides, robberies -- is sent to Prince William police. County police also investigate all sex crimes.

Chapman vowed to change that.

A burly man with speckled gray hair and an easy smile, he has two loves in life: police work and kids.

"I love working with kids," Chapman said in a recent interview. "I'm the type of person who, if I'm driving down the street and I see a lemonade stand, I'll buy the lemonade. If kids come to the door selling candy bars, I'll buy 20. It drives my wife nuts."

Chapman and his wife, Susan, have three children, ages 3 to 12. He manages his older daughter's soccer team, speaks at school career days and, in his spare time, helps train foster parents in Stafford County, where he lives.

DOJ_NMG_0069382

Chapman started his career with the Arlington County Sheriff's Office, then worked for the Dumfries Police Department in the early 1990s before joining Prince William police in 1992. But he missed the small-town environment of Dumfries and came back in April.

So, with support from the chief, he attended a one-week training course run by the Northern Virginia/Washington, D.C. Internet Crimes Against Children task force, which helps local police fight Internet predators.

When he returned in July, he told the chief he'd work part time and come in on his days off. All he needed was a laptop.

"We thought it was a great idea," Johnson said. "We know that the biggest wave of the next horizon of crime is Internet crime, but as a small department, we can't designate someone to do this full time."

Chapman was issued a blue Toshiba laptop, and he set up shop on his desk in the corner of the squad room, known as "the bullpen." In July, he went online, posing first as a 14-year-old girl. He was inundated with propositions from older men.

Sometimes, Chapman has to leave in mid-chat. "If I'm on the computer and a call comes in, we're going to shut the computer down and take care of business," he said. "I'll say, 'I gotta go,' and then hopefully I can find the person online again."

Chapman met one man in a Pokemon chat room who said he was 20 and from Ohio. Soon, Chapman said, the man sent him photographs of nude boys in various sexual poses. The man gave Chapman the password to his Hotmail account, where Chapman said he found more than 200 additional child porn images.

The man also gave Chapman his name and sent a picture of himself in his high school graduation gown. "It had an eagle on the back, and I could barely make out the letters 'ville,' " said Chapman, who quickly discovered the suspect lived in Monroeville.

It was time to go to Ohio. But when Chapman was told that his department couldn't send him, he turned to the Prince William Commonwealth's Attorney's Office.

"We don't have any independent funds for investigations like that," recalled Tom Seaha, a prosecutor who had been tracking Chapman's investigation and said he was sorry he couldn't help. Seaha said he admired Chapman's enthusiasm, but he urged him to turn over the case to Ohio authorities.

"I gave up. But they found a way to go," Seaha said of Chapman and Gardiner. "When everyone told them there was no money, they found a way to go."

Legally, Chapman didn't have to go to Ohio. But he felt a need to eyeball the suspect in the case he had begun. Plus, he said, going might enable him to collect evidence for his investigation of the suspect in Virginia.

The benefactor, of sorts, turned out to be the Dumfries town manager, Dave Whitlow, who responded to the police chief's pleas for help with $150 from the town coffers for gas and tolls.

Driving in the pickup that his partner uses for gang cases, Chapman and Gardiner left at 3 a.m. on Aug. 29. They drove seven hours straight, their only food a bag of chocolate chip and oatmeal raisin cookies that Gardiner's wife made.

Arriving in Monroeville at 10 a.m., Chapman and Gardiner spent the day with Ohio sheriff's investigators typing up an affidavit and getting a search warrant. "It was necessary for them to come here," said Detective Sgt. Dane Howard of the Huron County Sheriff's Office. "I would have been hard-pressed to draft a search warrant on the statements of an officer I had never met."

Ohio officers treated their Northern Virginia colleagues to lunch, and Chapman and Gardiner then drove an hour and 40 minutes that afternoon to Gardiner's parents' home in Concord, Ohio. They put them up in a spare bedroom and cooked them dinner.

Gardiner, 42, said Ohio officers had offered to put them up for the night if his parents hadn't come through. "Yeah, we work on a shoestring budget," Gardiner said, "but I think you'll find that law enforcement helps law enforcement, no matter where you're at."

Their creative financing might have paid off. With help from Ohio sheriff's deputies, they arrested a man, Matthew Hohler, on charges including raping a 12-year-old boy. Prince William and the FBI are investigating the case, said law enforcement sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is ongoing.

An attorney for Hohler, 20, said his client will enter a plea of not guilty. "At this point, I don't know what the allegations are other than the bare-bones charges," said the attorney, K. Ronald Bailey. "I did hear something to the effect that it had something to do with a contact down in Virginia."

At a time when attention is focused on the growing sexual exploitation of children through the Internet, law enforcement officials said Chapman and his partner went above and beyond the call of duty.

"Those officers . . . who were willing to give up their personal time and money just to make this case, that's a big thing," said Howard of the Huron sheriff's office. "Cops are dedicated, but I don't know that every officer would have done what they did."

The total out-of-pocket expense for the trip: about $20 apiece for Chapman and Gardiner.

DOJ_NMG_0069383

These days, Chapman is back on his laptop, balancing three active child porn investigations with the demands of patrol and police work. He is determined to soldier on, he said, because "we're here to protect the kids."

CIVIL LAW:

Justice Appeals Court Order To Release NRO Documents (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, September 26, 2006

The Justice Department is appealing a federal court order requiring the National Reconnaissance Office to release unclassified budget documents.

The Federation of American Scientists filed a Freedom of Information Act request last year for parts of the fiscal 2006 budget justification sent to Congress by NRO, which builds and operates intelligence satellites. NRO rejected the request, claiming that the relevant documents are "operational files," which document scientific and technical means for collecting information. Intelligence agencies can exempt operational files from FOIA.

But a federal judge ruled in July that the exemption did not apply to the NRO budget documents. According to Steven Aftergood, director of the FAS Project on Government Secrecy, NRO initially said it would comply with the decision.

On Sept. 20, however, the Justice Department filed a notice of appeal in U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

In Secrecy News, an FAS newsletter, Aftergood said the claim that unclassified budget documents represent operational files is new.

"If the operational file exemption were permitted to cover routine administrative documents such as budget records, then an enormous swath of unclassified government records could be unilaterally removed from the reach of the FOIA simply by designating them operational," he wrote.

Citing a 2001 memo from then Attorney General John Ashcroft that states Justice will defend agency decisions to resist FOIA requests, Aftergood argued the appeal is consistent with wider Bush administration policy to limit disclosure.

Justice spokesman Charles Miller confirmed the notice of appeal was filed, but declined to comment on its substance or on FOIA policy.

NRO had no immediate comment.

Judge Allows Suit On 'light' Cigarettes (FT)

By Lauren Foster

Financial Times, September 26, 2006

A US federal judge on Monday dealt a blow to the tobacco industry when he ruled a case involving the big cigarette makers and tens of millions of smokers of "light" cigarettes could proceed to trial as a national class action.

The Schwab claim – filed in 2004 under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organisations Act (Rico) – alleges cigarette companies defrauded smokers into believing "light" cigarettes were safer than regular ones.

The class includes anyone in the US who bought cigarettes that were labelled "light" or "lights" between 1971 and 2006.

Lawyers are seeking as much as $200bn (£105bn) in damages, which would automatically be tripled under Rico.

The ruling by US District Judge Jack Weinstein sent tobacco shares lower. Altria Group, parent of Philip Morris USA, closed down 6.39 per cent at $77.06, while Reynolds American, owner of R.J. Reynolds, ended the day down 3.66 per cent at $59.75.

Altria said the ruling would delay plans to spin-off its 88.1 per cent stake in Kraft Foods.

"Today's decision inevitably delays any restructuring," said William Ohlemeyer, Altria vice-president and associate general counsel.

"The board is committed to the restructuring strategy because it makes good sense for the company and its investors. A prerequisite . . . has been clarity in the overall litigation environment . . . Today's decision, however isolated it is, is not a step toward clarity, it is a step back of sorts."

Judge Weinstein denied the industry's request for a pre-trial appeal of the class certification, which means Schwab will proceed to trial as a national "lights" class action claim. Jury selection is expected to begin in January.

"This is a significant judgment," said Michael Hausfeld, partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll, the firm representing the smokers. "It is another condemnation on the merits of the tobacco business practices over more than a quarter of a century, and a milestone with respect to the procedures for class action as it certifies the largest class in terms of period, number and potential damages."

DOJ_NMG_0069384

PM USA and R.J. Reynolds said they would seek review of the class certification decision to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals – where the industry has a successful record of defending itself – and a stay of the trial court proceedings pending a decision by the appellate court.

Last year the Second Circuit threw out the Simon II class action that Judge Weinstein certified on behalf of millions of US smokers claiming punitive damages against the industry.

"We adamantly believe the 2nd Circuit Court will decertify the class given the past success the tobacco industry has experienced in this court," said Bonnie Herzog, analyst at Citigroup, in a report.

Tobacco Firms Exposed To New $200 Billion Claim (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'connell

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

A federal judge's decision to grant class-action status to tens of millions of smokers of "light cigarettes" exposes major tobacco companies to a new $200 billion claim for damages and will delay an expected plan by Philip Morris USA parent Altria Group Inc. to spin off its Kraft Foods Inc. unit.

U.S. District Judge Jack B. Weinstein in Brooklyn, N.Y., made the pretrial ruling yesterday in a 2004 lawsuit alleging that Philip Morris USA, Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco unit, among others, falsely marketed "light" and "low-tar" cigarettes as a lower-risk alternative to conventional higher-tar smokes.

Lawyers for the plaintiffs argued that tobacco companies reaped between $120 billion and $200 billion in additional revenue because of what they describe as a pattern of deceiving the public about the dangers of smoking light cigarettes. Because the suit is being brought under federal racketeering law, the amount of damages in the case could be tripled.

Not only is the judge's decision a legal setback for the tobacco industry, it further delays Altria's expected spinoff of its 88%-owned Kraft unit. The spinoff would be part of a long-planned breakup of Altria into two or three separate entities, but the New York company has put the restructuring on hold while it resolves outstanding legal challenges. Thanks to the tobacco industry's recent winning streak in lawsuits against it, many investors had expected Altria to announce the spinoff at an Oct. 25 board meeting.

At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Altria shares were down $5.26, or 6.4%, to $77.06. Reynolds shares fell $2.27, or 3.7%, to $59.75.

But Judge Weinstein's opinion in the light-cigarette lawsuit, known for lead plaintiff Barbara Schwab, makes it difficult for Altria to proceed with a Kraft spinoff for the moment. "Today's decision inevitably delays any restructuring," William Ohlemeyer, associate general counsel for Altria, said in a conference call with analysts and investors. "Today's decision, however isolated it is, is not a step toward clarity [regarding litigation]; it is a step back of sorts," Mr. Ohlemeyer said.

Plaintiffs in the class-action suit could seek to block the restructuring with a court injunction by arguing that the breakup of Altria might jeopardize their ability to collect any damages they might win. As a result, some observers now believe the board might delay a spinoff until an appellate court reverses Judge Weinstein's class-certification decision, which might not happen for another year -- if at all.

Judge Weinstein, who was appointed to the federal bench in 1967 by President Lyndon B. Johnson, is known for his tendency to embrace novel legal theories to resolve complicated issues. The 85-year-old federal judge has in the past tended to favor class-action suits as an efficient way to force major companies to pay out large sums when massive groups of people have suffered. He is credited with crafting class settlements in litigation over Agent Orange and asbestos, as well as presiding over a 1999 jury trial that found some gun manufacturers liable for violence committed with handguns.

In his decision yesterday, Judge Weinstein denied the companies the right to have him seek an immediate appellate review of his class-certification decision. Past class-action tobacco suits have failed because courts have found smokers too diverse a group to have their claims lumped together. But Judge Weinstein said class-action certification is "critical" to this light-cigarette smokers' case. "The small amount of possible recovery for each smoker could not justify the expensive and time-consuming pretrial and trial procedures required," he wrote.

Plaintiffs' attorney Michael D. Hausfeld estimated that as many as 50 million people in the U.S. could be a part of the class, which represents anyone who purchased cigarettes that were labeled "light" after they were put on the market, beginning in the early 1970s.

Tobacco companies said they would appeal the ruling to the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York. The tobacco companies also will seek a stay of all trial-court proceedings pending a decision by the appellate court. Jury selection in the case is set to begin Jan. 22.

DOJ_NMG_0069385

"There is a real question of whether the ruling will hold up on appeal," says Robert L. Rabin, a professor at Stanford Law School. "Class actions in tobacco haven't fared well, and we have to see whether the Second Circuit will be receptive to Weinstein's action."

Judge Rules Up To 50M Can Sue In Tobacco Case (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, September 26, 2006

Up to 50 million Americans who have smoked "light" cigarettes believing them less dangerous to their health than regular cigarettes are eligible to participate in a class-action lawsuit certified Monday.

U.S. District Court Judge Jack Weinstein ruled that plaintiffs attorneys had presented "substantial evidence" to show that eight cigarette makers defrauded U.S. consumers of billions of dollars by using bogus health claims to inflate the prices of low-tar cigarettes.

At issue, Weinstein said, "is not whether a fraud case can be proven, but whether damages can be" calculated for smokers who allegedly were unaware of a fact the tobacco companies have known since the late 1960s: Consumers of low-tar cigarettes smoke more intensively to compensate for their nicotine addictions, putting them at elevated health risks.

Plaintiffs' attorney Michael Hausfeld, who built the smokers' legal claims around a federal racketeering statute, said he will prove damages of $26 billion to $200 billion through statistical models that estimate how much Americans allegedly were overcharged for "light" cigarettes and how much faster they would have quit smoking had not "light" cigarettes been marketed so effectively since the early 1970s.

Unlike state and federal tobacco lawsuits that centered on medical damages, the lawsuit known as Schwab v. Philip Morris states an economic fraud claim. One of the plaintiffs' expert witnesses, Jeffrey Harris, a practicing physician and professor of economics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, estimates "light" cigarettes' lose up to 92% of their market value once their health dangers are exposed.

Defendants, including Philip Morris USA, owned by Altria Group, and Reynolds American's R.J. Reynolds Tobacco unit, said they would appeal the judge's ruling. Tobacco lawyers contend the four-year statute of limitations for racketeering claims significantly reduces their financial exposure. They also contend they should not be required to retry issues of fact and law already decided in other courts, including the Justice Department's recently concluded racketeering lawsuit against the tobacco companies in Washington, D.C.

In the Justice Department case, the same defendants were ordered to remove such descriptions as "light" and "ultra light" from their cigarette packaging but did not have to pay $14 billion sought by government prosecutors to counter their marketing efforts.

Altria stock fell 6.4% Monday to $77.06, and Reynolds American's shares dropped 3.7% to $59.75 after the class-action certification was announced. But Citigroup analyst Bonnie Herzog advised the company's clients: "We think the sell-off of all the stocks is overdone, and investors should be buyers."

In an investors' note, Herzog expressed confidence that a federal appeals court would reverse Weinstein's ruling and "decertify" the class of "light" cigarette smokers, "given the past success the tobacco industry has experienced" in contesting the judge's decisions, including one previous class-action lawsuit.

Tobacco Makers Lose Key Ruling On Latest Suits (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston And Melanie Warner

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

In a legal blow to the tobacco industry, a federal judge in Brooklyn ruled yesterday that people who smoked light cigarettes that were often promoted as a safer alternative to regular cigarettes can press their fraud claim as a class-action suit.

Judge Jack B. Weinstein of Federal District Court in Brooklyn found "substantial evidence" that the manufacturers knew that light cigarettes were at least as dangerous as regular cigarettes.

The decision, coming at a time when the tobacco industry felt it was on a legal winning streak, raises the possibility that so-called lights cases will become a major threat to the companies and expose them to potentially significant damages.

The case, first filed in 2004, is against Philip Morris USA, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco, British American Tobacco, Liggett Group, Brown & Williamson and Lorillard Tobacco. It differs from many previous tobacco lawsuits in that it does not claim that smokers suffered personal injury. Instead, the case — called the Schwab case after the lead plaintiff, Barbara Schwab — claims that the industry defrauded consumers beginning as early as 1971, when Philip Morris began selling Marlboro Lights, the first light cigarette.

DOJ_NMG_0069386

Because some 45 percent of smokers currently smoke light cigarettes, potentially vast numbers of people nationwide could be involved.

Michael D. Hausfeld, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll who is representing the plaintiffs, has said that the class could reach tens of millions of people and involve damages of up to $200 billion. The racketeering law being cited would allow any damage award to be tripled.

Investors yesterday drove down the price of tobacco stocks.

But before the case can proceed to a jury trial, the class-action ruling would have to be upheld by the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Some litigation experts expressed strong doubt that it would survive such an appeal.

William S. Ohlemeyer, associate general counsel of Altria, whose Philip Morris division makes half the nation's cigarettes, said "the judge is wrong on the law and wrong on the facts."

Mr. Ohlemeyer said that the government, not tobacco companies, promoted the idea that lights were a safer alternative cigarette.

He added that Supreme Court decisions and court rules prohibit treating fraud cases as class actions because each individual claim of reliance on false statements must be proved.

Still, yesterday's ruling is a setback to what tobacco companies have previously described as an "improving legal environment" for the industry.

Tobacco companies in recent months had won a string of victories. In July, the Florida Supreme Court upheld a decision to toss out a $145 billion judgment in a class-action suit. In December, the Illinois Supreme Court threw out a similar $10 billion judgment against Philip Morris.

Then last month, Judge Gladys Kessler of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia issued a scathing decision in the Department of Justice's landmark racketeering lawsuit. She concluded that the tobacco industry had engaged in a 40-year conspiracy to defraud smokers about the health dangers of tobacco, including deceptions about lights and low-tar cigarettes.

But while Judge Kessler ordered tobacco companies to stop labeling cigarettes as "low tar" or "light" to convey that they were less hazardous than full-flavor cigarettes, she said an earlier ruling prevented her from awarding what could have amounted to $10 billion in damages.

Yesterday's ruling also throws uncertainty into long-running plans by Altria, the parent company of Philip Morris, to separate its Kraft Foods unit from its domestic and foreign tobacco businesses. After several decisions favorable to tobacco companies within the last year, investors had driven up the price of Altria's shares in anticipation that it would spin off Kraft in the coming months.

Shares of Altria fell 6.4 percent yesterday to $77.06.

David Adelman, a tobacco analyst at Morgan Stanley, said in a conference call with investors that Judge Weinstein's ruling would probably delay a restructuring. He said he expects that if tobacco companies are successful in their efforts to get a review of Judge Weinstein's decision before the trial begins, which could be as early as January, a Kraft spin-off could take place by the end of the first quarter of 2007.

Mr. Adelman said that based on past rulings and what he called the "conservative" nature of the Second Circuit appeals court, he expected such a review to be granted. If it is not, the Schwab case will proceed to a jury trial.

While plaintiffs' lawyers have been filing such class-action suits against cigarette makers since the early 1990's, this is the first lights case to be certified as a class action in a federal court. Currently, three other lights cases have received class certification, all in state courts and encompassing fewer numbers of smokers.

Judge Weinstein rejected the defense claim that the case was so "enormous in scope and time and in diverse persons affected" that there was no reasonable and inexpensive way to try the case.

The judge said that a central theme of American justice was that "each right has a remedy" but that it was impractical to try individually the fraud claims of tens of millions of smokers.

The judge took note of past court decisions limiting class-action cases and expressed doubt that litigation has done, or can do, much to reduce the damage done by smoking.

"Nevertheless," Judge Weinstein ruled, "where a cigarette smoker can demonstrate that he or a group of smokers has been damaged by the cigarette industry, the help of the court in resolving the claim and defenses is mandatory."

Judge Weinstein also took note of the agreements the tobacco companies reached with the state governments, suggesting the companies could end up paying damages twice.

"The independent political-economic arrangement" the tobacco companies made with the states "to pay them billions of dollars over many years has not compensated smokers for the individual damages they have allegedly suffered," the judge wrote. He also wrote that widespread "partial acknowledgments" by tobacco companies that cigarettes are dangerous, and their efforts to reduce smoking by children and others "does not negate any liability for past" misconduct.

Judge Weinstein has a history of decisions that favor class actions and proposing novel solutions to settle cases. In an earlier tobacco case, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals overturned his certification of a class.

Professor Geoffrey P. Miller, who teaches class-action litigation at New York University Law School, was among the lawyers who said they expected the Second Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the class-action certification.

"It is important to remember that it is not a crime per se to lie, nor is it a violation of law to lie," Professor Miller said. Proving fraud requires showing both that the companies lied and that customers relied on those lies, which means that "technically each individual class member has to show reliance on the fraudulent statements," he added.

Victor E. Schwartz, general counsel for the American Tort Reform Association, which seeks major limits on class actions, said that "the flaw in Judge Weinstein's decision is the idea that there is always a remedy for every alleged injury, which simply is not true."

Trying cases one smoker at a time has resulted in a few victories for smokers, but many more victories for cigarette makers.

Philip J. Hilts, author of the 1996 book "Smoke Screen," which relied on internal cigarette industry documents to show that the companies knew cigarettes were addictive and dangerous but did not alert consumers, said that cigarette makers have good reason to fear a class-action lawsuit.

"With a class action you get higher legal firepower and you get the principle discussed, not that this person quit smoking a while ago or says he smoked more than he did or whatever detail diverts from the principle," Mr. Hilts said.

Cigarette smoke contains thousands of chemicals, some of them known carcinogens. Some lights are advertised as having less nicotine, a highly addictive substance.

Light cigarettes are manufactured differently from regular cigarettes. They have microscopic holes that the companies say dilute the smoke. Medical researchers have found that people draw harder and deeper on lights, often filling their lungs with more toxic material than they would get from regular cigarettes, said Dr. Stanton A. Glantz, a cardiologist at the University of California, San Francisco medical school who is a longtime antagonist of the cigarette makers.

Matthew L. Myers, president of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, an anti-tobacco group, said he thought the latest ruling could embolden plaintiffs' lawyers to file new lights cases.

Judge Weinstein and Judge Kessler's legal decisions have also heightened calls for federal regulation of cigarettes. Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, introduced legislation on Sept. 7 that would ban the use of the terms "light'' and "low tar.''

While Mr. Lautenberg is one of 28 Democratic and Republican sponsors of another bill that would give the Food and Drug Administration authority to regulate tobacco, Dan Katz, chief counsel for Mr. Lautenberg, said that this new bill is needed as a more immediate stop-gap measure.

Judge Approves Tobacco Class-Action Suit (WP/AP)

By Tom Hays

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 25 -- In a blow to the tobacco industry, a federal judge ruled Monday that a jury should decide whether tobacco companies must pay tens of millions of smokers up to $200 billion for allegedly duping them into buying light cigarettes over the past three decades.

The cigarette makers said they would appeal.

Shares of tobacco firms fell on Wall Street as the ruling, granting class-action status to the case, clouded what had appeared to be an improving legal environment for the industry.

Altria Group Inc., the parent of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris USA Inc., said the ruling will delay its long-awaited restructuring plan, which includes a divestiture of its controlling stake in Kraft Foods Inc.

In a conference call Monday, a top Altria lawyer, William S. Ohlemeyer, said that a prerequisite to pursuing the company's restructuring plan is clarity in the overall litigation environment.

"Today's decision is not a step toward clarity. It is a step back of sorts," he said.

His comments came hours after U.S. District Judge Jack B. Weinstein granted class-action status to a lawsuit against Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA, its biggest U.S. rival R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. and other cigarette manufacturers.

"The plaintiffs are entitled to the chance to prove their allegations," Weinstein said. The tobacco companies prefer trying each case on its own, saying circumstances vary widely from one person to another.

"We obviously disagree with the ruling -- strongly," said Theodore Grossman, an attorney for Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco division. "The law doesn't support class certification."

DOJ_NMG_0069388

The suit, filed in 2004, alleges the tobacco companies responded to consumers' mounting health concerns with a marketing scheme to promote light cigarettes as a lower-risk alternative to regular cigarettes, even though their own internal documents showed they knew the risks were about the same.

Smokers' attorney Michael D. Hausfeld said the decision could clear the way for one of the largest class-action cases ever, both in number of plaintiffs and amount of damages. He estimated the class -- consisting of anyone who purchased cigarettes that were labeled "light" or "lights" after they were put on the market in the early 1970s -- could number up to 60 million.

Federal Judge Certifies $200 Billion Light Cigarette Class Action (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 26, 2006

A federal judge on Monday certified a $200 billion class action lawsuit against the tobacco industry for its marketing of light cigarettes, saying that no matter how vast and complex the claims, the U.S. Constitution demanded that a jury hear the plaintiffs' case.

Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein's 540-page opinion in Schwab v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 04-CIV-1945 -- which included an additional 965 pages of appendices for a total of 1,505 pages -- gave tens of millions of smokers an avenue to recover damages from the nations largest tobacco companies, including Philip Morris USA Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Lorillard Tobacco Co., and Liggett Group, Inc.

The class will include anyone who purchased light cigarettes from the time tobacco companies began selling them in the 1970s. The judge said he even would consider broadening the class, to encompass smokers of all "low tar" brands, not just light cigarettes.

The judge suggested that an expansion of the class could assist the parties in negotiating a global settlement. He set a trial date for Jan. 22, 2007. The plaintiffs intend to seek treble damages.

Two weeks ago, the judge held a final hearing on class certification for the 2004 suit, which alleges that tobacco companies marketed light cigarettes as less risky even though internal documents show that the companies were aware the risks were about equal.

Weinstein has expressed skepticism about the plaintiffs' theory of damages, which alleges that light smokers were defrauded of billions because they believed they were buying a product of greater value because of its health advantages. The judge also questioned the size of the class, as well as the claim that as many as 90 percent of light cigarette smokers chose the cigarettes because they were less harmful.

In his ruling Monday, the judge stressed that while the suit was far from perfect, the evidence warranted that it proceed.

"While evidence of fraud on the class appears to be quite strong -- and defendants have been less than candid in insisting that there was no fraud -- evidence of the percentage of the class which was defrauded and the amount of economic damages it suffered appears to be quite weak -- and plaintiffs have been less than candid in failing to acknowledge that deficiency in their proof," the judge wrote.

He said the jury system -- which he described as the "ultimate focus group of the law" -- was well equipped to sort out the particulars in accordance with Amendment VII of the U.S. Constitution.

"The jury's power and capacity to deal with complex facts and come to a reasonable resolution of a dispute should not be underestimated," Weinstein said.

He added: "Plaintiffs' proof is akin to a pointillist painting by Georges Seurat. When a juror stands back from the canvas and looks at the big picture, he or she may well discern clearly enough an industry allegedly based on fraud and coverup that has taken more than a half century to begin to admit its alleged subtle lies to the public designed to sell its product. Viewed in context, the proof of acts of defendants and the various experts' opinions permits a finding of damages to the class with sufficient precision to allow a jury award."

Weinstein rejected the defendants' claim that the suit was too large in scope and affected different people who smoked for different reasons.

"It is well to recall a central theme of our American legal system: ubi jus, ibi remedium -- each right has a remedy," the judge wrote. "Every violation of a right should have a remedy in court, if that is possible."

APPEAL PLANNED

Weinstein declined to grant an interlocutory appeal to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Theodore M. Grossman of Jones Day in Cleveland, which represents R.J. Reynolds, said the defendants would seek a stay and appeal the class certification under Rule 23(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

"I have come to learn that Judge Weinstein certifies classes," Grossman said. "I think [he] understands the problems in plaintiffs' case, but consistent with prior writings he is looking for an avenue to effect changes in society that he wants."

Grossman took issue with the judge's suggestion that an expanded class might cause the defendants to agree to a settlement.

"This case is not going to be settled," he said. "It's impossible to settle and it will not settle. It would be wrong to settle. And the kind of arm twisting implicit in this opinion is inappropriate."

Michael D. Hausfeld of Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington, D.C., which was appointed co-lead counsel with Finkelstein, Thompson, & Loughran, also in Washington, said that Weinstein had found that the cigarette industry had perpetrated a "massive fraud" on consumers through the marketing of light cigarettes, just as another judge, Judge Gladys Kessler of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, had found last month.

Kessler, ruling in a racketeering suit brought by the U.S. Justice Department, said the tobacco industry had perpetrated a conspiracy on consumers to "further their overarching economic goal: to keep smokers smoking; to stop smokers from quitting; to encourage people ... to start smoking; and to maintain or increase corporate profits" (see United States v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 2006 WL 2380681).

Weinstein decided against applying the doctrine of collateral estoppel in light of Kessler's ruling, saying it should not be applied "in the interest of fairness to defendants."

Hausfeld said the plaintiffs would be ready for trial in January, if the circuit did not stay the case.

"We think a Brooklyn jury in particular can discern what it means to be lied to," he said. "It may not be simple, but that doesn't mean that they can't do it."

Firm Wants Sisters Silenced (BSH)

By Anita Lee

Biloxi Sun Herald, September 26, 2006

An insurance adjusting firm wants two whistleblowers to stop talking about claims they handled for State Farm insurance, pay damages for economic harm and return records they turned over to federal and state investigators.

The company, Alabama-based E.A. Renfroe, said sisters Cori and Kerri Rigsby also gave copies of the records to attorney Richard "Dickie" Scruggs, whose Scruggs Katrina Group intends to profit from lawsuits filed against State Farm.

Renfroe is suing the Rigsbys, insurance adjusters who claim State Farm manipulated engineering firms to minimize or deny policyholder claims. Renfroe said the Rigsbys breached their employment contract and violated the Alabama Trade Secrets Act by turning over confidential records to federal and state investigators and to Scruggs, for whom they are now working.

The sisters also were interviewed for stories in the Sun Herald and on ABC's "20/20."

Renfroe wants a federal judge in Alabama to stop the Rigsbys' disclosures, award Renfroe damages for breach of contract, allow Renfroe to recover any profits the Rigsbys or Scruggs receive from the records, and award extra damages against the Rigsbys.

The Rigsbys worked from the late 1990s until the spring of 2006 for Renfroe, which State Farm hired to help adjust its claims. Renfroe assigned the Rigsbys, who are from Ocean Springs, to work for State Farm.

The sisters said they left their adjusting jobs because of the wrongdoing they discovered and documented from State Farm claims files. They have accused State Farm of manipulating engineering firms to supply reports attributing hurricane damage to water, covered by national flood insurance, rather than wind, covered under State Farm policies.

Management at State Farm and Renfroe have denied any wrongdoing and said they are cooperating with investigators from the U.S. Justice Department and Mississippi Attorney General's Office.

Federal law protects people who work to document and report illegal activity that might otherwise be covered up, but each case is different, said attorney Stephen Kohn, president of the National Whistleblowers Center and author of "Concepts and Procedures in Whistleblower Law."

"It's a difficult issue, but there are policies and laws which will support a whistleblower who does that," Kohn said. "Those are the types of disclosures that the law would intend to protect."

In its lawsuit against the Rigsbys, Renfroe is also demanding that the sisters return their State Farm jackets. The sisters displayed the jackets on "20/20" to illustrate they represented themselves to policyholders as State Farm employees.

3 AOL Subscribers Sue AOL For Release Of Search Data, Seek End To Data Retention (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anick Jesdanun, Ap Internet Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Three AOL subscribers who suddenly found records of their Internet searches widely distributed online are suing the company under privacy laws and are seeking an end to its retention of search-related data.

DOJ_NMG_0069390

The lawsuit is believed to be the first in the wake of AOL's intentional release of some 19 million search requests made over a three-month period by more than 650,000 subscribers, including the three plaintiffs - two unnamed Californians and Kasadore Ramkissoon of Richmond County, New York.

Filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Oakland, California, the lawsuit seeks class-action status. It does not specify the amount of damages being sought.

AOL already has apologized for the release, which it blamed on a researcher who had failed to gain proper clearances. The researcher and another AOL employee have been fired, and the company's chief technology officer has resigned. AOL also pledged to name its first chief privacy officer.

John Dominguez, one of the attorneys who filed the lawsuit, said AOL ought to do more.

"People paid AOL with the belief that their privacy was going to be protected," he said Monday. "That's not what happened."

Although AOL had substituted numeric IDs for the subscribers' real user names, the company acknowledged the search queries themselves may contain personally identifiable data, revealing names, credit card numbers and medical conditions.

In fact, The New York Times was able to trace user 4417749 to Thelma Arnold, 62, of Georgia, while The Washington Post tracked down JoAnn Whitman, 55, of Colorado, after she accidentally typed into AOL's search engine an e-commerce order confirmation.

AOL removed the data from its Web site once executives learned of the release, but not before copies were already circulating. Web sites have even been created specifically to query AOL's search database.

Dominguez said AOL ought to at least try to shut down those sites or block them from its own search engines. And he said the company should stop collecting such records and destroy any it already has.

AOL currently keeps data linked to specific subscribers for up to 30 days and other data, such as the search records released, for longer. Data retention is standard practice among Internet search engines, which use such information to refine their services.

AOL LLC, a unit of Time Warner Inc., declined comment on the lawsuit, which alleges violations of the federal Electronic Communications Privacy Act and California consumer-protection laws.

Two privacy advocacy groups, the Electronic Frontier Foundation and the World Privacy Forum, already have filed complaints with the Federal Trade Commission.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI, Gilbert Investigate Possible Hate Crime (AZREP)

By Elias C. Arnold

Arizona Republic, September 26, 2006

GILBERT -- FBI agents have joined a Gilbert police investigation into a possible hate crime in which a Black Barbie doll was found hanging by its neck in the car of an African-American woman.

The 24-year-old woman found the doll July 8 after leaving the vehicle unlocked overnight at her apartment complex in the 1300 block of West Juniper Avenue, according to police.

The act potentially specifically targeted the victim, which could warrant federal charges should investigators determine it was motivated by the victim's race, said Special Agent Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman.

advertisement

Federal agents learned of the investigation through news media and have been assisting police for several weeks to determine whether federal charges are warranted, McCarley said.

Recent finger print analysis has ruled out at least one investigative lead who lived in the area, according to Gilbert police.

Investigators are re-interviewing the victim's family and friends in hopes of uncovering new or previously undisclosed information, said Sgt. Andrew Duncan, a Gilbert police spokesman.

Supporters Of A.C.L.U. Call For The Ouster Of Its Leaders (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

More than 30 longtime supporters of the American Civil Liberties Union are calling for the ouster of the organization's leadership, saying it has failed to adhere to the principles it demands of others and thus jeopardized the organization's effectiveness.

DOJ_NMG_0069391

The new group is made up of donors, former board and staff members, and the lawyer who won what was perhaps the A.C.L.U.'s most famous legal battle, its defense of the right of Nazis to march through a predominantly Jewish suburb of Chicago.

"We come together now, reluctantly but resolutely, not to injure the A.C.L.U. but to restore its integrity and its consistency of principle,'' the group said in a mission statement to be posted on its Web site, www.savetheaclu.org, which is to go live today.

The statement does not name individual officials that the group wants to see removed, but in the past, criticism has been focused on Anthony D. Romero, the executive director, and Nadine Strossen, the board president, as well as members of the executive committee.

The Web site, which was first reported in The New York Sun in June, initially will feature letters from members and donors who have joined the effort, lists of articles about the A.C.L.U. and ways for readers to join the effort.

"It's a home for A.C.L.U. loyalists who have been shut out of the organization," said Ira Glasser, who was executive director of the organization from 1978 to 2001 and has signed the statement.

Mr. Glasser emphasized that the group, conceived by Alan Kahn, a retired Wall Street executive and longtime A.C.L.U. member, was an informal one.

"We're not starting a new organization," he said. "We're a protest group, trying to get the board to exercise its fiduciary and governing responsibility in a way that it has not. We're loyal to the existing organization and above all to the principles it is intended to advance."

Emily Whitfield, an A.C.L.U. spokeswoman, defended the organization, saying it continued to fight aggressively for the principles of free speech.

"Our programs, both legal and legislative, have never been stronger," Ms. Whitfield said. "And then there's the phenomenal growth of the A.C.L.U., where we've nearly doubled staff, our revenues are higher, membership and donations are higher, and that, to us, tell us where we are right now, in terms of our organization. We're proud of it."

She added, "We're proud to be the leading organization fighting for freedom of speech on the Internet."

Ms. Whitfield noted that the A.C.L.U. would go to court next month to argue that federal efforts to limit access to certain content on the Web to protect children violated the free speech protection in the Constitution.

And she pointed out that other independent Web sites already reported and commented on the A.C.L.U., including acluprocon.org and stoptheaclu.com, among others.

In interviews, some members of the group behind the Web site pointed to internal controversies that have been made public, starting with an agreement that obligated the A.C.L.U. to check its staff against government lists of suspected terrorists to participate in the federal employees' annual fund-raising drive known as the Combined Federal Campaign at the same time it was criticizing the lists.

Since then, controversies have developed over other matters, including questions about the A.C.L.U.'s use of data mining to profile donors, a plan to monitor its employees' e-mail messages and efforts to control board members' access to staff and information.

Donors have confronted the organization over proposals that would have discouraged its board members from publicly criticizing the organization's policies and internal administration.

"Any one of those things by itself is unacceptable, but you could say it was an error in judgment and let it go," said David Goldberger, a law professor at Ohio State University, who defended the Nazis' right to march in Skokie, Ill., when he worked at the A.C.L.U.'s Illinois affiliate. "But when you start to see more than one of these kinds of things emerge, then it's clear that the organization's leadership has let it drift away from its core principles, and without those principles, it has no value."

The A.C.L.U. has backtracked several times in response to public criticism, withdrawing from the federal fund-raising effort, filing a lawsuit to get the requirements changed and returning some grant money, among other things.

Mr. Romero, the executive director, has apologized for "mistakes" but said the organization had never violated its principles. Controversial proposals, like the one to monitor employee e-mail, have been withdrawn for further consideration.

Members of the new group and others, however, say such issues should have never arisen.

"It does something wrong, then it retracts it after it gets bad publicity, which is no way to operate," said Anna Switzer, a longtime A.C.L.U. member from New York who said she signed onto the mission statement reluctantly. "The problem is that some of these things should never have been proposed at all."

John C. Brittain, chief counsel of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law, was an A.C.L.U. board member and a member of the executive committee until he was voted out of office last month in what he and others contended was an election manipulated by the leadership. A.C.L.U. leaders denied the accusation.

DOJ_NMG_0069392

"I agreed to sign on to this effort because I have been inside the A.C.L.U. for the past five years, nearly, and I've tried to address some of the concerns from within and been rebuffed," Mr. Brittain said. He said that he did not know about the opposition effort until after the election and that his support for it had nothing to do with his ouster from the board.

"I am truly troubled by the direction and governance of the organization," he said.

Stricter Voting Laws Carve Latest Partisan Divide (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

MESA, Ariz. — Eva Charlene Steele, a recent transplant from Missouri, has no driver's license or other form of state identification. So after voting all her adult life, Mrs. Steele will not be voting in November because of an Arizona law that requires proof of citizenship to register.

"I have mixed emotions," said Mrs. Steele, 57, who uses a wheelchair and lives in a small room in an assisted-living center. "I could see where you would want to keep people who don't belong in the country from voting, but there has to be an easier way."

Russell K. Pearce, a leading proponent of the new requirement, offers no apologies.

"You have to show ID for almost everything — to rent a Blockbuster movie!" said Mr. Pearce, a Republican in the State House of Representatives. "Nobody has the right to cancel my vote by voting illegally. This is about political corruption."

Mrs. Steele and Mr. Pearce are two players in a spreading partisan brawl over new and proposed voting requirements around the country. Republicans say the laws are needed to combat fraud, especially among illegal immigrants. Democrats say there is minimal fraud, if any, and accuse Republicans of suppressing the votes of those least likely to have the required documentation — minorities, the poor and the elderly — who tend to vote for Democrats.

In tight races, Democrats say, the loss of votes could matter in November.

In Maricopa County, Arizona's largest in population, election officials said that 35 percent of new registrations were rejected for insufficient proof of citizenship last year and that 17 percent had been rejected so far this year. It is not known how many of the rejected registrants were not citizens or were unable to prove their citizenship because they had lost or could not locate birth certificates and other documents.

In Indiana, Daniel J. Parker, chairman of the state Democratic Party, said: "Close to 10 percent of registered voters here do not have driver's licenses. Who does that impact most? Seniors and minorities."

A law in Indiana requiring voters to have a state-issued photo ID is being challenged in the federal courts, as are the voting laws in Arizona and in many other states.

Republicans say the Democratic complaints are self-serving.

"Democrats believe they represent stupid people who are not smart enough to vote," said Randy Pullen, a Republican national committeeman from Arizona who championed a statewide initiative on the new requirements. "I do not."

The new measures include tighter controls over absentee balloting and stronger registration rules. The most contentious are laws in three states — Georgia, Indiana and Missouri — where people need government-issued picture ID's to vote, and provisions here in Arizona that tightened voter ID requirements at the polls and imposed the proof-of-citizenship requirement for voter registration.

Several other states are considering similar measures, and the House of Representatives, voting largely along party lines, recently passed a national voter ID measure that is headed for the Senate.

The debate in Washington and the state capitals has been heated, with only one note of agreement: that voting, once burdened by poll taxes and other impediments, is as divisive an issue as ever.

"I have never seen such a sinister plot — I won't say plot, I'll say measure — as to target a group of people to try to make it difficult for them to vote," said Roy E. Barnes, a Democrat and former governor of Georgia who is fighting the new identification law in his state.

Mr. Pearce, the Arizona Republican, said: "We know people are approached to register whether they are illegal or not. We know the left side's agenda."

Underlying the debate is the fundamental question of voter fraud and whether people who are not who they say they are — impostors — are voting. Some suggest that the problem is so widespread that the standard methods of proving identification, like a utility bill and a signature, are no longer adequate.

"I know a lot of allegations of voter fraud, especially by noncitizens, that may have been able to tip the balance in favor of one candidate," said Representative Tom Tancredo, Republican of Colorado and an advocate of tough immigration laws.

The tighter voting rules appeal strongly to people worried about illegal immigration, Mr. Tancredo said.

DOJ_NMG_0069393

There is no data, however, to show more than isolated instances of so-called impostor voting by illegal immigrants or others.

Experts in election law say most voter fraud involves absentee balloting, which is unaffected by the new photo identification laws. Few people, they say, will risk a felony charge to vote illegally at the polls, and few illegal immigrants want to interact with government officials — even people running a polling place.

Of Arizona's 2.7 million registered voters, 238 were believed to have been noncitizens in the last 10 years; only 4 were believed to have voted; and none were impostors, plaintiffs stipulate in their lawsuit to overturn the law, statistics the state has not challenged. Nor is there evidence of impostor voting in Georgia, Indiana or Missouri.

Advocates for the new laws do not dispute the figures — just their relevance.

Thor Hearne, a lawyer for the American Center for Voting Rights, a conservative advocacy group, who was President Bush's election law counsel in 2004, says there is little proof of impostor voting because few have looked for it.

Todd Rokita, the Indiana secretary of state, agrees. "Critics will say there is no wholesale fraud, and to that I say you don't understand the nature of election fraud," said Mr. Rokita, a Republican. "A lot of this goes unreported. Until you have a mechanism in place like photo ID's, you don't have anything to report."

Arizona's new rules were passed as part of Proposition 200, a referendum that denies certain state and local benefits to illegal immigrants. It got 56 percent of the vote two years ago, after Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, vetoed a Republican-backed measure passed by the Legislature.

Rooted in the state's debates over illegal immigration, the measure is the broadest in the country, requiring a driver's license, a state photo ID or two nonphotographic forms of identification at the polls. Lawyers for the Navajo Nation and other American Indian tribes say the provision particularly discriminates against Indians, many of whom are too poor to drive or are without electricity or telephone bills, alternative forms of identification.

Because the Arizona measures have been in place for less than two years, there is limited documentation of their impact. Lawyers fighting the rules say the measures have prevented thousands of people from registering to vote, particularly in Maricopa County, which includes Phoenix, a city with many Latino voters.

Supporters of the measures say elections have gone smoothly. Critics point to individual cases, like confusion at the polls in the primary elections earlier this month. They say that people without adequate documentation have been turned away or required to file "conditional provisional" ballots that are counted only if voters follow up — and that not all of them do.

Deborah Lopez, a Democratic political consultant in Phoenix, said that the once simple matter of registering voters at a rally or a fiesta now required labor-intensive door-to-door visits.

It was during a registration drive at her assisted-living center, Desert Palms, that Mrs. Steele learned she could not vote. Disabled, with a son, an Army staff sergeant, on active duty, she left Missouri recently to stay with her brother and subsequently moved into the center.

Lacking a driver's license, she could get a new state identity card, but she said she had neither the $12 to pay for it nor, because she uses a wheelchair, the transportation to pick it up.

"It makes me a little angry because my son is fighting now in Iraq for others to have the right to vote, and I can't," said Mrs. Steele, who submitted an affidavit in the suit against the Arizona law.

Asked if she was a Republican or a Democrat, Mrs. Steele said she was neither: "I vote for the best person for the job."

Or, she added, she used to.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

Pause for publicity

Nobody was more delighted than Simon & Schuster imprint Free Press when Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf told a White House press conference Friday that he could not answer a specific question surrounding September 11 because he was "honor bound" by his book contract.

As booksellers know, you can't buy that kind of publicity.

That morning Gen. Musharraf's 368-page "In the Line of Fire: A Memoir" was hovering around No. 1,300 in advance sales on Amazon. By Friday evening, book sales had jumped to No. 120, and yesterday -- the date of its official release -- the memoir leaped to No. 7 in nonfiction.

The boost in book interest began when Gen. Musharraf dodged a reporter's question about a purported post-September 11 threat by the Bush administration to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age."

DOJ_NMG_0069394

The Pakistani president said he was honoring his publisher's request not to discuss anything contained in the memoir -- at which point President Bush interjected, "Buy the book is what he's saying."

Mr. Musharraf's literary agent, Chris Calhoun, told Inside the Beltway yesterday that he thinks Mr. Bush "ought to plug more books."

The New York agent said this is the first time he has represented a sitting president in this type of book deal.

"I had never heard of a sitting president writing a memoir before he leaves office," Mr. Calhoun said. "They've written books, of course, but not memoirs. But his is a special case, because his life is such a dangerous one."

Now that yesterday's release date has come and gone, Gen. Musharraf is telling all. He began his day yesterday, for instance, on the set of NBC's "Today" program. Today, he will sit down with CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer in "The Situation Room," and then appear on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" with Jon Stewart.

If that's not enough of Gen. Musharraf, he can be heard tomorrow on NPR's "Morning Edition," and seen next Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" with Tim Russert.

Packing it in

We told you recently about the U.S. congressman who was riled by French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin's remark that "against terrorism, what we need is not a war. It is, as France has done for many years, a determined fight based on vigilance at all times and effective cooperation with our partners."

Now, an unlikely ally is defending France, saying it's the Americans, not the French, who are "losing the will to fight."

In the latest issue of the American Conservative, Pat Buchanan recalls France's heroism during World War I, when in a single month -- August 1914 -- French casualties totaled 260,000. In fact, 27,000 Frenchmen died on Aug. 22 alone.

"On Aug. 22, 1914, France lost 10 times as many dead as we [Americans] have lost during the entire Iraq war," Mr. Buchanan notes. "Those who mock alleged French cravenness might reflect: France fought for four more years after that horrible August and lost 1.3 million men. Yet 60 percent of Americans are ready to pack it in in Iraq."

He cites numerous reasons for Americans wanting to cut and run from Baghdad and beyond, not the least being that current generations are "no longer into dying for God and country."

"Western man, including many Americans, is into self-indulgence. Make love, not war," he said.

Expensive lessons

Salary of the White House's new director for lessons learned: $106,641

-- Harper's Index, October 2006

Deck the halls

Say you teach in a public school and you want to celebrate Christmas in your classroom with like-minded students, what's a teacher to do?

Go right ahead, says Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. We've come across a letter sent to the secretary by a teacher named Karen in Salt Lake City. She writes:

"I'm so frustrated with the U.S. trying to get 'Christmas' out of our vocabulary. In a Fox News poll, 96 percent of Americans, people of all faiths, celebrate Christmas. So, my question is: What are we allowed to teach and say in school?

"All of my kids celebrate Christmas, not 'Winter Holiday.' (I asked.) I know I can say Merry Christmas. Can I decorate our room with Christmas stuff? I'm not teaching them about Christ, but I heard that it was OK to say that Christmas is a celebration of Christ's birth for Christians. Thank you."

Mrs. Spellings replied: "Christmas is one of the great joys of the year for many Americans of all ages. In fact, Congress recognized Dec. 25 as a public holiday in 1870.

"Schools and teachers traditionally have celebrated the secular aspects of Christmas and are free to do so today. Educators may also teach students about the religion and history behind Christmas, Hanukkah and other religious holidays. Of course, some students may not wish to participate in Christmas celebrations, and their beliefs should be respected as well. With this in mind, I hope you celebrate and enjoy the season with our students."

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin@washingtontimes.com.

Academy Of P.C. Sciences (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

I've slogged through enough reports from the National Academy of Sciences to know they're often not shining examples of the scientific method. But — call me naïve — I never thought the academy was cynical enough to publish a political tract like "Beyond Bias and Barriers," the new report on discrimination against female scientists and engineers.

DOJ_NMG_0069395

This is the kind of science you expect to find in The Onion: "Academy Forms Committee to Study Gender Discrimination, Bars Men from Participating." Actually, it did allow a total of one man, Robert Birgeneau of Berkeley, on the 18-member committee, but that was presumably because he was already on record agreeing with the report's pre-ordained conclusion: academia must stop favoring male scientists and engineers.

How this favoritism occurs is difficult to discern, particularly if you make it through all 291 pages. Donna Shalala, the Clinton administration veteran who led the committee, begins the report with a story of male chauvinists refusing to give tenure to a promising young scholar (herself) just because she was a woman, but that happened three decades ago. Buried deep in the report is a more recent datum: when a woman is up for tenure today in science or engineering, her odds of being approved are the same as a man's.

The report says that women are discouraged from going into science because of social pressure and "unintentional" and "unconscious" biases — which may well exist. But Shalala's committee is so determined to blame everything on discrimination that it dismisses other factors without giving them a fair hearing.

You can get a sense of its spirit of inquiry from "findings" like this one: "The academic success of girls now equals or exceeds that of boys at the high school and college levels, rendering moot all discussions of the biological and social factors that once produced sex differences in achievement at these levels."

It may seem moot to the Shalala committee, composed mainly of university administrators and scientists who don't study sex differences (or are hostile to the idea that they exist). But it's not moot to the scientists who've documented persistent differences.

I consulted half a dozen of these experts about the report, and they all dismissed it as a triumph of politics over science. It's classic rent-seeking by a special-interest group that stands to get more money and jobs if the recommendations are adopted.

"I am embarrassed," said Linda Gottfredson of the University of Delaware, "that this female-dominated panel of scientists would ignore decades of scientific evidence to justify an already disproved conclusion, namely, that the sexes do not differ in career-relevant interests and abilities."

One well-documented difference is the disproportionately large number of boys scoring in the top percentile of the SAT math test. And when you compare boy math whizzes with girl math whizzes, more differences appear. The boys score much higher on the math portion of the SAT than on the verbal, whereas the girls are more balanced — high on the verbal as well as the math.

The girls have more career options, and they have different priorities than the boys, as the psychologists David Lubinski and Camilla Persson Benbow have demonstrated by tracking students with the exceptional mathematical ability to become top-flight researchers in science and engineering.

As adolescents, the boys are especially interested in abstract theoretical pursuits and "inorganic" disciplines involving things, whereas the girls are more interested in "social values," "people contact" and "organic" disciplines. Plenty of these girls end up going to graduate school, and some become superb physicists and engineers, but many choose law, medicine, education and so-called soft sciences like biology or psychology.

After decades of schools pushing girls into science and universities desperately looking for gender diversity on their faculties, it's insulting to pretend that most female students are too intimidated to know their best interests. As Science magazine reported in 2000, the social scientist Patti Hausman offered a simple explanation for why women don't go into engineering: they don't want to.

"Wherever you go, you will find females far less likely than males to see what is so fascinating about ohms, carburetors or quarks," Hausman said. "Reinventing the curriculum will not make me more interested in learning how my dishwasher works."

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Groups Urge Limits On AT&T-BellSouth Deal (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 26, 2006

Washington — Consumer advocates and civil libertarians demanded Monday that regulators refrain from approving AT&T's purchase of BellSouth unless the phone companies accept tough restrictions on their $67 billion deal.

Last week, Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin recommended that the merger be approved, perhaps as soon as the FCC's regular meeting Oct. 12, according to published reports based on unidentified agency sources. Such approval would be unusual, because the Justice Department has not completed its review of the proposed merger's impact on consumers and competition.

DOJ_NMG_0069396

While the two phone companies want the FCC to move quickly, consumer groups say regulators should not rush to sign off on a combination that could affect consumers for decades.

"This merger will haunt the consumer," Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumers Federation of America, said in a conference call with reporters. When the combined companies strengthen their grip on the marketplace, he said, "they will use it against the public."

The merger would allow Texas-based AT&T to extend its reach across the South to control nearly half the nation's phone lines, spreading over 22 states. It also would gain full control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest wireless service provider.

Both BellSouth and Cingular are based in Atlanta.

Consumer groups belonging to the Competition Coalition called on regulators to impose restrictions on the new telecom giant.

For example, they want AT&T to accept rules guaranteeing "net neutrality," meaning the company would have to treat all Internet content in a neutral way. AT&T has expressed interest in charging content providers for speedy delivery of enhanced services, such as video.

Consumer groups say that forcing Internet companies to pay "tolls" for premium delivery of their content would hurt young companies trying to compete against established giants.

"AT&T's approach to the Internet is one which does not bode well for maintaining the Internet as an avenue of innovation, an avenue of free expression, an avenue of political speech," said Andrew Schwartzman, president of the Media Access Project, a nonprofit public interest group.

Martin, an appointee of President Bush, supports the White House's position that tough net neutrality protections are unnecessary for telecom companies.

The consumer groups also said on the conference call that regulators should insist the companies divest themselves of unused airwaves so that potential competitors could use them.

The American Civil Liberties Union also is trying to reshape the proposed merger. Barry Steinhardt, director of the ACLU's Technology and Liberty Program, said the FCC should be investigating the phone companies' possible involvement with the National Security Agency, which conducts surveillance of potential terrorist activities.

"We believe the FCC has both a statutory and a public interest obligation to investigate whether or not AT&T and BellSouth have been engaging in illegal cooperation with the NSA and spying on Americans," Steinhardt said. "We are very disappointed that the FCC has fallen down in its obligation to conduct this investigation."

While Martin may be pushing for quick and unconditional approval of the merger, news reports have said other FCC commissioners plan to include some of the conditions consumer groups want.

On the Web:

Competition Coalition: www.mergermonster.com

Clock Continues To Tick On Wright Bill Resolution (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 26, 2006

Key senator's objections among bill's obstacles as Congress nears recess

WASHINGTON – With four days to go before a congressional recess, Texas lawmakers were still hammering out strategies late Monday to get their Wright amendment legislation past detractors in each chamber.

A packed congressional schedule is complicating plans for a quick resolution, despite a breakthrough last week, when Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison won the support of a key senator who had objected to parts of the bill.

The House and the Senate could still pass bills this week that would lift federal flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, though lawmakers said they were unsure exactly how the procedures would play out.

Congress is expected to return for a lame-duck session after the November elections, but passing legislation then would face even more hurdles.

The Wright legislation would clear quickly this week – under a procedure that wouldn't even require a formal recorded vote – if its supporters could overcome the objections of Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Ms. Hutchison, R-Texas, won over the chairman of the committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., by agreeing to remove a phrase exempting the deal from antitrust laws and replacing it with other protective language.

But Mr. Leahy has not signed off. The rules of the Senate allow a single member to stand in the way of legislation, forcing the sponsor to line up votes to maneuver around the opposition.

"He's not ready yet to make a final decision," Ms. Hutchison said after speaking with Mr. Leahy on Monday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0069397

Ms. Hutchison said she's trying to find new language that would satisfy him along with creators of the compromise. It's also possible, she said, "he will agree that we've done so much and we've come so far that he's OK."

Last resort

Forcing a vote on the Senate floor would be a last resort, depending on whether she can secure floor time against competing legislation. "We may be able" to pass the bill this week, she said. "We're still in play. We're just going to keep working it."

House members remained confident of their chances, even though they also faced competition for a calendar packed with dozens of other bills intended to clear this week.

"I think we're going to get it done," said Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Dallas, one of the 18 Texas House members co-sponsoring the bill.

House members from North Texas had planned to move an original version of the bill – with an antitrust exemption – and ignore changes made by the House Judiciary Committee.

If any member objected to the effort on the House floor, the legislation would need a two-thirds vote to pass.

Now, House lawmakers are weighing whether to substitute the latest Senate language or move forward with their original version. If the House and Senate passed different bills, they'd be delayed further by having to call a conference committee to reconcile the versions.

Consumer groups' view

Two prominent consumer groups that oppose the deal, Consumers Union and Consumer Federation of America, wrote to House Democratic leaders Monday to protest the plan to bypass the House Judiciary Committee version of the legislation.

Officials at the consumer groups said the move would "harm consumers and competition in the Southeast and Southwest" and "constitute a breakdown of rational governance."

The legislation in both bodies would repeal the 1979 Wright law in 2014, while immediately allowing one-stop flights anywhere if they first stopped inside the nine-state Wright perimeter.

It would also cut the number of available gates at Love from 32 to 20, part of an effort to compensate for an expected increase in noise and traffic at the Dallas airport. Nineteen gates are now operational.

Competition concerns

The gate reduction has sparked concerns about airline competition in North Texas.

A study released Monday by a law firm representing owners of a six-gate terminal that would be demolished under the agreement said consumers would lose out on at least $343 million in annual savings under the deal.

The figure represents the difference between offering nonstop flights and the one-stop flights outlined in the Wright compromise, according to the study by Northeastern University economist Steven Morrison.

The study used federal data to calculate that consumers would save $726 million annually from full repeal vs. $117 million to $383 million a year from through-ticketing over the eight-year period.

The federal legislation would implement a June compromise by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

Their agreement will be voided if Congress doesn't pass legislation by Dec. 31.

"The problem is we're kind of running out of time," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

But talks continue to address Mr. Leahy's concerns, Mr. Cornyn said. "And as long as we're having productive conversations, I think hope remains," he said.

Merger Trend Sweeping Big Exchanges Cascades Toward 'Interdealer Brokers' (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Alistair Macdonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

The urge to merge among exchanges is spreading.

With NYSE Group Inc. working to finalize its deal with Euronext NV and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. considering whether to buy the 75% of London Stock Exchange PLC it doesn't already own, exchanges look ready to embark on another new chapter, with exchange-like brokers such as Icap PLC and eSpeed Inc. now lining up as possible partners of bigger, more traditional players.

These firms are lesser-known than the NYSE and the LSE but are key players in the trading of bonds, currencies and derivatives that are increasingly popular among hedge funds, which control a big slice of the trading on Wall Street.

Already a number of deals among these nimble players appear to be percolating. U.S. private-equity firm Hellman & Friedman has held a call with Collins Stewart Tullett, the British financial-services company, about Tullett Prebon, its "interdealer broker" unit that mainly handles trades between large Wall Street firms in bonds and other financial instruments, a person familiar with the matter said. While the current state of talks is not known, Hellman & Friedman could use its position as a large shareholder and board member at Nasdaq and a former suitor to Collins Stewart to try to bring the two companies together, a person familiar with the matter said.

DOJ_NMG_0069398

Another big Treasury trading firm, eSpeed, held preliminary talks earlier this year with CBOT Holdings Inc., owner of the Chicago Board of Trade, about possible future combinations, people familiar with the matter said. But the two firms didn't specifically discuss a merger and already have a relationship working together in bond trading, one of these people said.

Yesterday, Icap said it held talks with the London Stock Exchange, which have now ended. "This dialogue ... is a real harbinger of the sort of changes we may see in the landscape in the next few years," Michael Spencer, Icap's chief executive, said in an interview with Dow Jones Newswires. "It is an inevitability you will see global exchange groups emerge."

Each interdealer broker tends to focus on one or two key areas, so in some ways it makes sense for them to join forces. Icap embraced electronics early and has broadened its product base in Europe and the U.S. more than its peers.

"It's a natural evolution for there to be some consolidation of interdealer brokers and exchanges," says Jane Wheeler, senior managing director at investment banking firm Evercore Partners. Some bankers predict that the five major interdealer brokers will merge into each other -- continuing an earlier round of consolidation -- leaving fewer players in control of this lucrative corner of Wall Street trading.

Exchanges, flush with cash and high stock price valuations, may parachute in to buy these firms instead. As well, the small firms themselves are fierce rivals that could be reluctant to partner up with each other, leaving the door open for bigger exchanges to make their move.

"We do the same thing an exchange does -- we match buyers and sellers and are paid a commission. We play a neutral role just like an exchange does," says Christopher Giancarlo, executive vice president of corporate development, GFI Group Inc., a large interdealer broker with a big business in credit derivatives. Mr. Giancarlo declined to comment on whether GFI is talking to anyone, but the company's fast-growing business could be attractive for numerous exchange groups including NYSE and Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.

In August 2005, Hellman and two other private-equity firms began takeover talks with Collins Stewart. The talks, which stalled over price, were with Blackstone Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, according to people familiar with the matter. Hellman also owns a big stake in Nasdaq and sits on the company's board. Tullett Prebon is the second-largest interdealer broker after Icap.

London-listed Collins Stewart is currently breaking apart its two main businesses, a stockbroker and the larger interdealer broker Tullett Prebon. Collins Stewart was floated as a public company in October 2000 and expanded rapidly by snapping up interdealer broker Tullett & Tokyo Liberty, becoming the world's second-biggest interdealer broker after buying Prebon in 2004.

ESpeed, a smaller interdealer broker primarily focused on the U.S. Treasury market, could fit better with the CBOT because both firms have a long history in trading Treasury bonds and many customers who use the eSpeed trading platform also do a lot of trading on the CBOT.

Over-the-counter derivatives dwarf exchange trading. The total value of the underlying instruments on derivatives totaled about $285 trillion at the end of 2005, up from about $94 trillion five years before, according to the Bank for International Settlements, an association of central banks based in Switzerland.

While stock exchanges dominate in plain-vanilla stocks, products that trade over the counter like currencies, bonds and their derivatives are becoming popular plays for hedge funds and driving the growth of interdealer brokers.

Derivatives markets have seen the real explosion in growth, as investors use them to hedge risk such as the effects of rising interest rates or the potential for companies to miss payments on debt, and because some funds, such as hedge funds, try to profit on fluctuations in their values.

Most smaller players, including Tullett Prebon, are trying to make more of their business electronic, as opposed to tying up phone lines. They are also being forced to look for ways to diversify their earnings as competition has driven down the fees they collect on trades. Commission rates on trades have been going down 2% every year for the last five years, says Geoff Miller, an analyst at Bridgewell Group PLC in London.

Write to Aaron Lucchetti at aaron.lucchetti@wsj.com1 and Alistair MacDonald at alistair.macdonald@wsj.com2

Hoping To Be A Model, I.B.M. Will Put Its Patent Filings Online (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

I.B.M., the nation's largest patent holder, will publish its patent filings on the Web for public review as part of a new policy that the company hopes will be a model for others.

If widely adopted, the policy could help to curb the rising wave of patent disputes and patent litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0069399

The policy, being announced today, includes standards like clearly identifying the corporate ownership of patents, to avoid filings that cloak authorship under the name of an individual or dummy company. It also asserts that so-called business methods alone — broad descriptions of ideas, without technical specifics — should not be patentable.

The move by I.B.M. does carry business risks. Patents typically take three or four years after filing to be approved by the patent office. Companies often try to keep patent applications private for as long as possible, to try to hide their technical intentions from rivals.

"Competitors will know years ahead in some cases what fields we're working on," said John Kelly, senior vice president for technology and intellectual property at I.B.M. "We've decided we'll take that risk and seek our competitive advantage elsewhere."

The more open approach, I.B.M. says, is intended as a step toward improving the quality of patents issued in general because the process of public review should weed out me-too claims that are not genuine innovations.

"The larger picture here is that intellectual property is the crucial capital in a global knowledge economy," said Samuel J. Palmisano, I.B.M.'s chief executive. "If you need a dozen lawyers involved every time you want to do something, it's going to be a huge barrier. We need to make sure that intellectual property is not used as a barrier to growth in the future."

The I.B.M. move is partly a response to what it and other technology companies regard as the slow movement by Congress toward overhauling the patent process.

A patent bill introduced last spring in the Senate, by Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, has provisions that encourage patent reviews by eliminating the requirement that applicants give consent. Yet any legislation is not likely to be enacted for another year or two.

"We were hoping that the laws would change more quickly," Mr. Kelly said. "We're not going to wait."

Rapid advances in technology and the rise of industries like software, biotechnology and nanotechnology have resulted in a steep increase in patent applications in recent years. With limited resources, the United States Patent and Trademark Office has been overwhelmed, patent experts say.

The old system of a lone patent examiner weighing the innovative merit of a claim to originality, they say, cannot hope to cope with the surge in patent filings. A result, they note, is that many patents are granted for supposed inventions that are of dubious merit.

The avalanche of patents — many making broad and vague claims — has produced an environment of uncertainty, rich in opportunity for litigation and patent speculators.

The I.B.M. policy seeks to address that problem by taking a page from the open-source style of collaboration over the Internet. Just as open-source software is improved and debugged by a far-flung network of people looking at the code and spotting flaws, I.B.M. hopes that a similar process can improve patent quality.

"This is a creative response to that fundamental issue in the patent system," said Josh Lerner, a professor at the Harvard Business School.

I.B.M. is not the only institution interested in using Internet collaboration to help improve the patent system. Last month, the patent office agreed to try a pilot project of soliciting outside comments on patent filings, including claims of prior art and originality.

I.B.M. is one of several companies that have agreed to submit some patent applications for open peer review as part of the project, beginning early next year. The others include Microsoft, General Electric, Hewlett-Packard, Oracle, Intel and Red Hat.

"These are companies that are stepping up to make a commitment to patent reform," said Beth Noveck, director of the Institute for Information Law and Policy at New York Law School, which will be a partner in the project.

As a company that received 2,974 patents in the United States last year, I.B.M. is trying to walk a careful line. It remains committed, for example, to software patents, which have stirred opposition in Europe and elsewhere. And the company plans to continue to be a leader in patent filings.

I.B.M. also said that its technical experts will spend "thousands of hours" a year scrutinizing the patent filings of other companies.

I.B.M. used Internet collaboration to develop its new patent policy. More than 50 patent and policy experts from the United States, Europe, Japan and China exchanged views for two months in May and June on a wiki, an online site that can be added to and edited collectively. The resulting document is posted on www.ibm.com/gio/ip.

United Reportedly Hires Bank On Strategy (AP)

By Dave Carpenter, AP Business Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

United Reportedly Hires Investment Bank to Review Strategy Amid Merger Speculation

CHICAGO (AP) -- Speculation that United Airlines may be destined for an eventual merger with another U.S. carrier intensified Monday with its reported hiring of Goldman Sachs & Co. to explore strategic options.

United, a unit of UAL Corp., has been advocating more industry consolidation for years under CEO Glenn Tilton and is in better position since leaving bankruptcy in February to take part in it.

The report Monday by Crain's Chicago Business that United had hired an investment banker appeared to add credence to widespread industry talk that it could merge with a carrier such as Continental Airlines or Delta Air Lines.

"It seems to show that United is serious about looking further into it -- it's not just remarks by the CEO," said Standard and Poor's Corp. analyst Philip Baggaley.

Most observers and airlines think industry consolidation is likely at some point, but it's been hard to predict when and with whom.

Goldman is expected to help United assess the value of its domestic and international holdings, advise it on sales or purchases of domestic or international routes and scout for mergers, according to Crain's, citing unidentified people close to United.

United declined comment. "We don't comment on rumors or speculation," spokeswoman Jean Medina said.

Goldman Sachs spokeswoman Andrea Rachman said the New York investment bank also declined comment.

Shares in UAL rose 63 cents, or 2.3 percent, to close at $28.45 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Tilton has been increasingly signaling the possible involvement of United, the nation's second-largest carrier, in industry consolidation. He said in Chicago last week that the company is on solid footing to participate in the merger and acquisition market following three years of restructuring in bankruptcy, which ended in February.

He has not speculated on which airlines might come into play, but has said repeatedly that United will consider opportunities that arise.

"As we emerge from a difficult five years, it is time for us to begin to seize new opportunities," he said Monday in a speech to a transportation conference in Memphis. "United fully intends to expand our global reach to compete in the worlds fastest-growing markets."

Continental Airlines Inc., parent of the fifth-largest U.S. carrier, has long been considered a good potential partner for United because of a complementary route network. Delta Air Lines Inc., currently restructuring in bankruptcy, has been speculated about for similar reasons. Either merger would create the largest U.S. airline.

Michael Roach, consultant with the Roach and Sbarra airline consultancy, said US Airways Group Inc. could also make sense as a partner, even though United was rejected in its 2000 bid to acquire US Airways for $4.3 billion cash and $7.3 billion in debt.

A pairing with AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, meanwhile, doesn't make sense because it likely would be scuttled by antitrust regulators as too big, he said. Likewise, Northwest Airlines Corp. would be a problem because United and Northwest control Pacific routes.

Northwest also may be able to block any United-Continental pairing under a November 2000 agreement with Continental that gives it the right to block certain business combinations.

Roach sees a deal of some kind as likely within the next 12 to 18 months, depending on airlines overcoming regulatory and other obstacles.

"There's a lot of impetus for consolidation in the industry," he said. "But these deals are incredibly complicated, both to negotiate and to put together."

The only merger in the past five years occurred last year with America West's acquisition of the bankrupt former US Airways.

Nokia's Loudeye Buyout Gets Regulator OK (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

Nokia's $60 Million Acquisition of Loudeye Gets Approval From U.S. Regulators

SEATTLE (AP) -- Loudeye Corp., a digital music distributor, on Monday said U.S. regulators approved its acquisition by Finnish cell-phone maker Nokia Inc.

Loudeye said it received early termination of the waiting period from the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department.

In early August, Nokia said it would buy Loudeye for about $60 million, as a way to expand its mobile digital music offerings.

The deal is expected to close in the fourth quarter, and is still pending shareholder approval and other conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0069401

Shares of Loudeye closed unchanged at $4.43 on the Nasdaq, then gained 2 cents in after-hours trading on the INET electronic exchange. American shares of Nokia rose 26 cents to close at $19.65 on the New York Stock Exchange and were unchanged in late trading.

EU Shippers To Lose Antitrust Immunity (AP)

AP, September 26, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium --European Union governments agreed Monday to open up shipping routes to competition from October 2008, ending a 20-year antitrust immunity law for liner conferences -- groups of shipping companies that strike special trade deals.

These scheduled sea freight transport carriers -- grouped in cartels -- have been fixing prices since the 1870s, enjoying immunity from antitrust laws across the world.

The European Commission said the EU economy as whole stood to benefit from lower transport prices and more competitive exports that should result from liberalizing the market. It expects the cost of sea containers to drop after price-fixing falls away.

It will in the future be able to apply antitrust rules to shipping routes -- both scheduled and unscheduled -- to and from Europe and within the same country.

The EU executive said last year that the cartel exemption should be scrapped because shipping had changed considerably over the past 20 years and it no longer needed special treatment.

It said it realized that liner conferences still receive antitrust immunity in other parts of the world and would urge other governments to liberalize the sector.

These liner carriers transport goods accounting for 40 percent of the EU's external trade income by sea.

Antitrust regulations are usually decided by EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, but the former Dutch transport minister -- a member of P&O Nedlloyd's supervisory board for 13 years -- bowed out to avoid conflict-of-interest concerns. She resigned from the board when she became commissioner.

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Blocks Leasing Plan For Alaska (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25 — The Interior Department's plan to sell oil and natural gas leases within 389,000 acres of shallow lakes and wildlife-rich tundra in northern Alaska was blocked Monday by a federal judge in Anchorage who ruled that the department had failed to do a sufficiently broad analysis of the plan's environmental impact.

The ruling was the most recent in a string of legal setbacks for the Bush administration's public-lands policies. In each case, federal judges said the government had failed to adhere to environmental requirements.

The decision, by Judge James K. Singleton Jr., affects an area in the northeastern part of Alaska's National Petroleum Reserve, 23.5 million acres set aside in 1923 by the government for future energy needs. The area between the Beaufort Sea and Teshekpuk Lake, which dominates a region speckled with hundreds of small lakes, is important to migratory birds from two continents.

It is also part of the range of a large caribou herd that spends its summers near the sea to escape Alaska's aggressive insects.

The Audubon Society, the Alaska Wilderness League and other environmental groups had sued to block former Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton's decision in January to lease parts of the Teshekpuk Lake area that had been placed off limits by earlier interior secretaries, from James Watt in the Reagan administration to Bruce Babbitt in the Clinton administration.

Their claims focused most closely on the potential damage to wildfowl, which use the area to molt and breed. When they have molted and are waiting for their flight feathers to grow, these birds are particularly sensitive, and the groups argued that the protections the Interior Department proposed for the area — including keeping 242,000 acres of the 389,000 off limits to any permanent surface structures other than pipelines — were insufficient.

Judge Singleton, however, was less persuaded by the environmental groups' arguments about wildfowl protection than by the department's failure to assess cumulative environmental effects, particularly on caribou, of energy development throughout the petroleum reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0069402

He also rejected the department's arguments that the final document allowing the lease sales was not, in itself, subject to full environmental analysis. Once sold, Judge Singleton said, the leases "may prove difficult, if not impossible, to change subsequently."

Stan Senner, the president of Audubon Alaska, the lead plaintiff in the suit, said Monday, "Teshekpuk Lake is of critical international importance for migratory birds and other wildlife, and this decision gives us a reprieve and a chance to work for permanent protection of that very special place."

Mayor Edward S. Itta of the North Slope Borough, whose 7,000 residents hunt and fish in the area, was not available for comment. His aides said he had gone whaling.

His spokesman, David Harding, said he was pleased with the decision, but, "We hope that there will be an opportunity to go back to the table and try to work out something that's in everyone's best interest."

The other recent rulings blocked administration efforts to divert water from the Black Canyon of the Gunnison, a national park in Colorado; to allow some logging at Giant Sequoia National Monument in California; and, last week, to open some of the 49 million acres of roadless national forest to logging and mining.

3 State Cases Not Connected To Spinach (WP)

By Dan Morse

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Maryland public health officials said yesterday that three of the state's four pending cases of E. coli O157 illness are not linked to a nationwide outbreak caused by bad spinach.

Officials continue to investigate the death of an 86-year-old Hagerstown woman and hope to receive test results within a week. But those results might prove inconclusive, because of problems associated with a sample. All told, only three of the state's 10 cases have conclusively been linked to the bad bagged spinach from California.

The nationwide outbreak, which has infected 175 people in 25 states, has been traced to fresh spinach from three counties in and around Salinas Valley in California, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Among those ill, the CDC said, 53 percent were hospitalized; 16 percent developed a type of kidney failure called hemolytic uremic syndrome; and an adult in Wisconsin died. Two other deaths -- a child in Idaho and the Hagerstown woman -- might be linked to the bad spinach.

On Sunday, the Food and Drug Administration said the public "can be confident" that fresh spinach grown outside the implicated areas can be consumed but warned consumers not to eat spinach if they don't didn't know where it is from. The outbreak does not involve frozen or canned spinach.

In Maryland, officials with the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene announced Friday that they had studied 10 recent cases of E. coli O157. As of yesterday, six of the cases were not connected to the spinach; three were connected; and one was inconclusive, officials said. The three positive cases are all children, all of whom are recovering.

State officials, citing privacy concerns, declined to identify where the children reside. Inquiries to county health officials in Maryland also did not reveal where the children live. Five jurisdictions that responded to inquiries -- Montgomery, Charles, Anne Arundel and Baltimore counties as well as Baltimore City -- said the children did not live in their jurisdictions.

Also unclear was the condition and timing of tests taken in the Hagerstown case. Rod MacRae, a spokesman for the Washington County Health Department, said he had been instructed to refer questions to state officials. John Hammond, a spokesman for the health department, said officials there were seeking legal advice on whether privacy rules would allow them to discuss a specific case.

According to family members of June Dunning, the Hagerstown woman who died, Dunning ate bagged spinach Aug. 28, Aug. 30 and Sept. 1. She became sick and on Sept. 2 entered a local hospital, where her condition rapidly deteriorated. Doctors removed part of her colon Sept. 5.

About Sept. 6 or 7, a test showed Dunning had E. coli, according to her son-in-law Warren Swartz. Dunning died Sept. 13. The next day, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration issued an alert about a possible nationwide outbreak linked to bad bagged spinach. Swartz said he was able to obtain leftovers from the bag of spinach his mother-in-law had used, and he gave the sample to local officials.

According to a report published last week in the Hagerstown Herald-Mail, MacRae said Washington County had sent a sample taken from Dunning to a state lab Sept. 19 and sent a sample of the spinach she consumed to a state lab Sept. 20. It is unclear whether any samples were sent sooner.

Corinne Swartz, Dunning's daughter, said that even though tests have not confirmed a connection between her mother's death and the spinach, she believes there is one. Family members described Dunning as relatively healthy, and they noted how quickly she became ill after eating the spinach.

DOJ_NMG_0069403

Study Warns Of Rapid Rise In Earth's Temperature (WSJ)

By Gautam Naik

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

A study warns that the Earth's temperature is approaching a level not seen in a million years, implying that we are getting close to "dangerous" levels of human pollution.

The study finds that, while the world warmed slowly during the century to 1975, it has warmed at a more rapid rate of about 0.2 degrees Celsius (0.36 degrees Fahrenheit) per decade thereafter. The researchers say the global mean temperature is now within one degree Celsius (1.8 degrees Fahrenheit) of the maximum mean temperature of the past million years. Based on a 0.2-degree-Celsius increase per decade, that high point could be reached within 50 years.

The authors' conclusion: Further warming of one degree Celsius could suggest a critical level after which potential consequences -- such as higher sea levels and species extinction -- might be especially hard to manage.

"If further global warming reaches two or three degrees Celsius, we will likely see changes that make Earth a very different planet from the one we know," said James Hansen, lead author and head of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Goddard Institute for Space Studies in New York, in a prepared statement. "The last time it was that warm was in the middle Pliocene, about three million years ago, when sea levels were estimated to have been 25 meters (80 feet) higher than today."

The researchers also suggest that an increased temperature difference between the Western and Eastern Pacific could increase the likelihood of strong El Niños, such as occurred in 1983 and 1998. An El Niño is a large climactic disturbance rooted in the tropical Pacific Ocean that recurs every few years and is linked to extreme weather patterns of rainfall and drought.

Dr. Hansen has taken an active and high-profile role in debating critics of global warming, including the Bush administration. In 1988, he set off alarms by testifying in Congress that a global-warming trend had likely begun. He became a cause célèbre when the White House Office of Management and Budget tried to censor his testimony. Many of his critics concede the planet has warmed but remain skeptical that it is triggered by human activity.

The latest research was published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences and was led by Dr. Hansen and colleagues from the Columbia University Earth Institute, New York, and the University of California, Santa Barbara.

Many scientists believe that the Earth has warmed partly because greenhouse gases released by humans -- mainly carbon dioxide -- trap energy from the sun. The Proceedings paper notes that the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change has the goal of stabilizing greenhouse-gas emissions at a level preventing "dangerous" interference caused by human activity. Although the treaty doesn't specifically define such interference, the authors propose that it be defined in terms of the potentially harmful and irreversible effects caused by sea-level changes and species extinction.

Bay Program Ready To Study Less, Work More (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

The Environmental Protection Agency program charged with cleaning the Chesapeake Bay has decided to reorganize itself, a spokesman said yesterday, conceding that crucial goals for restoring the bay's health by 2010 are unlikely to be met without far-reaching changes.

Mike Burke, a spokesman for the 23-year-old Chesapeake Bay Program, said leaders want a greater emphasis on "implementation" -- carrying out plans to solve the bay's problems. Environmentalists have long called for that, saying the program spends too much time studying pollution and too little trying to stop it.

Burke said EPA officials were concerned about their ability to meet promises made amid great fanfare in 2000: a bay with far less pollution and far more crabs, oysters and underwater grass.

"There's no way we're going to get to those goals at the current pace," Burke said yesterday. "If we don't dramatically accelerate implementation, then we will not meet those 2010 goals."

In recent months, program officials had begun interviewing state officials, environmentalists and other outsiders to hear their suggestions for changes, Burke said. A workshop on the subject will be held later this fall, he said. In all, he said, it might be a few months before reorganization details are settled.

Burke said it is too early to provide specific examples of how staffing or funding might change. He added that it is possible that officials would decide that no changes are needed.

The EPA's bay program, headquartered on the Annapolis waterfront, coordinates the efforts of federal and state agencies across the bay's watershed, which extends from southern Virginia to central New York.

DOJ_NMG_0069404

Over the years, it has excelled at discovering the reasons for the bay's ill health, chief among which are nitrogen and phosphorus, pollutants blamed for causing algae blooms and oxygen-poor "dead zones." It has also engineered agreements between governments in 1987, promising to improve the bay by 2000; and in 2000, promising a fix in 10 years.

But where it has failed is in reaching the goals it sets. The Chesapeake Bay Foundation, an environmental group, recently calculated that when 2010 arrives, nitrogen will have been reduced by only half of the promised amount. By its estimate, pledges to restore riverside forests and wetlands will not be met for more than 50 years.

Because of those projections, some of the program's critics are glad to hear about the plans for change.

"The bay program has failed since its creation to meet its most important pollution-reduction goals -- all of them," said Howard R. Ernst, a political science professor at the U.S. Naval Academy and author of the 2003 book "Chesapeake Bay Blues," which is critical of the bay cleanup effort. "I think now to reorganize is an admission of that."

But others said they doubt that changes would make much difference. Bill Matuszeski, the bay program's former director, said the real problem is a lack of funding: The jurisdictions within the bay watershed have pressed the federal government for a multi-billion-dollar Chesapeake Bay restoration fund but have gotten nowhere.

"We know what we have to do," Matuszeski said. "What we don't want to do is pay for it."

Beyond Black And White: Stalking The Skunks Of Martha's Vineyard (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

EDGARTOWN, Mass. — A full moon, big and orange, is setting behind the barrier beach along Katama Bay, and the sun is little more than pink streaks lightening the eastern sky when Luanne Johnson's 1989 Ford Ranger rattles into a small parking lot at the Wasque Reservation on Chappaquiddick, the east end of Martha's Vineyard.

It is 5:30 a.m., time to find some skunks.

From the back of the truck, Ms. Johnson retrieves a backpack, a tackle box and a four-foot stick with a plastic cap on one end, and sets off toward the beach, where last night she set 15 wire mesh traps, each one baited with fish-market scraps and peanut butter. The first two are empty but the third contains a skunk, perhaps 3 or 4 months old. Its tail is in the air, and it stomps its feet at her approach.

"It's letting me know it's upset," Ms. Johnson says softly as she approaches the trap. "It's doing all the skunk body gestures which say 'I am a dangerous animal, pay attention to me.' "

Ms. Johnson removes the plastic cap from the end of the stick, revealing a small syringe, and takes up a dose of sedative from a vial in the red tackle box. She feeds the "jab stick" through the trap's mesh and the needle finds its target. There is the unmistakable odor of skunk. And then the animal reels and collapses in a heap.

Ms. Johnson opens her pack to find a clipboard, a striped beach towel, rubber gloves and other gear. She slides the inert skunk, a male, into a cloth bag, hangs it from a portable scale and notes its weight — 0.725 kilograms, or about 26 ounces. Then she lays it on the towel, measures it (53 centimeters, or 21 inches, end to end) and notes whether it has the typical skunk stripe (yes, a short one) and the typical shock of white tail fur (not yet). His pelt is still too thin for the microchips she implants in older animals, so she clips an identifying tag into his ear.

By now the quick-acting sedative is wearing off and the skunk is beginning to wake up. Ms. Johnson coos to him as she strokes his fur and checks for ticks, which she tweezes off and stashes in a plastic tube for delivery to a scientist studying tick-borne diseases.

Then she lifts the groggy skunk by the nape of the neck and deposits him in the grass, where he staggers away.

This is Ms. Johnson's third year of skunking on Martha's Vineyard, where she tracks and traps the animals here and on Dogfish Bar, a beach in Aquinnah, the west end of the island. By next year, she hopes, the data she has collected will turn into a dissertation for Antioch University New England, where Ms. Johnson is a doctoral student in environmental studies. She jokes that she will title her project "Skunks on the Beach."

Among other things, she hopes to help settle an argument that erupts here every summer — nesting season for piping plovers and other endangered shorebirds, when stretches of beach are closed to four-wheel-drive vehicles. Opponents of the closing say the threat to the birds is not vehicles, but predators like skunks.

"Because skunks are an egg predator of the rare birds, we wanted to know more about them," Ms. Johnson says. "We don't know even simple questions like what kind of resources are they using on the landscape and how do people influence what they do."

Beaches like this one are a good place to study skunks because they are a good place for skunks to live. "Skunks are an edge species," Ms. Johnson says. "They like it in ecotones, places where two different kinds of habitat come together." With its salt marshes, sand plains, woods, dunes and patches of huckleberries, blueberries and poison ivy, this beach offers many edges and lots of the eggs, small rodents, berries and insects skunks like to eat.

DOJ_NMG_0069405

"They love poison ivy," Ms. Johnson says, pointing to a set of tiny tracks headed into a patch. "I have seen them eating poison ivy berries like birds. I have found them sleeping among the blueberries with little blue lips. Their poop gets full of blueberries this time of year."

Ms. Johnson typically sets her traps at dusk and checks them at dawn. She also tracks 11 skunks fitted with radio collars, so some nights she comes out with a receiver that picks up their signals and a night-vision telescope that allows her to see them in the dark as much as 50 yards away.

"I'll check for a signal and start walking toward the signal," she says. "That could take me to a variety of places. They are not always digging; they are sometimes chasing things like grasshoppers or beetles. Sometimes I find them under someone's bird feeder. Lots of times they are running and pouncing on things, digging, snuffling around with their nose on the ground."

They are accomplished mousers, she says. "If they find them, they will run them down."

Unfortunately, while her research subjects are nocturnal, Ms. Johnson is not. "I am so sleep-deprived," she says.

Ms. Johnson, 40, has worked with animals one way or another since her childhood in Mishawaka, Ind. She volunteered at the Indianapolis Zoo while attending Butler University there, and worked for a few years on the Vineyard, on a nature education program of the Trustees of Reservations, the Massachusetts conservation organization that manages Wasque (pronounced WAY-skwee). Later, she worked in Hawaii as a field supervisor for a bird restoration project run by the biological resources division of the United States Geological Survey and then at a wilderness education program in Washington State.

But eventually, she says, she decided to immerse herself deeply in one research area. And she wanted to find a better way to communicate the knowledge she was acquiring to the public. "I wanted to tell them every choice they make influences what is going on around them," she says. "The general public is so disconnected with nature."

Skunks seemed a good choice, she says, because they are wild mammals that interact often both with people and with birds. Her doctoral program is at Antioch New England, a branch of Antioch University in Ohio, based in Keene, N.H., and specializing in environment-related work.

The skunks of Martha's Vineyard are of the species Mephitis mephitis. "The word means 'malodorous,' " Ms. Johnson says, "just like 'skunk' is an Algonquin word for 'smelly.' "

They typically mate once a year, in February, and kits are born at the end of April or in early May. Except for mating, males live solitary lives; females often den together in winter burrows. But much remains unknown about their denning practices. Eventually, Ms. Johnson says, researchers may be able to analyze skunk DNA to track family patterns and so on.

Once skunks are a year old, they start reproducing, with litters of varying size. "I've seen up to eight," Ms. Johnson says. Their lives are brief — "An old skunk in the wild would be about 4 years old," she says.

Originally, she says, an adviser suggested she study what would happen if skunks were simply removed from the beach. "I said, 'Oh, come on,' " she relates. "If there's a problem, just kill it. That seems to be our response to the world." Instead, her project became an effort to monitor skunk behavior.

David F. Belcher, who manages the Wasque reservation and other reserves on Chappaquiddick, said skunks would definitely go after shorebird eggs if the nests were not fenced, which his staff does every year for endangered plovers, terns and oystercatchers. But once the chicks are on the move, Mr. Belcher said, vehicles are their biggest threat. "Chances are, skunks are not going to be an issue," he said.

Ms. Johnson agrees. She says she would spend this winter, while the skunks enter a kind of semihibernation called dormancy, organizing and collating the information she has been collecting all summer. But so far, she says, "I am not seeing a lot of evidence that skunks are limiting chicks."

By now the sun is up and people — and their pets — are out and about. As she approaches her last trap, Ms. Johnson can see it has a good-size skunk in it. She can also see two women walking toward it with a large chocolate lab, and she warns them to keep away. "Short that leash up," she advises the woman holding the dog.

This skunk is an adult she named Louis, after a friend of hers who runs a restaurant on the Vineyard, and she is glad she has found him. The transmitter on his collar has been signaling erratically, she says, and she wants to replace the collar itself, which she fears may start to get tight as Louis bulks up for winter. Finding him in a trap is a lot easier than tracking him in the dark.

She pulls a scanner out of her pack and scans the skunk for its implanted microchip to confirm his identity. "It is you," she exclaims. "Hello, my little honey-bunny!"

People tell her she should identify the animals she tracks by number and not by name, to avoid anthropomorphizing them. She ignores the advice, in part because she thinks skunks really do have different personalities.

DOJ_NMG_0069406

Gus, named after a Vineyard wildlife expert, is wary, she says. Louis is a snoozer. There are also Debbie, Katie, Rose, Nancy, Babs — all named after friends — and Puanani, which means "flower" in Hawaiian. "This is the third season I have recaptured her," Ms. Johnson says.

A large house is under construction nearby, complete with the kind of grassy lawn not natural to the island. Louis is spending a lot of time there, Ms. Johnson says. "There are just all kinds of insects in there," she says, "beetles, all sorts of things that fly around at night."

But if skunks are not a problem for birds, they do cause problems for people, with their midnight rambles into yards, under decks and even into boats stored on land. More than once, she says, she has left a note warning an unsuspecting boat owner that there may be a skunk under the tarp.

Many of the houses near Wasque are rental properties, she says, and many have overflowing garbage cans.

"I have skunks all over that stuff," she says. "People complain about too many skunks and I say, 'Well, gee....' "

By now, the jab stick has done its work and Louis, seemingly boneless, has been weighed, measured, cleaned of ticks and fitted with a new collar. Ms. Johnson snuggles him next to her face before walking into the brush to set him down on a bed of pine needles under a huckleberry bush, where he will wake up.

"He's a pretty boy," she says as she lets him go.

A Blind Forest Road Policy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

ROAD-BUILDING IN NATIONAL forests is a double whammy for taxpayers. Not only do they have to pay the cost of the actual roads, which are used mostly by the timber and mining industries, but taxpayers must also bear the less quantifiable cost of the environmental damage to the forests they own.

That's why decisions to build new roads in pristine forests should be made only after careful study and deliberation. That was the policy adopted in the Clinton administration, which, after three years of study and public input, in 2001 banned road-building in 58 million acres of forest. But the Bush administration, in a decision marked by neither study nor deliberation, suspended the so-called roadless rule later that year.

The mad dash to open the forests to more roads — and, oddly, to give states more control over national forests — was what undid the Bush administration's plans. A federal judge ruled last week that the administration had failed to do the environmental studies required under the Endangered Species and National Environmental Policy acts before disregarding the roadless rule in the Lower 48 states.

Several states, including California, have said they want their roadless areas to remain that way. But Idaho, which at 9.3 million acres has by far the single biggest share of roadless forest, last week proposed protecting only about one-third of that land. Regardless of any merits of Idaho's plan, no single state should have so much say over what happens to about 6 million acres of forest that belongs to all U.S. taxpayers.

Just as President Clinton had the power to institute the roadless policy, President Bush has the authority to change it — even to change it for the worse. But he does not have the right to change it without the analysis required by federal law.

The administration has not decided whether to appeal. It would be better off dropping the idea. If the administration still thinks its proposal has merit, it shouldn't mind subjecting it to the same environmental scrutiny all such plans receive.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombia Extradites Key Cartel Fugitive (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

A federal fugitive considered by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as one of the most violent and dangerous members of Colombia's Norte Valle cocaine-smuggling ring has been extradited to the United States to stand trial.

Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), yesterday said Jhon Eidelber Cano-Correa, 42, arrived in New York on Friday night, where he was formally placed under arrest by ICE agents.

In 2004, the State Department offered a reward of up to $5 million for information leading to the arrest of Cano-Correa and four other Norte Valle Cartel fugitives. He is charged in a July 2004 indictment in New York with drug and money-laundering violations in connection with the Norte Valle Cartel.

DOJ_NMG_0069407

ICE spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said Cano-Correa had been flown from Colombia aboard an ICE aircraft, accompanied by ICE agents, and was before U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert yesterday for his initial court appearance.

In October, the Colombian National Police's "Jungla" unit, working with agents from ICE and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) in Bogota captured Cano-Correa after a brief firefight that left one Colombian official wounded.

Indictments handed up in federal court in New York in 2003 and 2004 describe the Norte Valle Cartel as Colombia's largest and most-feared drug organization.

Between 1990 and 2004, the cartel is accused of exporting more than 1.2 million pounds of cocaine worth more than $10 billion to the U.S. At one time, the cartel was thought to be responsible for between 30 and 50 percent of the cocaine entering the United States.

"The extradition of Jhon Eidelber Cano-Correa, a dangerous ICE criminal fugitive, is yet another example of the unprecedented law-enforcement cooperation between U.S. and Colombian authorities," Mrs. Myers said.

The cartel indictments and Cano-Correa's arrest resulted from a lengthy investigation that began in the mid-1990s and was conducted by the El Dorado Task Force, an ICE-led anti-money-laundering task force in New York, as well as by ICE agents in Colombia and Colombian authorities with the assistance of the Internal Revenue Service and the DEA.

Miss Koroma said the ICE probe initially focused on money-transmitting businesses in New York, after ICE agents determined that three of the companies were owned by Juan Alberto Monsalve, the Norte Valle Cartel's chief drug distributor in New York.

She said Monsalve was responsible for distributing thousands of kilograms of cocaine, laundering more than $70 million, and ordering multiple killings. He was arrested by ICE agents, convicted, and in May 2002, sentenced to life in prison.

The ICE investigation continued, revealing the structure of the Norte Valle Cartel and leading to charges in U.S. District Court in New York against its key leaders.

Narcotics Seizures On Rise Along Border (DMN)

By David Mclemore, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 26, 2006

Record amounts of pot, cocaine found, along with more potent meth

On a recent muggy Sunday, a Customs and Border Protection inspector at the Lincoln-Juarez Bridge in Laredo noticed something not quite right with the driver of a 1999 Chevy Suburban crossing in from Mexico.

Within minutes, a drug-sniffing dog found 40 pounds of heroin hidden in a rear-floor compartment.

Less than a mile away – and just a few hours later – another inspector at the Gateway Bridge found 60 pounds of cocaine stuffed under the rear seat of a Mini Cooper.

The seizures netted agents $6 million in drugs and the largest heroin haul by customs officials in Laredo this year.

The Sept. 17 doubleheader was just another day along the border in what appears to be a boom year for drug trafficking. Officers at border crossings, Border Patrol agents at checkpoints and state troopers at traffic stops are finding record amounts of cocaine and marijuana.

With the fiscal year almost over, Customs and Border Protection's Laredo sector saw its heroin seizures jump 40 percent. Seizures of undeclared currency, frequently a measure of illegal drug proceeds headed south, jumped 72 percent to nearly $10 million.

And officials are particularly alarmed that a relatively new kid on the block, a purer and more addictive Mexican-produced methamphetamine, is showing up all over the state in huge amounts.

Why is so much smuggling happening now, when the Texas border bristles with a third more Border Patrol agents and double the Customs and Border Protection inspectors than five years ago?

The answer: With greater enforcement and higher demand, drug trafficking organizations are saturating the border in hopes of getting at least some of their loads across, officials say.

Mario Villarreal, assistant chief for Border Patrol's Rio Grande Valley sector, one of the busiest in the nation, said more officers mean more drugs will be intercepted.

"The increased interdictions are the result of the tremendous work by the men and women agents out on the front lines and improved technology and intelligence," Mr. Villarreal said.

ERICH SCHLEGEL / DMN Customs and Border Protection has seen heroin seizures in its Laredo sector jump 40 percent this fiscal year over last. Some say it points to good police work.

Drug trafficking organizations have been stockpiling the drugs on the Mexican side of the border, waiting to move them across, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0069408

But there's another part to the equation, said Jane Carlisle Maxwell, a specialist in researching drug trafficking trends at the University of Texas in Austin.

More drugs also mean more users.

"We have to understand that more narcotics entering the country means the number of people dependent on drugs is going up," she said. "The traffickers just have more customers."

Alarming rise in meth

The illicit drug marking the biggest increase – and the most alarming, authorities said – is the smokable form of methamphetamine, known as "ice."

This fiscal year, customs inspectors at eight ports of entry between Brownsville and Del Rio have seized 683 pounds of meth as of July 5, the most recent month for which data are available. That compares with 627 pounds for all of fiscal 2005.

DPS agents seized 123 pounds of Mexican meth in the first quarter of fiscal 2006, compared with 28.8 in the same period in the previous. fiscal year.

In June, DEA administrator Karen Tandy told a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee that about 80 percent of the meth used in the U.S. is distributed by Mexican trafficking organizations and comes from large "super labs" built on the Mexican side of the border. Three are located at Monterrey, Ciudad Acuña and Piedras Negras.

The rise of Mexican ice – purer and more addictive than the meth produced in mom-and-pop clandestine labs in Texas – is due in part to the controlled sale of over-the-counter remedies containing pseudoephedrine, a chemical used in the manufacture of homegrown methamphetamine.

A state law passed in August 2005 limited individual sales of cold medicines to 6 grams, roughly two packages of cold pills, each month. Retailers were also required to move cold medicines behind the counter and record the names of purchasers.

Also Online

Border patrol drug seizures (.pdf)

This year, Congress passed a law similar to the Texas law, requiring all medicines containing pseudoephedrine be kept behind the counter and sold in limited amounts.

"I'm afraid what we did was create a monster," Dr. Maxwell said. "For it opened the doors for the Mexican drug organizations to get into meth manufacture in a big way.

"The Mexican meth is a very scary thing," said Dr. Maxwell. "That could mean people will get addicted much faster. And meth addicts tend to become paranoid and more violent. It's a threat to the entire community."

In her report on substance abuse trends in Texas for 2006 for UT's Center for Social Work Research, Dr. Maxwell found that treatment programs for methamphetamine abuse made up 14 percent of all admissions in 2005, a three-fold increase.

Phone calls about methamphetamine use to state poison control centers rose to 490 last year, compared with 144 a year earlier.

Heroin, long a flat market for traffickers, also is showing signs of resurgence. The 40-pound seizure in Laredo on Sept. 17 brought the total seized by customs officers there to 185 pounds – a 40 percent increase over last year.

Purity levels have also increased, with Mexican black-tar heroin, the generally cheaper, inferior quality product that traffickers sell in Texas, increasing from 26 percent pure to 38.5 percent in less than a year, Dr. Maxwell said.

Agent Villarreal says that the increase in seizures, while alarming, tends to be cyclical. Trafficking tends to be constant over time, he says.

"I don't think we're moving into some new plateau of drug trafficking," he said. "The smugglers have time on their hands to come up with new methods. So we'll continue working our agents in the field, and we'll try to be more creative in our tactics. The more we catch, the more it hurts the traffickers."

Traffic through Texas

The Drug Enforcement Administration estimates 65 percent of all narcotics smuggled into the U.S. enters from Mexico.

Three of the four major distribution pipelines used by Mexican drug cartels pass through Texas.

But for every strategic advance by drug agents, Mexican traffickers try out new ways to bypass law enforcement's attention.

For instance, Border Patrol agents in McAllen caught a man last June with 38 pounds of heroin sewn into a vest.

Inspectors in the Valley find that smugglers are opting for frequency over quantity, running smaller loads across the international bridges more often.

"We now have more people and are better equipped to conduct border inspections faster and more efficiently," said Felix Garza, spokesman for Customs and Border Protection at Pharr. "The smugglers know that, and they're always looking for ways to beat the system."

DOJ_NMG_0069409

And for the area around Laredo, the continuing lethal turf battle between rival drug organizations across the river in Nuevo Laredo plays a key role in the intensified movement of drugs, said Leticia Moran, director of field operations for the Customs and Border Protection's Laredo office, which covers eight ports of entry from Brownsville to Del Rio.

"It appears the organizations are trying to move more hard narcotics in an effort to make more money, " said Ms. Moran. "They try to put more of the smaller loads of the more expensive drugs across."

State officials said the rising number of drug seizures suggests good police work, not a resurgence of trafficking levels to those of the 1980s.

"Law enforcement agencies at the local, state and federal levels are addressing smuggling corridors and hot spots with a strategic analysis that allows us to better utilize our resources," said Tela Mange, spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Public Safety. "As a result, we're having better successes in our interdiction efforts."

Mexican traffickers may have also been able to take advantage of recent political events in Mexico, she said, particularly the reassignment of Mexican law enforcement and military personnel from the border to Mexico City for the presidential elections and Independence Day celebrations.

"These assignments left the border significantly open to smuggling activities from the Mexican side," Ms. Mange said.

Buying Cold Remedies Nothing To Sneeze At (BFP)

Burlington Free Press, September 25, 2006

Buying your favorite cold medicine is about to become a surreal experience in Vermont. In some stores, it already is.

When you walk into a pharmacy in downtown Burlington -- say, Lakeside or Brooks -- in search of plain old, over-the-counter Sudafed, it's not on the shelf, where it used to be. You have to ask for it. Then, you have to show a photo ID, and then, you have to sign a logbook, which details your address and the quantity you're buying.

In an era when you have to go through a similar screening before you walk into a courthouse or onto an airplane, the new cold-medicine routine might not seem so bizarre -- except that it has nothing to do with terrorism.

It has to do, in Vermont, with staving off an epidemic that has swept through the Midwest and has been lapping at New England's borders for several years: methamphetamine addiction.

Beginning Saturday, when the federal Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act goes into effect, every retailer in the nation that sells certain cold medicines will have to follow the same restrictions Lakeside and Brooks have imposed. A parallel Vermont law, enacted last spring, also takes effect Saturday.

By restricting the sale of many standard cold medicines, Vermont is ahead of the curve in a region where meth has not become widespread. The new laws are a pre-emptive effort -- or, as State Police Detective Trooper Mike Smith puts it, "a substantial preventative measure to keep the meth problem at bay."

Nationally, the meth problem is fed by clandestine, illegal labs that produce the drug using common decongestants that contain "precursor" substances: ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine.

"These are the key ingredients," Smith said. "Without them, you can't make meth."

The intent behind the new laws is to prevent people from buying massive quantities of these otherwise innocuous pills for use in meth labs. The daily limit for the total of the three listed substances that may be sold to one person is 3.6 grams. For Sudafed "Maximum Strength" Nasal Decongestant, that translates to 146 tablets of the 30 milligram size.

These "precursor" laws, Smith said, were inspired by a similar law in Oklahoma, passed in 2004, that led to a dramatic decline in the number of meth labs seized.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration publishes a national map showing the number of "Clandestine Laboratory Incidents" -- seized labs, chemical and glassware seizures and dump sites. The national total for 2005 was 12,139, of which 2,170 were in Missouri. Just 15 were in New England, and one in Vermont.

That one comprised three cooking sites, where meth was being made, Smith said.

Nevertheless, a Vermont Health Department fact sheet states that meth "is not yet considered a major threat in Vermont."

Retail impact

Last week, the Vermont Department of Health mailed out 1,415 informational packets on the new laws aimed at reaching every retailer in the state believed to sell cold medicine -- pharmacies, supermarkets, general and convenience stores, among others.

Some retailers have adopted the new restrictions, moving the medicines with pseudoephedrine behind the counter. Lakeside Pharmacy, for example, pulled 30 to 40 different packages off the shelf, owner Earl Pease said.

Other retailers, including convenience store managers who had yet to receive or read the packets, still had the medicines on the shelf.

DOJ_NMG_0069410

Still other retailers, who were well aware of the new laws' requirements, were conducting business as usual and waiting until Sept. 30 to make the changes.

Among them was Jim Marmar, manager of the Woodstock Pharmacy. One impact he foresees is the additional time required to implement the laws, in training staff and maintaining logbooks. The federal law mandates staff training on how to comply; the state law mandates an educational campaign by the Health Department.

Jim Harrison of the Vermont Grocers Association said some of his members had decided to discontinue the listed products. Among them is Steven Clayton, owner of the Shelburne Supermarket.

"We're not going to sell it," Clayton said of the restricted cold medicine. "We already do enough paperwork."

Besides, he said, "we've got a Brooks next door, so we can send people there. They'll be happy; we'll be happy."

Clayton's store will still carry cold medicines not covered by the law, however. These new products have begun appearing on shelves in the last few months, many carrying the label "New Formula" or the disclaimer, "Does not contain pseudoephedrine." Their active ingredient is phenylephrine, which cannot be used to make meth.

Some of the "new formula" remedies are more expensive. A spot survey of four Burlington pharmacies last week showed the Sudafed PE, the product containing phenylephrine that's on the shelf, cost 25 percent or more per dose than original Sudafed, which contains pseudoephedrine and is kept behind the counter.

A phone call to the public relations representative of Pfizer, Sudafed's maker, was not returned.

Marmar speculated that some customers might be averse to having to show a passport or driver's license, or sign a logbook, and would avoid all that by having their doctors write prescriptions for the listed remedies.

Lynne Vezina, owner of Vermont Family Pharmacy on North Avenue, said she had put the listed medicines behind the counter but was not requiring signatures. She called the new regulations "just another thing to add to your many burdens."

She added: "I'd rather do this than not do it." She said she was willing to do anything deemed necessary "to prevent meth from becoming a problem."

Police support

As retailers express mixed feelings about the bureaucratic requirement, some law enforcement officers are all for it.

Burlington Police Lt. Rich Long said the fact that the city has not had a meth problem strikes some of his out-of-state colleagues as remarkable. He said the Burlington department has hired several officers from the Midwest over the last few years and that "one thing they marvel about is that we don't have the meth problem."

As for the new restrictions, Long said: "I'm glad to see that this is taking place before it becomes a problem."

Statewide, arrests for possession or selling of meth totaled eight in 2003. The figure rose to 32 in 2004 and dropped to nine the following year.

Smith credits the decline in part to an awareness campaign that began more than two years ago, a collaboration of state agencies to educate first-responders and others. The warning signs of meth activity are more widely known as a result, he said.

"We get tips now," Smith said, "where we weren't getting tips before."

Allergy Season Switch (WP)

By Francesca Lunzer Kritz, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Some Say New Formulations Don't Work Well

It could be a tough fall allergy season, and not just because of the ragweed count. Another problem, say some experts, is an ingredient many drug companies have begun putting in nonprescription decongestants in place of pseudoephedrine.

The active ingredient in Sudafed and other oral decongestants, pseudoephedrine will be subject to new federal sales restrictions starting Saturday. Officials hope the limits -- which require that all pseudoephedrine products be kept behind store counters or in locked cases and that buyers show an ID and have their purchases logged and limited to a few each month -- will curb illegal production of crystal methamphetamine, an addictive drug that is commonly made with pseudoephedrine.

But decongestant manufacturers aren't willing to gamble that millions of people with allergies and colds -- who together spend more than $400 million a year on oral decongestants -- will put up with such inconveniences at the sales counter. So drug companies have been taking the pseudoephedrine out of many over-the-counter products and replacing it with an older ingredient, phenylephrine.

Call it a step up for phenylephrine, which previously had been relegated mostly to shorter-acting decongestant nasal sprays, such as some Neo-Synephrine and Vicks Sinex products.

Phenylephrine had been on the market for decades when the Food and Drug Administration in 1972 reviewed all nonprescription ingredients being sold. An agency review panel published a report in 1976 classifying the drug as "generally recognized as safe and effective" at a 10 milligram dose without calling for any new studies.

DOJ_NMG_0069411

But phenylephrine may not have the punch of the star performer it is replacing. Writing in a prominent allergy journal, two University of Florida research pharmacists recently questioned the effectiveness of the 10 mg dose and the clinical evidence offered in support of the review panel's decision.

In their peer-reviewed letter, published in July in the Journal of Allergy and Clinical Immunology, Leslie Hendeles and Randy Hatton report they were able to track down 11 of the 13 phenylephrine studies -- most of them unpublished -- that the panel reviewed. Of these 11, they found, only four showed the drug to be effective at the 10 mg dose.

After submitting the letter, Hendeles and Hatton found four additional studies. Two, Hendeles says, showed the drug ineffective at the 10 mg dose, one showed borderline effectiveness, and one showed effectiveness at 25 mg, but not at 10.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Government Reform, has asked acting Food and Drug Administration (FDA) commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach to decide whether new studies are needed. The FDA's response, for now, is no, because, according to David W. Boyer, the agency's commissioner for legislation, the FDA is not aware of any data that refute the 1976 report.

The Consumer Healthcare Products Association (CHPA), which represents nonprescription drug manufacturers, has issued a statement defending phenylephrine's effectiveness. "No new data has been presented that disputes FDA's conclusion," wrote the group.

But some experts say data published since the '70s on phenylephrine do raise relevant questions. Some of this data concerns phenylephrine's effect on blood pressure.

Phenylephrine was first marketed as a drug to treat low blood pressure, which it does in the same way it relieves nasal congestion, by constricting blood vessels. A 1988 review article in Medical Toxicology found it would take at least 45 mg of oral phenylephrine to begin to raise blood pressure, an indication of the dose at which the drug starts working.

And a 1982 study in the European Journal of Clinical Pharmacology found that only 38 percent of a phenylephrine dose gets into the bloodstream. William Barr, head of the Center for Clinical Drug Studies at Virginia Commonwealth University, in Richmond, and other researchers say enzymes inactivate much of the phenylephrine dose in the gut, before it reaches the bloodstream from where it travels to the nasal passages -- suggesting a larger dose may be needed to be effective. Pseudoephedrine reaches the bloodstream at about 90 percent of its original strength.

Linda Suydam, president of CHPA, says that with many drugs, a far lower percentage of a given dose than 90 percent is sufficient to be effective.

Questions about phenylephrine's effectiveness stand to affect not only allergy sufferers. Many airline passengers use pseudoephedrine to fend off ear pain when a flight starts its descent. "Ten thousand feet and dropping is no time to find out phenylephrine doesn't work for you," says David Eisenman, an assistant professor at the University of Maryland School of Medicine, who specializes in conditions of the ear.

Meanwhile, other experts have weighed in.

Richard Herrier, a professor of pharmacy practice at the University of Arizona, and Rohit Katial, program director of allergy and immunology at the National Jewish Medical and Research Center in Denver, reviewed the sources cited by Hendeles and Hatton and concluded that the data do not show phenylephrine to be effective at the 10 mg dose. Editors of the 2006 edition of Drug Information, a professional resource published by the American Society of Health-System Pharmacists, were "not able to answer the question as to whether it's as safe and effective as pseudoephedrine," based on published medical literature, according to associate editor Elaine Snow.

Results are due shortly from a 36-patient study testing a 12 mg dose of phenylephrine against pseudoephedrine and placebo. The study was funded by Schering-Plough, which for now has replaced pseudoephedrine in only one decongestant product: a Coricidin version. It has left pseudoephedrine in its Claritin-D (for decongestant) line. One likely reason: Phenylephrine is not available in a long-acting formulation -- it must be taken every four hours for continued effectiveness, according to its label -- while pseudoephedrine is sold in four-to-six-hour, 12-hour and even 24-hour versions.

Erica Jones, a spokeswoman for Pfizer, maker of Sudafed and the newer Sudafed PE (for phenylephrine), says the company has seen repeat sales of the newer product, indicating satisfied customers. But some health-care professionals say they have been getting customer complaints.

"Almost without exception [patients] say, 'I want my Sudafed back,' " says Eric Schenkel, an assistant professor of medicine at the Hahnemann School of Medicine in Philadelphia and director of Valley Allergy and Asthma Treatment Center in Easton, Pa.

And a Web information page about Vicks's reformulated decongestant DayQuil (http://vicks.com/pseudoephederine_faq.shtml) includes this comment, which DayQuil spokesman Ashoke Mitra says customers have left on the company's consumer hotline: "The new version of DayQuil doesn't work as well for me as the old version."

DOJ_NMG_0069412

(The reply posted by the company: "We replaced the decongestant pseudoephedrine, used in the old version of DayQuil, with the decongestant phenylephrine in the new version. Both decongestants have been approved by the FDA and are considered safe and effective when used as directed.")

Patients with stuffy noses who are dissatisfied with phenylephrine and unwilling to put up with the inconvenience of buying pseudoephedrine after Sept. 30, may want to try nasal saline spray, which is available at all pharmacies, suggests Larry Sasich, a consulting pharmacist to Washington-based advocacy group Public Citizen. Nasal decongestant sprays are another alternative, says Schenkel, who advises people to limit use to three days or risk making their symptoms worse. Allergy-caused stuffy noses may respond better to nasal steroid sprays such as Nasonex or Flonase, available only by prescription.

But don't expect pseudoephedrine to go back to being an easy sell. Although only a small percentage of crystal methamphetamine is made with pseudoephedrine pirated from over-the-counter drugs, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration, use of the illegal drug is far lower in states that restrict pseudoephedrine sales to drugstores only than elsewhere. While only a few states, none of them in the Washington area, have that restriction, Congress could also impose this limit. Â·

Francesca Lunzer Kritz is a Washington-area freelance health care writer.

U.S. Gives Boats, Gear To Tajik Guards (AP)

AP, September 25, 2006

DUSHANBE, Tajikistan -- The United States on Monday donated patrol boats and electronic equipment to help Tajikistan guard its borders and stem the flow of heroin from neighboring Afghanistan.

The U.S. Embassy said in a statement that it gave the Tajik Border Protection Committee five patrol boats to be used along the Pyandj River border, as well as more than 100 computers and 60 power generators to be used at desolate checkpoints.

The equipment, worth $585,000 will help the ex-Soviet nation patrol its boundaries more efficiently, U.S. official Paul Shott said during a ceremony.

The mountainous Central Asian state is a major conduit for opium and heroin from Afghanistan, with which it shares an 830-mile border.

Devastated by the 1992-97 civil war, Tajikistan remains one of the world's poorest states plagued by unemployment and economic instability.

Tajikistan, Uzbekistan Want Support Fighting Afghan Drugs Trade (BLOOM)

By Paul Tighe

Bloomberg, September 26, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- Tajikistan and Uzbekistan appealed for international support to help them fight drug trafficking from neighboring Afghanistan, the world's largest producer of opium poppies, used to make heroin.

``An up-to-date, efficient and capable Afghan border service'' is needed to combat drug traffickers, Tajikistan's Foreign Minister Talbak Nazarov told the United nations General Assembly yesterday, according to the UN's Web site.

Drug production is one of the most dangerous problems facing Afghanistan and poses a threat to regional security, Vladimir Norov, Uzbekistan foreign minister, told the assembly.

Afghanistan's opium cultivation increased by 59 percent this year compared with 2005, the UN Office on Drugs and Crime said earlier this month. The money generated from drugs is helping fund the insurgency being mounted by the Taliban in the south and east of the country, the U.S.-led military coalition and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization have said.

An Afghan-Tajik border force could serve as a basis for ``establishing the first section of the security belt around Afghanistan,'' Nazarov said.

Afghanistan's neighbors in Central Asia should play a greater role in the fight against drugs and assisting Afghanistan's reconstruction since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001, he said.

The amount of drugs seized on the Tajik-Afghan border in the first three months of this year increased by 27 percent, Nazarov said in July during a visit by U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Afghanistan shares a 1,206-kilometer (750-mile) with Tajikistan and a 137-kilometer frontier with Uzbekistan.

U.S. Training

The U.S. is providing training and equipment to Tajik forces on the border with Afghanistan, Rumsfeld said during his visit. Tajikistan allows U.S. military aircraft involved in operations in Afghanistan to use its airspace and to refuel.

A record 165,000 hectares (407,700 acres) of land were under opium cultivation in Afghanistan in 2006, the UN said it its report earlier this month. In the southern province of Helmand, a center for Taliban operations, cultivation rose 162 percent.

Afghanistan's poppy crop reached a record 6,100 metric tones this year, accounting for 92 percent of the world supply, it said.

DOJ_NMG_0069413

Taliban fighters have increased attacks, including suicide bombings, in response to Afghan and international forces expanding operations in the south and east.

NATO, which leads the International Security Assistance Force responsible for bringing stability to six southern provinces, has asked for an additional 2,500 soldiers to help the 19,000-strong contingent control the insurgency.

Achilles Heel

Narcotics are going to be ``an albatross around our necks and the Achilles heel in the recovery of Afghanistan" unless the problem is tackled, U.S. Marine General James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander in Europe, said Sept. 7.

Afghanistan, which has population of 31 million people, according to U.S. government data, shares its borders with China, Iran, Pakistan, Turkmenistan as well as Tajikistan and Uzbekistan.

Tajikistan, with a population of 7.3 million people, and Uzbekistan, which has 27 million people, are landlocked nations in Central Asia.

They have joined Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan in forming the Shanghai Cooperation Organization with China and Russia, a group that has pledged to work together to combat terrorism. The Hizbi Tahrir movement and the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan have been operating in the Ferghana Valley, which runs through Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan, since the late 1990s to try to establish an Islamic state in the region.

Kyrgyzstan is negotiating an extension of a 2001 agreement with the U.S. allowing U.S. forces to use its Manas air base for operations in Afghanistan. Uzbekistan in 2005 told U.S. forces to leave a base used as a transit point for supplies, troops and aircraft coming in and out of Afghanistan.

Where Congress Is Soft On Criminals (NYT)

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

House sycophants of the National Rifle Association are aiming this week to hobble the federal government's power to revoke the licenses of rogue gun dealers who arm the underworld. A shameless proposal would replace existing law with wrist-slapping penalties and an impossible definition of "willful intent" that would hamstring efforts to close lawless marketeers.

The rhetoric of the approaching debate will undoubtedly invoke sportsmen's rights, but the real issue is the rights of sociopaths and terrorists to make future purchases at their friendly local AK-47 dealer. The House proposal, in fact, would have stopped federal agents from ever revoking the license of Lou's Loans, the Pennsylvania dealer that sold battlefield weapons to one of the co-conspirators in the 1993 assault on the World Trade Center.

What makes this gun decontrol measure truly brazen is recent data from the Justice Department, which reported a startling jump of nearly 50 percent last year in gun crime victims, to 477,000. No one can yet say whether this is related to an earlier N.R.A. "victory" — the decision of the Bush administration and Republican leaders in Congress not to renew the 10-year-old ban on the sale of military assault weapons to civilians. Any analysis is hampered by another gun lobby "victory" — Congress's barring the federal gun control agency from searching out criminal trends in its own records of weapon sales.

Without a hint of irony, the looming debate is showcased as part of the Republican majority's "American Values Agenda."

Representative James Sensenbrenner, the Wisconsin Republican so alarmed of late about threats from the immigrant tide at the nation's borders, shows no comparable concern about armed thugs shooting people in the inner cities. "Crybaby!" snarled Mr. Sensenbrenner in excoriating the mayor of Milwaukee for testifying on behalf of more, not less, gun control.

IMMIGRATION:

Lawmakers Agree To Spend $1.2 Billion On Tightening Border (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25 — House and Senate negotiators agreed Monday evening to spend $1.2 billion to install hundreds of miles of fence and vehicle barriers along the Mexican border as part of a $34.8 billion spending plan for the Department of Homeland Security for the coming year.

The border security spending is just one of several major policy initiatives that Congressional leaders decided to insert into the annual appropriations bill. Others include a mandate for antiterrorism steps at high-risk chemical plants nationwide and the reorganization of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The biggest increase in spending in the bill, on which the House and Senate are expected to take final action on this week, is in the area of border security and immigration enforcement, which would get a total of $21.3 billion, an 11 percent jump over this year.

DOJ_NMG_0069414

This includes money to hire 1,500 new Border Patrol agents, increasing the force to 14,800, and to add 6,700 detention beds. The $1.2 billion for border security is designated for a traditional fence, vehicle barriers and a so-called virtual fence made up of cameras and sensors. That money could also be used to help build 700 miles of physical fence along a specific stretch of the Mexican border, a construction project that the House has already approved and the Senate is still considering.

"It is a major step down the road on border security," said Senator Judd Gregg, the New Hampshire Republican who is chairman of the Senate panel that oversees the budget bill.

The bill also sets aside $4.34 billion for port security measures, including money for 450 new cargo inspection officers. That is up $600 million over the current year. The bill would also provide $178 million for new radiation screening equipment at domestic ports, among other initiatives.

The chemical plant security rules — which neither the chemical industry nor environmentalists were satisfied with — would allow the homeland security secretary to require facilities that manufacture, store or use chemicals to conduct security assessments and then take any steps the owners decide are appropriate.

The Homeland Security Department would have the power to inspect plants to determine if the measures are sufficient. While it could not mandate any specific safety improvement, it would have the power to shut down any plant that failed to honor the generic rules.

The language is stronger than what Republican leaders in the Senate first endorsed, but Democrats said Monday that it remained far too friendly to the industry.

"The threat of a chemical release, is real, real, very real," said Senator Robert C. Byrd, Democrat of West Virginia, as he introduced an amendment he said would give Homeland Security the power to impose broader regulations. "We cannot afford to be so vulnerable."

But Republicans rejected that effort, saying that the agreed-upon language was strong enough to improve security, at least for now, because the regulations would expire in three years unless Congress reauthorized them.

"This is the best proposal we can get," Senator Gregg said just before a party-line vote rejecting Mr. Byrd's proposal. "And in my opinion it is significantly better than nothing."

Democrats at the conference committee meeting Monday evening also tried to add about $1 billion in spending for areas including mass transit security, aviation explosives detection research and port security grants.

"I challenge all of us not only to talk the talk on port security but walk the walk," said Mr. Byrd, the minority leader of the appropriations panel, referring to the much-heralded recent action by Congress on a port security bill that called for a larger amount of grants.

But with the Republicans holding a majority, each of the measures that Democrats proposed were defeated, one after the other, in party-line votes.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency will continue to exist under the agreement, though some members of Congress had said it was so discredited it should be abolished and rebuilt from scratch.

Under the agreement, the FEMA director would have a higher rank, still reporting to the secretary of homeland security, but serving as the president's chief adviser on emergency management, in a manner similar to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon.

FEMA would also now oversee Homeland Security agencies that focus on preparing for a disaster, instead of just responding to them, and it would have an extra $30 million to hire up to 250 permanent disaster relief employees.

Congressional negotiators also added a measure to the bill that would allow Americans to buy as much as a 90-day supply of prescription drugs in Canada, where they are less expensive, and then return home with them.

Overall spending for Homeland Security under the bill would be up by $2.3 billion, or 7 percent, compared with the current fiscal year, which ends on Saturday.

House-Senate Negotiators Agree To Add Billions For Border Security (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators approved a $34.8 billion homeland budget that adds billions for border security in the wake of Congress's failure to enact more-comprehensive legislation addressing illegal immigration.

The political centerpiece for Republicans -- just weeks before the midterm elections -- is an estimated $1.19 billion to help pay for fencing, vehicle barriers and new technology to police the U.S. border with Mexico. Hundreds of millions would also be added to equip the Coast Guard and increase the air and marine capabilities of customs and border patrols.

DOJ_NMG_0069415

"It's a big plus; it's a lot of resources put on the border," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), who has managed the bill on behalf of the Senate. When compared with the same measure last year, border-security-related funding would grow by 20%, a huge increase in an otherwise tight budget year.

Much of this growth can be attributed to the Republican leadership's decision this fall to add $1.8 billion in emergency funds after failing to agree on immigration legislation. About $1.16 billion of this money would go the new-fence account; $492 million is to buy aircraft and X-ray machines to protect U.S. borders and ports of entry, and the Coast Guard is promised $175 million more to help expedite modernization.

Two Republican allies, the chemical and pharmaceutical industries, have their own major stakes in provisions added in the final talks.

For the first time, the secretary of Homeland Security would be given specific authority to regulate chemical-plant security and even shut down a high-risk facility if he judges that it fails to comply with his safety standards. And after years of keeping a tight lid on imported prescription drugs, the pharmaceutical industry will have to live with legislative language that tacitly sanctions Americans' practice of bringing cheaper drugs back from Canada. Mail order, Internet sales and people in the business of importing drugs aren't covered under the exemption, which applies only to "individuals transporting on their person a personal-use quantity" of their medicine -- typically a three-month supply.

Tempers flared as Democrats argued that the same exemption should apply to cheaper prescription medicines that can also be bought in Mexico. And when Rep. Jim Kolbe (R., Ariz.) broke with his Republican colleagues on the issue, Democrats briefly prevailed on a 9-8 vote. But Sen. Gregg said adding Mexico would jeopardize an already-delicate political balance for Republicans, and the Canada-only exemption prevailed.

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry lobby, has angrily complained that any exemption jeopardizes consumer safety. But when Republicans argued that Canadian pharmacies were less a risk than those in Mexico, it touched off sharp exchanges that echoed of the immigration debate all summer.

"That is the phoniest issue I have heard," said Rep. Marion Berry (D., Ark.) a registered pharmacist before coming to Congress. "The greatest danger is to not get your medicine.... I am here to tell you that the pharmaceutical industry robs the American people to the point where they simply can't afford to buy their medicine in the United States."

Last night's agreement clears the way for final action on the homeland bill this week, and as early as today, the House could take up and send the Senate a larger $447 billion measure funding the Pentagon for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

Quick passage of the military-appropriations bill, which includes emergency funds for the war in Iraq, also serves to give Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) more leverage in a standoff with the Senate over the fate of a companion defense-authorization bill.

Write to David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com3

Immigration Reform, In Pieces (NYT)

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

This can't be what President Bush had in mind when he gave a prime-time speech about immigration in May. "An immigration reform bill needs to be comprehensive," he told the nation, "because all elements of this problem must be addressed together, or none of them will be solved at all."

That was then. Now we have the Republican-controlled House passing a pre-election lineup of narrow enforcement measures packaged to give voters a false impression of resolve. Mr. Bush has even given up talking a good game on immigration: he says he will sign the Republican legislation as a "first step" toward the real reform he has said he wants but has done depressingly little to achieve.

Republican leaders want you to think they are hard at work overhauling the broken immigration system in the last days before going home. But don't be fooled by the noise and dust. These are piecemeal rehashes of legislation the House passed last December. They include a 700-mile border fence that would cost more than $2 billion and would not work, and tough-sounding but profoundly undemocratic bills that would allow the indefinite detention of some illegal immigrants seeking asylum, make it easier to deport people without judicial review, and require voters to prove citizenship before participating in federal elections. The latter measure attacks an imaginary problem — voting fraud by illegal immigrants — and would disenfranchise countless Americans who are old and poor.

Among the most poisonous provisions is one that would give state and local police agencies authority to enforce federal immigration laws. Police departments big and small have bristled at the idea, saying they lack the expertise and the resources to enforce immigration law. They say it would cripple crime fighting by severing hard-won relationships with potential victims and witnesses: immigrants who will end up fearing and avoiding them.

DOJ_NMG_0069416

But for every police chief who sees this as a foolish attack on law enforcement, there is a sheriff or local politician, like Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive on Long Island, who is just itching to seize control of his or her own little corner of the immigration battlefield. It's an every-mayor-for-himself approach that would only worsen the ad hoc incoherence of the national immigration system.

Once again it's up to the Senate to resist the restrictionist free-for-all. Republicans have been trying to make this difficult by seeking to slip their toxic measures into must-pass bills for the Homeland Security and Defense Departments. The senators who have held out for comprehensive reform, which includes giving immigrants a realistic way to work and get right with the law, must stick together to defeat the House campaign.

The House's election hunt for border-security sound bites shows how susceptible to demagoguery the debate can be. Anti-immigrant fervor is a flame that spreads easily. But leadership can help people look beyond resentment and fear. Once upon a time, Mr. Bush was a sense-talking governor from a border state who understood this. Now he has joined the leaders of his party in calling on the nation to cower behind electric fences, searchlights and squad cars. It's painful to see what he has turned into, and frustrating, in these days of immigration panic, to keep waiting for a real leader to emerge.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

DOJ SWITCHES SIDES ON 9TH CIRCUIT SPLIT (ABAJ)

By MOLLY McDONOUGH

ABA Journal, September 26, 2006

Wednesday's Testimony the Latest Twist in a 35-Year-Old Debate

After nearly 35 years of debate over dividing the nation's largest federal appellate court, the Justice Department has reversed its previous stance and is now weighing in on the side of a split.

Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Sept. 20, Rachel Brand, assistant attorney general in the DOJ's Office of Legal Policy, stated the time is right to split the overburdened, oversized 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is based in San Francisco.

The circuit's size—it encompasses nine states with a total population of 58 million people—has resulted in delays and inconsistencies in opinions. Brand testified that the appellate judges are known to quickly turn around decisions after oral argument, but that the circuit takes more than four months longer than others from the point of filing the appeal to final disposition.

Contributing to these inconsistencies is the circuit's unusual en banc procedures, which call for 15 out of the 28 active judges on the court to resolve a dispute en banc, Brand testified. In a close case, eight judges, a minority of the full court, could decide a key issue.

Brand was one of 12 witnesses—six in favor of a split, six opposed—who testified about the legislation, which has been introduced by Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Ensign, R-Nev. Their bill would leave California and Hawaii in the 9th Circuit and create a 12th Circuit to cover Alaska, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Nevada and Arizona. It also would add seven more judges, likely to remain in the 9th Circuit.

Legislation to split the circuit passed the House last year, but never reached a vote in the Senate.

The Justice Department's new position and a growing interest in Congress in splitting the circuit—seven circuit restructuring bills have been introduced this Congress alone—may indicate a sea change.

The Justice Department is one of the most frequent litigants in the federal courts. In 1998, the last time the department weighed in on the issue, it opposed the split. But Brand said the DOJ has since come to the conclusion that, while the 9th Circuit has responded to its rapidly growing caseload by being "innovative and creative," it has done so in large part by delegating certain functions to nonjudges. That will only work for so long, she said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who serves on the Judiciary Committee and has long opposed calls to split the circuit, challenged Brand on the Justice Department's sudden interest. "I can only conclude that this is political [and] has nothing to do with the performance of the circuit," Feinstein said.

Feinstein was among those who pointed out that, despite the balanced nature of the hearing, there have not been calls for a split from large numbers of lawyers and judges—the people most affected by the issue.

This is in contrast to the circumstances that surrounded the 1981 split of the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit and creation of the Atlanta-based 11th Circuit. Then, judges had asked for the division after a long debate.

DOJ_NMG_0069417

ABA President-elect William H. Neukom also testified against the split, although he spoke in his capacity as a lawyer from Seattle and not as a representative of the ABA. A former legal adviser to Microsoft, Neukom opposes a split in part because, he said, it would disrupt laws of commerce and intellectual property interests.

He urged the committee to review the entire record, which includes letters from groups of law professors, judges and bar associations, all opposed to a split. Indeed, the American Bar Association, most of the state bar associations in the 9th Circuit, a majority of the district judges in that circuit, and as many as 23 of the current 26 active judges on the 9th Circuit oppose a split.

"The overwhelming majority of our court of appeals judges oppose a division of the circuit," Chief Judge Mary Schroeder testified, noting that past and future chief judges appointed by Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, Nixon, Carter, Reagan and Clinton share her views. "This has never been a partisan political issue for us."

But some consider political motivations a motivating factor. In 2003, two bills were introduced in the Senate to split the circuit after it declined to rehear en banc a case in which a panel ruled that the Pledge of Allegiance is an unconstitutional endorsement of religion. (The U.S. Supreme Court eventually threw out the case because it determined 8-0 that the plaintiff lacked standing. Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1., 2004.)

The Supreme Court's frequent rejection of 9th Circuit opinions was another argument proponents cited as evidence of a need for a split. Pointing to a study conducted by Chicago-based 7th Circuit Judge Richard Posner, law professor John C. Eastman testified that the 9th Circuit is six times more likely to be unanimously reversed by the Supreme Court than any other circuit. Eastman, who teaches at Chapman University School of Law in Orange, Calif., attributed that to a lack of collegiality because there are so many judges facing enormous workloads in the 9th Circuit.

Chief Judge Schroeder disputed that there is a lack of collegiality and focused on what she considered a more critical flaw in dividing the circuit. California brings 70 percent of the cases to the 9th Circuit. Simply splitting it off and creating a new court infrastructure elsewhere does not resolve the caseload problem, she said. Even with the additional seven judgeships, the proposed division would leave the 9th Circuit with 500 cases per judgeship and the new 12th Circuit with 300 cases per judgeship.

Without the ability to draw in visiting judges from the other states, California and Hawaii, she said, "would be overwhelmed and would need at least 13 additional judges to bring its caseload even with the load of the judges in the new 12th Circuit."

The committee had scheduled the bill for markup Sept. 21 to make any necessary changes or amendments should it decide to recommend the bill to the full Senate, but the committee did not get to the issue. Markups are also slated for this week.

Judicial FREEdom (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

The conflict-of-interest fetish continues to interfere with normal human relations, so it's a relief when someone sounds rational on the subject. That now includes the Judicial Conference of the U.S., which last week adopted new disclosure rules for federal judges who attend privately funded education seminars.

The Judicial Conference sets ethical standards for the judiciary, and its ruling is a rebuke to activists who have used bogus conflict-of-interest complaints to try to ban judges from attending seminars sponsored by groups out of favor with the political left. This cause has been a special obsession of the Community Rights Counsel (CRC), a Beltway political operation that has tried to get Congress to limit the kinds of seminars judges can attend.

For example, the Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment (FREE) and Montana State University have for 15 years co-sponsored seminars in Bozeman, where federal judges learn more about the effects and trade-offs of environmental public policy. Such events are common -- typically hosted by universities, public policy institutes or legal groups like the American Bar Association -- and useful in promoting a better-informed judiciary.

The CRC and its political allies have been on a mission to stop federal judges from attending FREE seminars, claiming that these programs are really about brainwashing judges into striking down federal environmental statutes. CRC has filed ethics complaints (later dismissed) against judges on FREE's board, citing the fact that it accepts funding from corporations. It's also coordinated with Democratic Senators John Kerry, Russ Feingold and Pat Leahy to draw up legislation that would regulate seminar attendance by federal judges. That effort has also failed.

Now the Judicial Conference has decided that these privately funded seminars are perfectly reasonable forums to attend, so long as they disclose all sources of support beforehand, along with topics to be covered and the names of speakers. FREE's internal policy guidelines already mandated such disclosure.

The Judicial Conference noted the important role of seminar programs in keeping judges current in law, science, economics and other disciplines. "In view of the compelling need for and many benefits of continuing education," it said, "the committee believes that neither the Judicial Conference nor any other entity should seek to limit judges' access to knowledge or censor their right to increase their knowledge."

DOJ_NMG_0069418

To put it another way, the Democrats should leave FREE alone. And if they really care about legal conflicts of interest, how about going after the trial lawyers who are double dipping on asbestos and silicosis lawsuits? There's a real scandal.

Roberts And Alito Stay In The Cert Pool (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 26, 2006

As they enter their second term, the Supreme Court's two newest justices have decided, at least temporarily, to stick with the Court's clerk-pooling arrangement, despite concerns that it gives law clerks too much power.

In brief interviews in recent weeks, both Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. said they will stay in the "cert pool," as it is called, for the current term.

Roberts said he will participate on a "year-to-year basis," and Alito said the same; both indicated they are still weighing the issues that have been raised. But Alito said that during his first term it was apparent to him that certiorari petitions need to be read closely to determine if they are worth granting -- suggesting some need for pooling the workload.

The arrangement, devised in 1972, radically changed what happens when a petition for review or certiorari comes in to the Court. Instead of being reviewed separately by nine clerks and/or nine justices, it is scrutinized for the pool, presumably in greater depth, by one clerk, who then writes a memo for all the justices in the pool.

The pool drew little criticism when only four or five justices participated. But ever since the late Thurgood Marshall left the Court, in 1991, Justice John Paul Stevens has been the only justice outside the pool, preferring to have his clerks take a separate look at petitions, partly as a backstop for the pool.

In a 1997 speech when he was in private practice, Roberts said he found the pool "disquieting" in that it made clerks "a bit too significant" in determining the Court's docket. During his confirmation hearings in January, Alito said he was "aware of the issue" surrounding the pool. He added: "We cannot delegate our judicial responsibility. But ... we need to find ways, and we do find ways, of obtaining assistance from clerks and staff, employees, so that we can deal with the large caseload that we have."

In their new book on the Court's clerks, "Sorcerers' Apprentices," authors Artemus Ward and David Weiden chart the history and impact of the pool. At the same time the pool has increased the power of clerks in the gatekeeping function, they say, it has made clerks less candid and more timid in their recommendations. "The pool writers are going to be less candid than they would be with their own justice," says Ward in an interview. "It has a chilling effect."

The book also asserts that since the pool was created, "the number of separate concurring and dissenting opinions issued by the justices exploded." In other words, by lightening the load of petitions each clerk has to read, the pool frees the clerks to write more opinions for their justices. By the authors' estimate, each clerk in 1970 reviewed an average of 634 petitions, while in 2000 that number was down to 271.

"This is something they know they will have to face sooner or later," says Ward. "They may be just leaving well enough alone until Justice Stevens leaves. Then the question will be whether his successor joins the pool."

Lawmakers Call Again For Federal Food Safety Agency (USAT)

By Robert Davis And Ashley Bleimes

USA Today, September 26, 2006

While the search continues for the origin of an E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach, lawmakers are renewing calls for the creation of a single government agency responsible for the safety of the nation's food supply.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported Monday that the nationwide outbreak of E. coli O157:H7, believed to have originated on farms in three California counties, has risen to 175 infections in 25 states. One death has been confirmed.

Last year, the Safe Food Act of 2005 was introduced in the Senate by Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., and in the House by Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn. The bill proposed the creation of a Food Safety Administration to assume all responsibility for food safety and oversight.

Proponents say such an agency would streamline the process of preventing, tracking and containing outbreaks, which is currently handled by 12 federal agencies and subagencies.

But the legislation has remained in congressional committees since its introduction. “In my view, if we already had a consolidated food safety agency … we might already have gotten to the bottom of this latest outbreak,” said DeLauro Monday by e-mail. “Perhaps it never would have occurred in the first place.”

DeLauro has requested a hearing before the House Energy and Commerce Committee before the current session of Congress adjourns on Oct. 6. Durbin has also requested a hearing in the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0069419

Contaminated foods kill about 5,000 Americans a year and sicken an additional 76 million, according to the CDC. “It's a big problem, and it's a growing problem,” says Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety at the Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI), a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture is responsible for overseeing meat, poultry and eggs. The FDA is responsible for most other foods, although other federal agencies have lesser roles. They include the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of Homeland Security and even the Department of Treasury's Alcohol and Tobacco Tax and Trade Bureau.

In part because of safety strides made by the USDA and meat industry, produce is now the leading culprit in food-borne illness, DeWaal says. But the FDA gets only about a third of federal food safety funds, according to a recent government report. The USDA gets about twice as much.

In 2003, when CSPI data showed that the number of people sickened in outbreaks by produce (3,176) was more than triple the number stricken by beef (939), DeWaal urged Congress to boost FDA's resources or create a single federal food safety agency.

A report by the U.S. Government Accountability Office last year called for efforts “to reduce overlap and better leverage resources” in oversight of food safety. The report noted that other nations, including Canada, Germany and the United Kingdom, have combined fragmented systems into a single food safety agency.

Others disagree. “It makes no sense putting the inspection of live animals with the inspection of organic farms. They have nothing in common,” says Peter Barton Hutt, who was FDA's chief counsel in the 1970s. The fix, he says, is more funding.

“The problem is that FDA has been flat-lined in terms of budget for the last 10 years,” he says. “We are strangling the agency to death. The problem is not the lack of ability in the agency. We ought to take a very, very close look at how much money we are spending.”

“Whether a single food agency is the way to go, that is not for me to say,” says the FDA's David Acheson. “We work very cooperatively with our partners at USDA. We each have different regulatory jurisdictions. We talk a lot. We share information a lot. There is a lot of cooperation.”

From his view, he says, “The system is working.”

Bloggers Will Join Bush In Bill-signing Ceremony (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

President Bush has invited bloggers to join him today as he signs into law a bill creating a database of federal spending -- a recognition of their role in forcing the bill through Congress over the objections of senior senators and an indication of how much bloggers are changing the political process.

A coalition of bloggers from the left and the right last month did what the Senate's Republican leadership could not: smoke out obstructing senators, bring public pressure to break their hold and move the bill to the Senate floor, where it passed by a voice vote.

"The bloggers mobilized Congress; Congress did not mobilize bloggers," said John Hart, spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn, the Oklahoma Republican who teamed with Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, to support the bill.

"It really does represent a revival of basic democratic values: that active citizens using tools of technology really can steer the political process," Mr. Hart said. "And what happened was profoundly subversive to the established political order."

The legislation will establish a searchable database of all federal contracts and grants, and most other spending.

The Bush administration supported the database as a way to improve transparency and accountability, but senior senators from both parties blocked the bill through a "secret hold," a parliamentary tradition that allows a single senator to obstruct legislation.

Bloggers mounted a drive to identify the obstructors, asking readers to call their senators and demand to know whether they were the culprits. The obstructors eventually acknowledged their role and relented.

One administration official called the bill the "'Blair Witch Project' version of legislation" because support grew by word of mouth through blogs.

Bill-signing ceremonies give the president, lawmakers and key interest groups a chance to proclaim victory. Bloggers say this is the first time they have been invited as a group.

"There's no doubt in my mind that without the attention paid to the bill by the bloggers it wouldn't be getting signed into law by the president," said Tommy Vietor, a spokesman for Mr. Obama.

"It was a bill that just made so much intuitive sense that no one could understand how Congress could not pass it, which got folks involved and brought a lot of pressure from bloggers on the right and left."

DOJ_NMG_0069420

Some of the bloggers also will have a chance to talk about their work on the bill tomorrow with Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget.

"They definitely showed a tremendous interest and a dogged determination to see this bill passed, and we are happy to invite them to the White House," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

Glenn Reynolds, who led the charge from the right on his blogs Instapundit.com and Porkbusters.org, said blogs have given a voice to the constituency that wants spending controls and accountability. That means lawmakers can't talk about financial responsibility while getting away with profligate spending on pet projects.

"That's sort of the big news here," Mr. Reynolds said. "What blogs make it hard for people to do in a whole lot of different ways is tell one group of people one thing and tell another group something different, and hope nobody noticed."

Part of the bill's success may be attributed to the unlikely team of Mr. Coburn and Mr. Obama. They first collaborated on good-government efforts over Hurricane Katrina relief spending, and their cooperation on spending issues could be the model for finding agreement on entitlement relief.

Antipork Progress (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

As Republicans lurch toward November, they're trying to reclaim their birthright as fiscal conservatives. So far they're moved up to a D from an F, with a chance to still grab a gentleman's C.

In the small favors department, the House this month passed an "earmark" reform to bring more transparency to the runaway process of sticking pork into appropriations bills. Give House Majority Leader John Boehner credit for staring down his party's Appropriations Committee barons on this one; that's more than Tom DeLay or Roy Blunt ever did when they ran the majority.

Lawmakers will now have to sign their names to earmark requests, although the loopholes in this requirement are still large. The rule applies only to non-federal earmark recipients, which means that pet projects aimed at, say, the Department of Defense will still be secret. The definition of a "tax earmark" was also deliberately kept narrow, shielding many of those expensive giveaways.

It's also no accident that the new transparency rule won't apply to the 10 spending bills the House has already passed this year. Meanwhile, the Senate has yet to act, and the new House rule expires at the end of this Congress. GOP appropriators figure that they can block its renewal in January, when the election heat is off, assuming their bad spending habits haven't cost Republicans their majority.

In a better sign of progress, President Bush will today sign the "Federal Transparency Act," which will create a searchable public database of some $1 trillion worth of federal grants, contracts and loans. The brainchild of Senators Tom Coburn (R., Oklahoma) and Barack Obama (D., Illinois), the database will help the public identify the lawmakers who sponsor these provisions. The idea is to expose these favors to public scrutiny and force their authors to defend them.

The next test of GOP spending sincerity is whether the Senate will force an up-or-down vote on the "legislative" line-item veto. This would let a President strike out individual spending items from larger legislation, sending them back to Congress for an override vote within 14 legislative days. A simple majority vote would be enough to override, so this item veto isn't as powerful as the one that Republicans gave to Bill Clinton in the 1990s and was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. But it would still give the President more leverage to kill the most egregious earmarks.

The House passed the item veto in June, but the Senate has failed to act. By our count, some 65 current Senators have voted for a version of the line-item veto at some point in the past. Eleven Democrats voted to give it to Mr. Clinton, and four more Democrats voted for a version of it while in the House.

Majority Leader Bill Frist should give Senators the opportunity to pass a bill designed to end the secret earmarking that has helped produce some of the corruption scandals in this Congress. Win or lose on the floor, Republicans would at least show they're trying to swear off their own worst spending excesses.

Anxious Dems Eye Power Of The Purse On Iraq (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, September 26, 2006

Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win control of the House next year, but his main goal in 2007 does not fall within his panel's jurisdiction.

"I can't stop this war," a frustrated Rangel said in a recent interview, reiterating his vow to retire from Congress if Democrats fall short of a majority in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0069421

But when pressed on how he could stop the war even if Democrats control the House during the last years of President Bush's second term, Rangel paused before saying, "You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?"

Rangel's views on funding the war are shared by many of his colleagues – especially within the 73-member Out of Iraq Caucus.

Some Democratic legislators want to halt funding for the war immediately, while others say they would allocate money for activities such as reconstruction, setting up international security forces, and the ultimate withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"Personally, I wouldn't spend another dime [on the war,]" said Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.).

Woolsey is among the Democrats in Congress who are hoping to control the power of the purse in 2007 to force an end to the war. Woolsey and some of her colleagues note that Congress helped force the end of Vietnam War by refusing to pay for it.

Democrats in the House and Senate are united in their effort to conduct more oversight of the Bush administration's management of the Iraq war, but are not on the same page on how to fund it.

While the Senate could switch hands, political analysts say the House is more likely to flip.

Having lost the last two elections in part because of national security issues, Democratic leaders have been reluctant to spell out their exact Iraq war funding strategy.

"I don't think the Democratic leadership should put that out at the moment," Woolsey said.

But Democratic leaders will be under tremendous pressure from campaign donors and activists to take bold steps on Iraq should they be setting the legislative agenda in the 110th Congress.

"If we have the majority, it'll be because of Iraq," said Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii).

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other Democrats have called for a reduction in troops to begin no later than the end of 2006, but as Speaker, she could have significant power over troop levels in 2007.

"[Pelosi] has consistently stated that Congress must ensure that our troops have the resources they need," said Pelosi spokesman Drew Hamill.

Some Democratic congressional candidates have not embraced their leadership's position of a troop withdrawal timetable in Iraq and conservative Democratic members in the House and Senate could also prove problematic in close budget and appropriations votes.

The Out of Iraq Caucus represents less than 40 percent of Democrats in the House. However, the group consists of many senior lawmakers, including a one Democratic leader, Rep. John Larson (D-Conn.), eight who are in line to chair panels, the next head of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rep. Carolyn Kilpatrick (D-Mich.), and eight appropriators.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), the ranking member of the Appropriations defense subcommittee and the most outspoken Democrat on withdrawing from Iraq, has said he will mount a bid for majority leader should Democrats win the House in November. His bill to redeploy forces from Iraq has 105 cosponsors.

Still, Rep. James McGovern (D-Mass.), who has a bill seeking to prohibit funds to deploy armed forces to Iraq, says Democrats "have various positions on the war" and is skeptical that leadership will adopt an approach similar to his legislation.

He noted that his bill does not have many cosponsors (it has 18), and said despite the influential members of the Out of Iraq Caucus, "we all have one vote."

Republicans are quick to portray talk of withdrawal as a "cut-and-run" strategy as they seek to mock Democrats on homeland security weeks before Nov. 7.

The Bush administration has previously indicated that it presumes that Democrats may attempt to cut off funding for the war if they win control of Congress next year. But the political battle over the war may be fiercer than some White House officials anticipate.

According to a report in The Washington Post last month, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino asked, "How would they force the president to withdraw troops? Yell?"

Battling the White House on the war would be challenging, Democrats say, but they would be emboldened by the election results and Bush's standing as a lame-duck president with low approval ratings.

Abercrombie stressed that Democrats are not going to sever funding for the troops. Cutting off funding is "easy to say and another thing to do," according to Abercrombie.

What's more like likely, he said, is to fund the conflict in a way that will end the war by reallocating money to new initiatives.

"We're going to continue to give the troops everything they need," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

A House Democratic leadership aide said, "The bottom line is that should Democrats regain the House, Democrats will leave no soldier left behind in Iraq. As long as there's soldiers in the battlefield, funding will continue."

If Democrats control Congress, that funding likely would have strings attached. Most Senate Democrats backed a nonbinding measure earlier this year crafted by Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Jack Reed (D-R.I.) that called for troops to begin to withdraw from Iraq, but the amendment did not set a withdrawal deadline. Another amendment offered by Sens. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) set a redeployment of troops to be substantially completed by July 1, 2007 was soundly defeated, attracting only 13 votes. The Levin amendment fell short as well, garnering 39 votes.

DOJ_NMG_0069422

Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.), a Democratic leader in line to become the House Budget Committee chairman if Democrats win control of the House, said last month that he does not favor an immediate withdrawal: "I think we should tell the Iraqis that we're not going to pull out immediately. We're seeking still some positive outcome. We won't leave them in a lurch, but at the same time, we're not going to be there indefinitely or forever…" Spratt is in a challenging race to keep his seat this fall.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), chair of the Out of Iraq Caucus, declined to comment for this article.

For White House, War Of Words, At Least, Is Battle Where It Excels (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — Addressing Americans' views of the Iraq war, President Bush recently told an interviewer, "Most people want us to win."

Democrats heard a partisan implication in that statement that left them incredulous. "Like we want to lose?" asked Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware.

After Mr. Bush said at a Republican fund-raising event in Florida on Thursday that when it came to battling terrorists, "I need members of Congress who understand that you can't negotiate with these folks," Democrats were furious at what they heard as a suggestion that they backed a dialogue with Al Qaeda.

"No one in America thinks that," Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts said indignantly.

As the White House intensifies a campaign to paint its opponents as wobbly in the war on terrorism, Democrats say it is engaging in a rhetorical device that subtly distorts their positions to make them seem extreme or misguided, raising phantom positions and implying they belong to Democrats before knocking them down as dangerous.

Current and former administration officials say some cases cited by the Democrats are legitimate interpretations of Democratic positions through a deductive, if Republican, lens. Other times, they say, Democrats were seeing things that were not there.

Each side agrees, however, that the White House is seeking to draw as sharp a distinction between Republicans and Democrats on terrorism as possible, something it has done skillfully in the past two election cycles. And so far this year it has lived up to its reputation of being particularly adept at using carefully chosen language to cast its opponents as unflatteringly as possible — and to define their positions for voters before they can define them themselves.

If President Ronald Reagan was celebrated for his use of dramatic political imagery, and President Bill Clinton for his ability to exude empathy from the stump, this president, not known for particularly smooth oratory, could well be remembered for his perceived use of rhetorical sleight of hand that consistently ensnares and enrages his rivals.

It is a skill at which even Democrats marvel.

"It has been brazen but effective," said Jeff Shesol, a deputy director of speechwriting at the White House under Mr. Clinton.

Like other Democrats interviewed, Mr. Shesol predicted that the potency of Mr. Bush's political oratory would diminish this year. "I think a lot of us were initially caught off-guard by how effective it was," he said.

The White House began its latest rhetorical offensive three weeks ago in an effort to transform the fall elections from a referendum on an unpopular president and war into one on the Democrats and national security.

In what may have been the leading edge of the effort, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, in a speech about the Iraq war to veterans late last month asked pointedly, "Can folks really continue to think that free countries can negotiate a separate peace with terrorists?"

But the Pentagon declined to provide an example of anyone who had proposed peace negotiations with terrorists.

The Pentagon press secretary, Eric Ruff, said Mr. Rumsfeld was speaking rhetorically and had nobody specifically in mind when he raised the questions.

"The secretary's speech was not intended to be a partisan speech," Mr. Ruff said. "It was a speech designed to raise important questions facing the United States and the free democracies around the world."

Similarly, Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, said the president was not pointing fingers late last month when he said in an address to the American Legion, "We can decide to stop fighting the terrorists in Iraq and other parts of the world, but they will not decide to stop fighting us."

Democrats took that as an accusation that they were somehow calling for a break in the pursuit of terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0069423

And Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush did not have Democrats in mind on Thursday when he said at a reception for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican Congressional candidate in the Tampa Bay area, that he needed help from lawmakers who "understand you can't negotiate with" terrorists. Nor was the president impugning Democrats when he told The Wall Street Journal this month that "most people want to win" in Iraq, Mr. Snow said.

In an interview Friday, Mr. Snow accused Democrats of engaging in "exegetical work" in seeking evidence of something that was not there and "protesting too much" in the face of accusations that Mr. Bush was not, in fact, hurling.

"I don't think the president's ever said the Democrats want to negotiate with these people,'' he said. "He's trying to make a dramatic point you can't reason with them. I just don't understand it when you express umbrage at a statement that wasn't aimed at you."

He added, "I defy you to find a directly personal insult from the president that would compare with, or that is as bald or direct as, calling him a loser or a liar."

Mr. Snow was referring to comments from the Senate minority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada. In 2005 Mr. Reid called Mr. Bush "a loser" when speaking to a group of high school students; he called him "a liar" in 2002 over a White House decision to send nuclear waste to a site at Yucca Mountain, Nev.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said, "At least he acknowledged what he said." Mr. Manley also noted that the senator had apologized for the "loser" comment (but not for using the word "liar"). He said that was in contrast with the White House, which, Mr. Manley said, "sets up these straw men that allow them to lodge charges without accepting responsibility for them."

Democrats are trying to use their arguments to their own advantage. In an e-mail message Monday, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania solicited donations by citing a charged statement recently made by Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, who told reporters, "I listen to my Democrats friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

The White House is hardly alone in its pointed use of language against political opponents. Democrats have countered the Republican description of their calls for a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq as a "cut-and-run" position with a dismissive description of the president's plan for Iraq as "stay the course." The White House complains that that ignores the regular change in tactics in Iraq that Mr. Bush approves.

Republicans often complained that Bill Clinton used so-called straw-man arguments against them from the Oval Office to great effect. Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster who regularly studies the effect of language on voters, said Mr. Clinton was particularly good as president at attacking Republicans for being "partisan," a partisan argument on its own face.

But Mr. Luntz said of Mr. Bush's White House, "When they are on their game, when they care about their game, no one's better at it."

Adam Levine, a former assistant press secretary for Mr. Bush, described the process as taking opponents' positions to their logical conclusions.

"The way that it works is, you take the other side's view, and you articulate what it sounds like to you," Mr. Levine said. "It also is effective rhetorically because it at least on its face acknowledges the other side's argument, even if it is an extreme version of it."

Democrats say that having the Oval Office behind the accusations can make them harder to combat, because they have no similarly powerful platform from which to rebut them.

"You want to smash your head against the wall when he does it," Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said of Mr. Bush. "It's remarkably frustrating, like that kid in second grade who puts his finger in your face and says, 'I'm not touching you.' "

But this year, said Mr. Singer's boss, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who heads the committee, "it just won't work as long as Democrats answer back, and answer back strongly."

He will know for certain in six weeks.

GOP Brass Agonizes Over Leadership Votes (HILL)

By Patrick OConnor

The Hill, September 26, 2006

House GOP leaders cannot decide whether to hold leadership elections the week after the midterm elections.

Their uncertainty is a sign of Republican unease and suggests that officeholders may postpone the contests for their jobs if the party suffers heavy losses.

House Republicans elect new leaders during an organizing conference traditionally held the first week after the election, but this year, leaders appear torn on when to hold that conference.

DOJ_NMG_0069424

The House Administration Committee has scheduled a conference meeting for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week after the midterm, when new lawmakers come to Washington for orientation. But Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said last week that leaders had not yet decided whether to hold elections that day.

The Speaker's office is responsible for convening an organizing conference, according to internal GOP rules for both the 109th and 108th Congresses, but Hastert deferred a question about the the leadership election to Administration Committee Chairman Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.).

"The chairman is working on that schedule," Hastert said.

But earlier in the month, Ehlers said it was the Speaker and other leaders who would decide the issue. At the time, he said the agenda for the Wednesday conference meeting was not yet set.

"That's the only thing that we haven't gotten together," Ehlers said, adding that that was a question for the leaders to address.

Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), whose office notified members of the most recent leadership election last January after much internal deliberation, said last week that she was focused on her reelection campaign and her staff would handle preparations for that meeting. The Ohio Republican faces her first uphill election battle in years because the political climate in the Buckeye State strongly favors Democrats.

As questions swirl about the length of a lame-duck session — Senate leaders suggest a short session while House leaders talk of working into December — the week after the election appears to be the most convenient moment to convene an organizing conference before the year ends.

The GOP's rules dictate that the Speaker must schedule an election "not later than the 20th day of December," according to a copy of the manual obtained by The Hill.

A spokesman for the Republican Conference said no members have inquired about the date for leadership elections and that the office has not done any planning for the reorganization session.

Newly elected Republicans, who will have a vote, are scheduled to be in town only in that first week after the Nov. 7 election, so the Speaker or Conference chairman would have to call members back to Washington if leaders postpone the organizing conference.

Members must vote on the eight elected leadership positions, beginning with the Speaker and concluding with the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC). Each current leaders must stand for reelection.

Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) are not expected to face a challenge if Republicans hold the House. Boehner is widely expected to remain as leader if Hastert retires in the wake of a GOP defeat.

"I would expect John Boehner will stay on," said a senior Republican who has been an occasional critic of the leader, "The conference will give him the benefit of the doubt."

Post-election reorganization could be muddled if Hastert retires because his chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, oversees many procedural matters such as the organizing conference or the Republican Steering Committee, which slots the committees, several aides said.

Whatever the outcome in November, rank-and-file Republicans are expected to challenge leaders low on the ladder, but preparations for a run have been muted because Republicans are so focused on retaining control of the House; open solicitations would be viewed as disloyal in that environment, many members have said.

Pryce may not preside over the races even if she does win reelection because "the Speaker, in consultation with the elected leadership, shall designate an officer to preside until such time as the election of a Conference Chair is concluded," the rules state.

Despite a tough reelection fight and constant chatter about her weakened status within the leadership, Pryce has out-raised many of her presumed challengers. She has contributed $708,500 to GOP candidates through her political action committee, Promoting Republicans You Can Elect, as of the end of July.

The Democratic Caucus also has a meeting scheduled for that first Wednesday back, Ehlers said, but their internal rules have a built-in cushion that prevents them from holding leadership elections that day. Caucus rules state, "this meeting shall not be scheduled sooner than nine (9) days after the November election," according to a copy obtained by The Hill.

A spokeswoman for Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), who would preside over the meeting until another caucus chairman is elected, said details of the organizing caucus have not yet been set.

The Democratic leader sets the time and place of that meeting and must inform members of the caucus in writing about details of the process at least seven days before the election.

While Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is expected to remain the highest-ranking Democrat whatever the outcome on Nov. 7, there could be a rush for other positions.

DOJ_NMG_0069425

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has already declared his intention to challenge Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) for the leader's post if Democrats regain control of the House for the first time since 1994. Other members are expected to mount similar campaigns.

While politics will dominate that first week back, with political Washington chewing over the midterm results in preparation for 2008, much of the schedule deals with procedural matters regarding newly-elected freshmen and legislative matters pending during the lame duck.

The Speaker last week dismissed rumors that members would pass a continuing resolution this week to fund the federal government through the end of the year. Members should therefore be back to at least deal with a large omnibus spending bill.

"Well, it doesn't look like the Senate is going to finish" its appropriations bills, Hastert said, "so we're going to be back."

For freshmen, the week will be full of firsts – as well as some procedural basics, such as seminars on hiring staff and working BlackBerries or the freshman room draw on Friday.

Ehlers said his committee staff sent letters this month to more than 1,800 registered candidates to notify them about orientation week. The session begins that weekend and concludes with the room draw on Friday.

The committee has also scheduled two ethics seminars, one more than in years past, following a spate of revelations about congressional corruption that have plagued the House during the 109th Congress, which includes the recent announcement that former Administration Committee Chairman Bob Ney (R-Ohio) would plead guilt to federal corruption charges for his stint in an alcohol-abuse rehabilitation facility.

— Josephine Hearn contributed to this article.

Medicare Center Names Acting Director (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 26, 2006

A lawyer who has served in two Bush administrations has been named the acting chief of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, federal officials said Monday.

Leslie Norwalk, 40, has served on the senior leadership team at the agency for the past five years, currently as the deputy administrator. She will succeed Mark McClellan, who recently announced that he is stepping down.

As the acting director, Norwalk will oversee the government health care programs for the elderly and the poor. The agency is responsible for $1 out of every $3 spent on health care in the United States.

"She is a nationally recognized expert on Medicare issues and played a central role in the successful implementation of the prescription drug benefit and other reforms to Medicare and Medicaid," said Mike Leavitt, secretary of the Health and Human Services Department. "I also tapped her to work with the people of Louisiana in redesigning their health care system in the wake of Hurricane Katrina."

Prior to joining CMS, Norwalk practiced law in the Washington office of Epstein, Becker and Green. She also served in the first Bush administration within the White House Office of Presidential Personnel.

Norwalk could oversee CMS for several months, or even years, depending upon when President Bush nominates a permanent replacement for McClellan. She will assume the acting administrator role effective October 15.

One of Norwalk's first tasks will be overseeing the next enrollment period for the prescription drug benefit, which begins Nov. 15.

Medicare Debacle (HILL)

By Lawrence A. Hunter

The Hill, September 26, 2006

In an attempt to help stop spiraling inflation during 1970's, Congress thought it would try placing price controls on the fees doctors could charge under Medicare. While the increase in doctors' fees was in fact held to about three percent a year after price controls were imposed, the cost balloon swelled out elsewhere: Doctors' claims for services rendered under the program jumped dramatically, and the overall cost of Medicare continued to go up about 10 percent a year. Price controls failed completely to keep Medicare costs down.

Why did this happen? In a free market, the minute controls are imposed to keep prices below market-clearing levels, demand for the good or service in question rises, supply begins to dry up and quality of the goods that are sold declines. Shoddiness develops and shortages emerge. Just the opposite appeared to happen with Medicare. Why?

The reason is, Medicare is not a free market; it is a gigantic welfare program in which the taxes people pay as workers to support the program are completely disconnected from the benefits they receive as Medicare recipients. The Congress would have us believe there is a lot of "competition" in Medicare. It's true that under Medicare Parts A (inpatient and skilled-nursing services) and B (physician services), patients may choose their own doctors and hospitals, and under the Part-D Prescription Drug program they may choose from among a wide range of private-sector drug "insurance" plans. But despite this competition on the supply side, these are one-sided markets because while producers compete, someone else is paying the bills for consumers. With no skin in the game, consumers have no effective brake on their demand, and health-care providers under Medicare have every incentive to provide more services.

DOJ_NMG_0069426

To be effective, markets require not only competition among producers seeking to maximize profits but also consumers with skin in the game and incentives to optimize product quantity and quality while minimizing their expenditures. Competition among producers without consumers with skin in the game is the economic equivalent of one hand clapping. It takes two to Tango, a pair of hands to clap and producers and consumers alike with skin in the game to make markets work.

In a welfare program like Medicare where government pays the bills for consumers, a surfeit of demand is soon matched by a shortage of supply even though that might not appear to be so initially. When physician fees are capped, the number and complexity (or volume and intensity) of services furnished to Medicare beneficiaries simply increase, including more frequent and intensive office visits, and a rapid increase in the use of imaging techniques, laboratory services, and physician-administered drugs, which will lead to price caps on pills and procedures in fairly short order. (According to a study by the World Bank, for every dollar that price controls reduce doctors' fees under Medicare, physicians recoup 40 cents by increasing volume.)

Yet despite this confirmation of the laws of economics, Congress persists in its hubris to eclipse the economic laws of nature and continues to impose price controls on doctors' fees and now with a too-cute-by half measure reinforces the caps on prices with additional regulatory limitations intended to staunch increases in physician service utilization—all of which goes under the Orwellian euphemism of the "sustainable growth rate system." Under the SGR system, the price-controlled fee the government allows physicians to charge under Medicare is allowed to creep upward each year subject to the sustainable growth rate (SGR) formula, which ties annual fee increases to GDP growth and contains an expenditure target that mandates a reduction in physician payments in the following year if the volume of physician service utilization in the current year exceeds certain volume parameters.

Dr. Hunter is former staff director of the Joint Economic Committee and currently consults for the pharmaceutical industry and serves as Senior Fellow at the Institute for Policy Innovation.

Private Operators Take Calls In A Pinch (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

When a Department of Veterans Affairs laptop computer was stolen in May, putting the sensitive personal information of millions of veterans at risk, VA officials sought to quell concerns by providing a toll-free number to call.

The calls poured in, about 250,000 in all. The people answering the phone, though, were not federal civil servants at the department's D.C. headquarters but contract workers in commercial call centers in far-flung places such as North Hollywood, Calif., Lock Haven, Pa., and Sergeant Bluff, Iowa.

Increasingly, federal agencies are outsourcing toll-free lines in times of crisis -- both to ensure that every call from a citizen is answered and to free agency staff members to deal with the crisis itself, federal officials said. Federal contractors routinely field calls from Americans worried about friends or relatives when a hurricane hits, when terrorist bombs go off in places such as Bali, Madrid and London and, most recently, when war broke out in Lebanon.

"The trend seems to be leaning more this way," said Martha Dorris, deputy associate administrator of the General Services Administration's Office of Citizen Services, which arranges emergency call center contracts with private firms for agencies. "We've got everything basically in a template so that we can work with them quickly so they can get [a toll-free line] up as quickly as possible."

The GSA has answered routine public queries about the federal government since 1966, most recently by contracting out the work to a large call center run by ICT Group in Lakeland, Fla. Operators there handle 1.7 million calls to 800-FED-INFO every year, fielding questions about Social Security, veterans' hospitals and other federal benefits and programs.

In 2001, however, shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the State Department asked the GSA for something more: a dedicated line that Americans planning to travel abroad could call to learn about security concerns in various countries.

"The State Department has this information online, but they wanted people to be able to call an agent and get the same information by phone," said Teresa Nasif, director of the GSA's Federal Consumer Information Center, which oversees the service.

In its first year, there were 27,923 calls to the number (888-407-4747), all answered by agents in the National Call Center in Lakeland, Nasif said. The agents handled basic questions and redirected more complex queries to State Department desk officers.

DOJ_NMG_0069427

State officials then asked the contractor to handle calls about other subjects, too, such as international adoption. Most recently the line was used to help Americans in war-torn Lebanon register for evacuation. The line had received nearly 114,000 calls this year even before the Middle East's latest war broke out.

"We answer the phone for the State Department day in and day out," Nasif said.

Soon other agencies began requesting similar help, Nasif said. Beginning in 2004, the GSA assembled a pool of five companies that could be summoned in a pinch to bid on short-term contracts to handle agency calls that spike during emergencies. In addition to ICT, the companies include Datatrac Information Services Inc. of Richardson, Tex., Lockheed Martin Aspen Systems of Rockville, Pearson Government Solutions of Arlington, and TeleTech Government Solutions of Herndon.

All of the agreements require the contractors to use agents based in the United States, Nasif said.

The system got its first test in the summer of 2004, when four hurricanes hit Florida over a six-week period, drawing more than 400,000 calls to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. That was dwarfed, though, by the 1.5 million calls the contractors handled last year in the aftermath of hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

Whereas the basic contract for the Lakeland call center pays ICT about $5 million a year, more lucrative emergency contracts have reached as high as $50 million, Nasif said.

Mike Walcoff, associate deputy undersecretary of veterans affairs for field operations, said the toll-free line was a timely and valuable service for veterans in the weeks between the disclosure of the laptop theft and the announcement that the equipment been recovered, the sensitive personal information apparently intact.

"Veterans were able to easily get through on the phone lines," Walcoff said. "The information given to them was accurate. The call centers were responsive to our needs throughout."

Some veterans said they found the hotline and a Web page stocked with similar information helpful. Others complained that the telephone agents appeared to be reading from a script and sometimes did not give direct answers.

"The toll-free number was useful, but its operators were unable to answer every veteran's primary question, which was: 'Am I on the list?' " said Joe Davis, a spokesman for Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Report Offers Improvement Plan For Government Hiring (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Complaints about the federal hiring process are long-standing. Job applicants say it takes too long and is too confusing and that they often wait for much of a year without feedback on where their application stands.

In response, the government has tried to speed up the hiring process. Agencies are increasingly using computers to decrease processing time. The Office of Personnel Management has developed a 45-day hiring model. Still, hiring takes time, in part because many jobs require medical and security clearances (and some background checks can take a year or longer).

The larger question, however, is whether the government is identifying and selecting the best applicants. Public opinion surveys suggest relatively few college graduates see the government as a first choice when job-hunting, and a new study by the Merit Systems Protection Board suggests that the government needs to do a better job of selling itself. The board is a quasi-judicial agency that oversees civil service principles.

"The Government does not do an adequate job of marketing itself to a labor force that currently believes the private and non-profit sectors can provide more rewarding, challenging and developmental experiences," the board's report said. "To compete, the Government needs to sharpen its recruiting skills and improve communications with potential applicants."

To address these challenges, the report recommends that the government tighten hiring procedures to emphasize quality and not just speed.

According to the report, from the board's policy and evaluation office headed by Steve Nelson , the government has some bad habits that may be undermining its goal of hiring the best and brightest.

For example, the report points out that many agencies base hiring decisions on grade point averages, even though research has shown that an applicant's GPA does not indicate whether a person will succeed in the workplace.

The "outstanding scholar program," created in 1981, permits agencies to hire college graduates who have a 3.5 GPA or are in the top 10 percent of their class without requiring them to compete against other applicants -- the traditional civil service hiring practice -- and without any assessment of their ability to do the job.

The MSPB report asserts that not all 3.5 GPA applicants make good employees and that some of them are hired many years after they complete college and may hold degrees with little relevance to their federal job.

The outstanding scholar program was created to help bring minorities into the government, but the report indicates that many agencies use it as a way to bring applicants on board quickly for administrative and professional jobs without regard to their minority status.

DOJ_NMG_0069428

When hiring, agencies should put more emphasis on giving tests that measure spatial, verbal and math skills and on "structured interviews" that solicit consistent types of information from job applicants, the report recommends.

The report urges agencies to look at hiring as a business decision to be made by senior managers. "The actual cost of hiring the wrong person for a job -- including wasted salary, benefits, severance pay, training costs and hiring time -- can be up to three times the employee's salary," according to the report.

Agency leaders "must acknowledge just how much impact the hiring process has on mission accomplishment" and hold subordinates accountable when they do not make top-notch hires, the report recommends.

The report also urges the Office of Personnel Management, which oversees government-wide hiring policies, to work with Congress and an interagency personnel council to review the needs of agencies and to make it easier for job applicants to navigate the hiring process.

OTHER NEWS:

Homes Post Price Drop For August (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

Home prices fell in August compared with a year earlier, the first such decline in more than a decade.

The August price data came with a report issued yesterday by the National Association of Realtors that showed further evidence of deterioration in the housing market.

As median sales prices for existing homes slipped to $225,000 from $230,000 in July — pushing them 1.7 percent lower than in August 2005 — sales fell and the backlog of unsold homes continued to rise, the report said. The last time prices fell from their year-earlier level was in April 1995.

But while the market slide is almost certainly not over, the report suggested that it might be beginning to ease. Existing-home sales have been falling steadily in recent months, but the month-to-month decline in August was the smallest since March.

Sales dropped 0.5 percent from July to August, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.3 million units, the Realtors association said. That compares with a decline from June to July of 4.1 percent.

"I'd expect home sales to continue softening, but perhaps not at the dramatic pace we saw a little earlier," said Celia Chen, director of housing economics at Moody's Economy .com. "The markets are just very overvalued right now.''

If the sales trends are leveling off, however, prices still appear set to fall further.

David A. Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors association, said the price drop was a taste of what the market should expect in the coming months. But he predicted that prices would probably improve next year.

"We're in for a ride right now," Mr. Lereah said. "This is the first of many price corrections for the remaining months of the year — for at least the next three or four months."

Until this year, the housing sector had enjoyed a boom of more than half a decade, chalking up ever higher numbers of sales and rapidly rising prices. But it has been shrinking under the impact of rising mortgage rates and a slowing economy.

As the Realtors and economists see it, falling prices may be just what the housing market needs before sales can revive again. In some regions of the country last month, sales rose where prices fell. In the Northeast, sales rose 1.9 percent as the median price fell 3.9 percent, to $271,000. In the Midwest the pattern was the same: sales were up 0.7 percent and the median price was down 1.1 percent, to $176,000.

The opposite occurred in the West. While prices have held steady there this summer, sales have fallen. In August, sales dropped 2.3 percent while the median price rose 0.3 percent, to $345,000. Compared with a year earlier, sales have fallen 22.8 percent.

"Something's going to give in the West," Mr. Lereah said. "The correction has not occurred in the West yet. Sellers are stubborn there."

In the South, sales volume in August was 0.8 percent lower than July 2006 and 7.4 percent lower than August 2005. The median existing-home price fell 2.6 percent, to $184,000, from July to August.

By comparison, data from the federal government has shown prices leveling off for some time. A report from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight released this month showed that prices nationwide increased 1.2 percent in the second quarter, the weakest gain in almost seven years.

Some economists prefer the government's price data because it tries to adjust for changes in the quality and size of homes sold from one year to the next.

DOJ_NMG_0069429

The Realtors association numbers do not take into account incentives by sellers, which could skew their median price numbers higher.

At the end of August, there were so many unsold homes on the market that it would take seven and a half months to sell them all at the current sales pace. The association said that was the biggest backlog since April 1993.

Economists said that as the number of unsold homes on the market continued to rise, sellers would have little choice but to cut prices.

"With the supply of unsold homes reaching yet another record high, there is only one way this market can clear, and that is through even further price falls," wrote Dimitry Fleming, an economist for ING Bank. For all the worries about declining prices, though, Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist with MFR, said the price decline in August should be viewed in the context of a 111 percent increase in the median single-family home price over the last 11 years.

"The underlying trend here is one of stable to modestly lower prices after the sharp gains seen for many years," he wrote in a research note. "It should not be a huge shock that we are seeing a price correction."

Prices Of Existing Homes Fell In Aug. (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

The median price of existing homes fell in August, compared with a year earlier, the first year-over-year drop in 11 years, according to an industry report released yesterday.

The report by the National Association of Realtors also said that home sales fell to the slowest pace in more than two years and that the supply of unsold homes ballooned to the highest level in 13 years.

After a year of cooling activity, the latest signals from the weakening U.S. housing market came as no surprise to analysts, who had expected a slightly larger drop in sales. Many said they expected the market to decline further in coming months, although they differed on the extent.

Existing-home sales dropped 13 percent, compared with August 2005, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.3 million units from 7.2 million. At the slower sales rate, the 3.9 million homes on the market would take seven and a half months to sell, the largest supply since April 1993.

The median sale price of previously owned homes fell 2 percent to $225,000 in August, compared with $229,000 a year earlier. The median is the point at which half the homes sell for more and the rest for less. The last time the national housing market posted a year-over-year decline in existing home prices was in April 1995, when prices dropped a tenth of a percent.

David Lereah, chief economist for the NAR, said he expects prices to continue declining through the rest of the year and characterized 2007 as "the year of modest recovery."

"Prices got too high," he said. "Buyers are not going to buy unless prices come down. That's the only way the bleeding will stop on the sale side."

Lereah said that has already been happening in the Northeast, where the median price is down by 4 percent, compared with the same period last year. There, the sales pace was up 2 percent compared with July and down 12 percent from a year earlier.

In the South, which includes the Washington region, prices were down 3 percent from August of last year. The sales pace was down 1 percent from July and 7 percent from a year earlier.

John Lonski, chief economist at Moody's Investors Service, also said he expected year-over-year prices to decline through the end of the year.

"I would be very much concerned if home-price deflation lasted into 2007," he said. "If that were to occur, then recession risks would approach 50-50."

Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland at College Park, said prices could keep declining into early next year. Home values will "begin to go up again within a year or two," he said.

"With the kind of appreciation we've been looking at, this is nothing to panic about," he said.

Home Prices Likely To Fall More (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, September 26, 2006

Home prices are projected to fall for the rest of the year, the National Association of Realtors said Monday, with sellers being forced to accept a new reality: Buyers now wield the power, with the supply of homes for sale at a 13-year high.

DOJ_NMG_0069430

The median-priced U.S. single-family detached home — half cost more, half less — fell 1.7% in August to $225,700, compared with a year ago. The decline is no doubt jarring to sellers, who haven't seen prices fall nationally since April 1995. The price drop was also sharp, the second-steepest in 38 years.

Sales of existing homes, meantime, fell for the fifth month in a row.

"The housing bubble has burst; this is just the confirmation," says Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors. "The housing market is in trouble right now. I think it's finally in the process of moving toward finding a bottom," which he expects will take six months.

Sales of new and existing homes, as well as building permits and new construction, are all off 10% to 25% in the past year. The confidence level of builders, who are slashing profit forecasts and seeing their stocks pounded on Wall Street, plunged this month to the lowest in 15 years, the National Association of Home Builders says.

"We have a serious correction taking place in the housing sector," Richard Fisher, the Federal Reserve president in Dallas, said in a speech Monday. Last week, the Fed voted again to hold interest rates steady and said weakness in housing was a key factor in its decision.

"This may be the most overanticipated and overanalyzed downturn in history," Fisher said. "One prominent CEO told me the only situation that's received more intense analysis than the housing market was the birth of Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie's baby. "

Still, the pace of the downturn has surprised several economists, including Ian Shepherdson of High Frequency Economics.

"The speed of the collapse has been astonishing," Shepherdson says. "This time last year, single-family home prices were up 16.4%. With inventory still rising, there is no chance of any short-term relief. Prices and volumes have a long way to fall."

To bring buyers back into the market, sellers simply have to lower their prices, said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist.

Lereah has repeatedly cut his forecast for the housing market this year and says he's now unsure how deep the correction will turn out. Sales of existing homes fell 0.5% in August to a seasonally adjusted pace of 6.3 million. There's now a 7.5-month supply of homes for sale, up 60% from last year.

"If we have prices drop for the rest of the year and sales also continue to drop, then we will have a bad situation in housing of balloons popping rather than air coming out," Lereah said.

Either way, he says, "It's a buyer's market."

Data On Homes Cause Jitters (LAT)

By Tom Petruno, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

Housing prices decline nationally for the first time since 1995 and inventory sets a record. The slump poses two big threats to the economy.

Home prices nationwide declined last month for the first time in more than a decade, raising new concerns about the real estate slump and the damage it might do to the rest of the economy.

The 1.7% decline in the median price of existing homes sold in August was the first year-over-year drop since April 1995, the National Assn. of Realtors said Monday. Also, the number of houses sold fell for a fifth straight month and the supply of unsold homes on the market rose to a record.

The price picture is slightly brighter in Southern California, but home builders, real estate agents and loan brokers here are starting to feel the pain. Los Angeles-based KB Home said last week that new-home orders on the West Coast plunged 58% in the three months ended Aug. 31 compared with a year earlier. Countrywide Financial Corp. of Calabasas, the nation's biggest mortgage lender, warned workers last week to brace for layoffs.

"Things are clearly turning down pretty hard" for residential real estate, said Jan Hatzius, an economist at investment firm Goldman, Sachs & Co. in New York. "You're going to have some payback from this" in the economy overall, he said.

Just how much payback is in store — and how consumer spending may be affected by the downturn — is a matter of growing debate among economists.

Many analysts believe that the economy is strong enough to avoid falling into recession even if housing continues to weaken. "You have to be careful not to exaggerate how much [housing] dampens the economy given that everything else other than the auto sector is doing well," Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas President Richard Fisher said after a speech Monday.

But the real estate boom of the last decade has been unprecedented in size and scope, which raises the risk that the downside also could exceed forecasters' best guesses, said Eric Belsky, executive director of Harvard University's Joint Center for Housing Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0069431

After any boom, "there's a tendency to predict a more gradual unwinding than actually occurs," he said.

Housing's troubles pose two main threats: one to millions of jobs directly dependent on the business, the other to homeowners' willingness and ability to spend if they feel poorer because of the trend in property prices.

About 10 million jobs are tied directly to residential real estate, from construction workers to escrow agents to the clerks at the local hardware store, Goldman Sachs estimates. That's about 7% of total U.S. employment. Some analysts believe the total is closer to 10%.

Soaring job growth in construction, real estate sales, mortgage lending and related businesses helped buoy otherwise anemic employment gains from 2001 to 2004 as companies hired to meet the spectacular appetite for homes.

Some housing-related businesses already have begun to jettison workers. Calabasas-based builder Ryland Group Inc. says it has cut its workforce by 10% this year nationwide to 3,000.

"Everyone is tightening their belts," said Irene Genders, president of the California Escrow Assn. "We're expecting this to be a little while."

Still, employment cuts overall have been modest, at least as measured by government payroll data, which don't pick up freelance workers. Payroll jobs in residential construction totaled 3.31 million in August, off just fractionally from the 3.33 million at the start of the year, Labor Department data show.

Andy Perkins, San Diego branch manager for Orco Construction Supply, said he believed that job losses were just beginning as housing projects finish up and builders find little or no new demand.

More construction equipment is coming back to his stores rather than moving to another job, Perkins said. "San Diego has set the trend for the business falling off the shelf" in single-family homes, he said.

Goldman Sachs estimates that the housing sector nationwide could shed 1.5 million to 2 million jobs over the next several years as the industry retrenches. The result could be to reduce total U.S. employment growth to a monthly average of 100,000 jobs in 2007, from an average of 150,000 a month over the last three years, the firm said.

Direct employment in real-estate-related industries is just part of the equation when measuring the sector's influence on the economy. There also is the so-called wealth effect that housing prices have on consumers' spending.

Rocketing home prices over the last decade provided many Americans with an income windfall, either from the outright sales of houses at a profit or from mortgage refinancings or credit lines that allowed homeowners to cash in some of their accumulated equity.

A study coauthored by then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan last year estimated that mortgage-equity withdrawals tied to surging real estate values added $600 billion to consumers' disposable income in 2004 alone, making up about 7% of the total that year.

But home prices are now slipping. The National Assn. of Realtors said the median price for a previously owned home, including condominiums, fell to $225,000 in August, down 1.7% from a year earlier.

"Prices are going to get worse before they get better," said David Lereah, chief economist at the Realtors' association, citing the glut of homes on the market. The for-sale inventory reached 3.92 million units in August, up 1.5% from July and a 7 1/2 -month supply at current sales rates.

In California, prices are still rising, but more slowly. The statewide median price of a previously owned, detached single-family home was up 1.6% in August from a year earlier, to $576,360, but home sales plunged 30%, the California Assn. of Realtors said Monday.

In Southern California, the median price of all homes and condos rose 2.7% last month from the year-earlier level, to $489,000, according to DataQuick Information Systems.

As home prices level off or decline, the risk is that consumer spending also could weaken significantly. And because that spending accounts for two-thirds of U.S. economic activity, a marked slowdown could threaten to chill the economic expansion that began in 2001.

Hit by record gasoline prices, consumers began to cut back on spending in the second quarter, reducing real U.S. gross domestic product growth to an annualized rate of 2.9%, down from 3.2% for all of 2005.

But predicting how consumers' spending will change because of the end of the housing price explosion is a tough call, many analysts say.

John Silvia, an economist at banking firm Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C., said that although consumers unquestionably benefited from the housing-appreciation windfall, people's spending patterns generally depended on whether their employment income was rising.

"Consumption is driven by income. As long as that income growth is there, consumers will go back to their spending patterns" in place before any bonuses they enjoyed, Silvia said.

DOJ_NMG_0069432

So far, the psychological hit from ebbing home prices is being tempered by rising personal income and by a relatively low unemployment rate of 4.7%, said Stuart Gabriel, head of the USC Lusk Center for Real Estate.

What's more, the long run-up in home values has given many people a reservoir of untapped equity. "Most people still have a ton of money in their houses," said Scott Simon, a real estate expert at Pacific Investment Management Co. in Newport Beach.

Falling energy prices and lower interest rates also may soften the blow from housing weakness.

Oil prices have dropped 20% since July, paring prices at the pump. And mortgage interest rates have been easing, which could lessen worries about rising home foreclosures in 2007 as some homeowners with floating-rate loans face payment hikes.

Set against a strong U.S. and global economy, the downturn in housing may at worst shave about 1 percentage point off U.S. growth in 2007, many forecasters now say. That could mean growth of about 2% — slow but still respectable for an aging economic expansion.

But Goldman's Hatzius said the risk was that housing could see a much harder landing than now appears reasonable.

"We have never seen the kind of housing boom nationally that we've seen over the last six or seven years," he said. "So to know what's on the other side of the boom is very difficult."

*

tom.petruno@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Foundation crack?

A glut of homes . . .

. . . bodes ill for jobs in housing sector

Number of jobs tied to the housing market in 2005

(in millions)

Trade contractors: 4.4

Construction workers: 1.8

Real estate agents: 1.4

Property managers: 0.9

Mortgage brokers: 0.8

Furniture manufacturing, retail: 0.7

Sources: Bloomberg News, Goldman Sachs

Median Home Price Takes A Sharp Drop (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

The median home price in the United States dropped last month for the first time in 11 years and is expected to keep falling each month until next year in what could be an unprecedented string of declines for the housing market, the National Association of Realtors said yesterday.

The 1.7 percent drop to $225,000 in August was the second largest yearly price decline on record. Economists said more declines will be needed to work off a record backlog of homes for sale -- 7.5 months worth nationwide.

"We have a serious correction taking place in the housing sector," Richard Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas said in a speech, singling out housing and autos as sore spots in what otherwise is a "healthy and robust" economy.

The Fed wants to see economic growth downshift, led by the interest-sensitive housing and auto sectors, to cool inflation. Economists hope that recent solid gains in jobs and income and a recent plunge in oil and gas prices will help consumers cope with the rapidly deflating value of their biggest asset and source of wealth.

A year ago, homeowners were enjoying double-digit price gains and were tapping voraciously into their home equity to finance an estimated $500 billion in yearly spending.

David Lereah, chief economist of the Realtors group, predicted prices would continue to decline until next year, but that the development is "healthy" because it will make homes more attractive to buyers and help to boost sales.

Sales fell for a fifth month in a row last month and are 12.6 percent below last year's levels, but the relatively small 0.5 percent decline in August suggests the price cuts are working to move houses, he said.

"This is the price correction we've been expecting," he said. "Sellers are starting to become more realistic, and that could provide some lift to home sales because there is a healthy underlying demand from household growth and job creation."

DOJ_NMG_0069433

Other analysts say any back-to-back decline in home prices of more than two months would be unprecedented in the U.S. and would indicate a deep slump in the housing market that could take years to play out. Top federal regulators testified earlier this month that housing could go through a period of stagnation lasting as long as a decade.

The Realtors' home price figure reflects the median price of homes sold nationwide during the month, and can be influenced by a shift to sales of lower-priced homes as well as price cuts. Another gauge of home prices published each quarter by the federal government attempts to filter out sales shifts by measuring the appraised value of homes. That index has shown no price decline.

Economists say both measures are flawed -- for example, by not factoring in financial give-backs and incentives offered by sellers. Many prefer the Realtors report because it is tied to day-to-day sales in the market where prices ultimately are set.

Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisors said the Realtors report shows a housing market in crisis.

"For months, there has been a debate over whether the housing market bubble has burst or is only slowly deflating," he said. "That debate is now basically irrelevant.

"With inventories so high, there is a lot more adjustment before the existing home market hits bottom. Prices are going to have to fall a lot further and/or sellers are going to have to pull their homes off the market. Until those things happen, the excess supply will pressure prices."

David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., said the top 10 metropolitan areas in the country could see price drops of 6 percent in the next year -- including Washington.

"Although we have been predicting a stabilization of housing prices nationwide, we expect declines in the most overpriced areas and those where employment is poor."

Stocks Fly High On Talk Of Fed Rate Cut (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 26, 2006

NEW YORK — The U.S. stock market closed Monday at its highest level in more than 5½ years as investors bet that the economic slowdown won't be severe enough to put a big dent in corporate profit growth.

But the slowdown could warrant an interest rate cut from the Federal Reserve, which would give stocks a boost.

The Standard & Poor's 500 gained 11.59 points, or 0.9%, to 1326.37, topping its May 5 high of 1325.76. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001. It is up 6.3% in 2006.

The gains were driven by last-minute buying by portfolio managers at the end of the third quarter and a continued drop in the yield of the 10-year Treasury note, which fell to 4.54%, its lowest since late February.

There was also speculation that the Fed, which has left short-term interest rates unchanged at its past two meetings after 17 straight increases, might be gearing up to reduce rates as signs of a serious housing slowdown mount, says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank. A Realtors group said the price of a median home fell in July vs. a year ago, its first year-over-year decline since 1995. (Story, 1B.)

“Investors are already expecting a cut in short-term rates given that oil prices have retreated about 20%, housing is falling off a cliff and the threat of inflation has abated,” Ablin says.

Other major stock indexes also rallied. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 67.71 points, or 0.6%, to 11,575.81. The Dow, which is up 8% in 2006, is within 148 points of a new high. The Nasdaq composite surged 30.14 points, or 1.4%, to 2249.07.

Dallas Fed President Richard Fisher also helped stocks Monday when he said in a speech that inflation would be dampened by a slowing economy.

Todd Leone, head of listed trading at Cowen & Co., says some of the gains could also be attributed to investors' confidence that the third-quarter earnings season, which kicks into high gear in a few weeks, will show that U.S. companies are still raking in profits.

Companies in the S&P 500 are expected to post earnings growth of 14.2% in the July-through-September quarter, says Thomson Financial. If so, that would be the 13th straight quarter of double-digit profit growth.

“The stock market is telling us that the economy is slowing, but the chances of recession are low,” says Jason Trennert, managing partner at Strategas Research Partners.

Wall Street Rises On Fed Comments (FT)

By John O’Doherty

Financial Times, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069434

The S&P 500 closed at its highest level in five years on Monday as investors took heart from comments by a Federal Reserve official that slowing economic growth would probably temper inflation.

Apple Computer gained 3.8 per cent to $75.75 – its highest level since January – after ThinkEquity raised its price target on the stock from $90 to $100, saying the computer maker would benefit from the back-to-school season.

Dell gained 3.4 per cent to $22.16 after it announced it would hire an additional 500 engineers to work in one of its facilities in Texas.

Semiconductor stocks also made strong gains, buoying the Nasdaq. Broadcom rose 9 per cent to $30.36 after BMO Capital Markets raised its 2006 earnings estimate on the company, while Lam Research added 8.9 per cent to $45.04.

Tobacco group Altria sank 6.4 per cent to $77.06, its worst day in more than two years, after a federal judge in New York approved a class-action suit from smokers of "light" cigarettes. Reynolds American, maker of Camel and Winston cigarettes, dropped 3.7 per cent to $59.75.

Drugstore chain Walgreen's shed 5.2 per cent to $44.47 in spite of reporting a 25 per cent increase in fourth quarter profit. After a gain of $7.3m from litigation was stripped out, earnings fell just short of analyst expectations. CVS tumbled 5.8 per cent to $31.10.

Both stocks sank last week after Wal-Mart announced plans to sell generic prescription drugs at $4 for a 30-day supply.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 0.9 per cent, or 11.59 points, at 1,326.37, its highest close since February 2001.

The Nasdaq Composite was up 1.4 per cent, or 30.14 points, at 2,249.07. The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 0.6 per cent, or 67.71 points, to 11,575.81.

Stocks traded lower in the morning following a report that showed home prices registering their first year-on-year fall in 11 years. But the major indices bounced back in broad-based gains on comments by Richard Fisher, president of the Dallas Federal Reserve that slowing economic growth should temper inflation.

Philip Dow, director of equity strategy at RBC Dain Rauscher, believes stocks will continue to push higher next week. "Earnings disappointments can still come up, but it's hard for me to envision a whole lot of downside," he said.

Homebuilders surged on Mr Fisher's comments. Pulte gained 4.3 per cent to $32.66 while DR Horton rose 3.8 per cent to $24.39.

American Power Conversion, maker of surge protectors for computers, fell 2.4 per cent to $20.89 after it said it would cut an additional 330 jobs to bring its total layoffs to 7 per cent of its workforce.

Archer Daniels Midland fell 2.2 per cent to $37.62 after Prudential cut its earnings estimate for the group due to falling ethanol prices.

Dow Rises 67.71 As Fed Official Hints At Future (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

Stocks rallied despite hawkish comments on interest rates by a Federal Reserve official and a rise in oil prices.

A report from the National Association of Realtors showed weaker-than-expected existing-home sales and a decline in existing-home prices for the first time in more than 11 years, which some investors took as a sign that the Fed's policy makers would consider cutting interest rates. Lower interest rates are considered good for stocks because they reduce borrowing costs and can raise profits.

But in a speech in Monterrey, Mexico, Richard Fisher, president of the Fed's Dallas bank, said the U.S. economy remains strong despite the housing-market slowdown. He added that he "continues to fret more about inflation than growth," which could indicate a possible rate increase.

At a meeting Wednesday, Fed policy makers left their short-term interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%. But the move was so widely anticipated by the time the meeting began that investors already had begun to look ahead for signs of what the Fed might do even further down the line.

Ending a two-day losing streak, the Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied 67.71 points, or 0.6%, to 11575.81, up 8% on the year and less than 150 points from its January 2000 record. The blue-chip indicator's gains were held in check by a selloff of Altria Group. The cigarette maker's shares slid more than 6%, to $77.06, after a federal judge granted class-action status to a smokers' lawsuit.

International Business Machines pressed past Altria to become the industrials' biggest component by price after IBM shares rallied 1% to 82.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 11.59, or 0.9%, to 1326.37, up 6.3% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 30.14, or 1.4%, to 2249.07, up 2% on the year.

DOJ_NMG_0069435

"As the economy slows in the months ahead, I think investors will have fewer places to go to get growth in their portfolios," said Duncan W. Richardson, chief equity investment officer at Eaton Vance Management. "That favors the big-name companies, which should be best positioned to weather the slowdown." However, Sam Stovall, S&P's chief investment strategist, predicted few gains, if any, in the S&P 500 through the end of the year.

November crude futures rose 90 cents, or 1.5%, to $61.45 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on supply concerns.

Stocks and Bond prices rose: The 10-year note gained 14/32 point, or $4.38 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.548%.

The dollar was mixed. The dollar fell to 116.50 yen from 116.52. The euro fell to $1.2759 from $1.2788.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com1

In A Turnaround, Slowing Economy Spurs Bond Rally (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

In one of the bigger surprises in financial markets this year, a growing sense that the economy is slowing and inflation receding is fueling a rally in the nation's bond markets, pushing Treasury-bond yields to their lowest levels in months.

The rally -- which started 10 weeks ago and has gained momentum in the past few days -- may help to shape the outlook for both the economy and for investments in coming months. Some doubt the rally will last, but if it does, lower interest rates could help buoy stock prices, make it easier for investors to make potentially risky bets with borrowed money, and ultimately help soften the blow from a weaker economy and a cooling housing market.

Because bonds pay fixed interest, their yields go down as investors bid up their prices, and vice versa. Earlier this year, Treasury yields rose as investors fretted that a strong economy would pump up inflation. Inflation eats away at bond returns, so investors dumped Treasurys, which pushed bond prices lower and their yields higher.

Now, in the upside-down world of bond investing, bad news about the economy has investors turning back to bonds, which is pushing yields back down, essentially making it cheaper to borrow money.

In June, a Wall Street Journal survey of 56 private economists showed that all but 13 expected bond yields to finish the year above 5%. Late yesterday afternoon, however, the yield on the 10-year Treasury note hit 4.55%, its lowest level since February and a large drop from 5.25% in late June.

"Looks like I'm wrong again today, right?" said Morgan Stanley economist Richard Berner. "I think the extent of this rally has caught a lot of people by surprise."

Yesterday's yield on the 10-year Treasury note was lower than the 4.65% yield on two-year Treasury notes and lower still than the 4.89% yield on three-month Treasury bills, something that is highly unusual, because investors typically demand higher returns for holding securities with longer maturities. The rate on overnight bank loans, which is driven by the Federal Reserve, is even higher -- at 5.25%.

Because the disparity between these rates is unusually large, some investors say something has to give -- either the Fed will begin cutting short-term rates in response to a weakening economy and low inflation, or the economy will start showing its strength and yields will turn higher.

For now, as the nation's once-hot housing market cools and the economic outlook dims, investors are coming to the conclusion that inflation isn't a worry, and they are gobbling up Treasury notes and bonds, pushing their yield lower.

The latest dose of bad news on housing came from the National Association of Realtors, which said yesterday that sales of existing homes dropped for the fifth straight month in August and that the median price of all homes sold last month declined 1.7% from a year earlier, the first year-to-year decline in more than 11 years.

"People are searching for safety," said Mark Kiesel, a corporate-bond portfolio manager at Pacific Investment Management Co., or Pimco. "I think the story of this [past three months] has basically been the hard landing in housing. That's become apparent to investors, and led to a rally in the bond market as people have realized slow growth is very likely."

The rally's impact could be significant. Perhaps most important, by helping to lower mortgage costs, the decline in bond yields could help buoy home sales and prices at a time when they are under growing downward pressure. The 10-year Treasury note is a benchmark for long-term mortgage rates.

Recent data from the Mortgage Bankers Association suggests that some families have taken advantage of a decline in long-term mortgage rates to refinance their mortgages and lock in lower payments. The association's index of mortgage refinancing applications has risen 27% since mid-July, and now stands at its highest level since February.

DOJ_NMG_0069436

Lower long-term interest rates also send a potentially powerful signal to Federal Reserve policy makers that the bond market's inflation concerns remain contained, which could give Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke leverage to hold short-term interest rates steady in the months ahead, or possibly even reduce them.

The beginnings of the bond market's rally can be traced back to Mr. Bernanke's testimony before Congress on July 19, when he predicted that economic growth and inflation would cool.

Bond prices rallied that day and continued rising, with a few exceptions, as a series of economic reports verified Mr. Bernanke's assessments. "He kind of set things up there in July, and they played out exactly as he set them up," said Roger Bayston, a bond fund manager at Franklin Templeton Investments. "I think that solidified his credibility."

On Aug. 8, Fed officials decided to keep their target for short-term interest rates at 5.25%, breaking a string of 17 straight rate increases dating back to 2004. They held pat again on Sept. 20.

Many market watchers believe the Fed is unlikely to raise rates again this year, and is likely to begin cutting rates next year. That's a contrast to this spring, when they predicted a continued drumbeat of inflation-fighting moves by the Fed.

Investors and Fed officials have puzzled before over the extraordinarily low level of long-term interest rates. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan called them a "conundrum." Typically, rates rise when the economy recovers from bad times, as it has in recent years. Long-term rates also tend to rise when the Fed pushes up short-term rates, as it started to do in 2004, when Mr. Greenspan still ran the Fed.

The low rates that date back to his stewardship have led to an increase in bond issuance by U.S. companies and have helped to fuel a boom in leveraged buyouts by private-equity firms, trends that the current bond rally could intensify, if it lasts.

Data collected by Thomson Financial shows that U.S. companies issued $68 billion in investment-grade bonds in August, a record for the month, as low default rates and flush corporate balance sheets have emboldened both bond issuers and buyers. Pimco's Mr. Kiesel said the slowing economy has yet to breed significant worries that defaults will increase, something that is keeping corporate borrowing costs low.

The housing slowdown isn't the only factor in the bond rally. Falling oil prices have strengthened the view that inflation is contained. Meanwhile, investors tend to flock to Treasury bonds when they worry about risks in other investments. Political turmoil in places like Thailand, Russia and Hungary might be heightening the concerns of some. So might the recent collapse of Amaranth Advisors, a hedge fund that lost billions on bad natural-gas bets.

Morgan Stanley's Mr. Berner noted that, in the near term, interest-rate declines tend to feed upon themselves. That's partly because of a connection between the bond and mortgage markets. Lower rates make homeowners more likely to refinance mortgages, meaning they are keeping their mortgages for a shorter period. These shorter maturities force some investors and big mortgage holders like Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to adjust their hedging strategies by buying long-dated Treasurys, which puts more downward pressure on bond yields.

As Treasury yields drop, he said, the process can be at least temporarily self-sustaining, because the lower Treasury yields go, the more mortgage-bond investors will put their money into Treasurys, thus driving the government bond yields even lower.

Many economists and traders say the downward march of bond yields can be sustained only if the Fed starts cutting interest rates early next year. But some doubt that will happen. Bear Stearns Cos. economist John Ryding argues that housing worries have been overstated and that the broader economy is on solid footing. Retailers, for instance, appear to have posted healthy sales so far in September.

Mr. Ryding argues that the bond surge is less about economic fundamentals and more of a "technical rally" powered by a shift in momentum sparked by the Fed's July pause in raising interest rates. "These current yields can't hold without a Fed cut," Mr. Ryding said. "I think the rally will fizzle out at some point here."

Write to Michael Hudson at michael.hudson@wsj.com1

Crude Rallies After Fall Below $60 Fails To Stick (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

Crude-oil futures ended sharply higher after another drop below $60 failed to stick and comments by OPEC's president offered support.

Prices dipped below $60 a barrel for the second time in recent months but quickly rebounded above that psychologically important level as traders were forced to buy back previously sold positions.

The November crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled 90 cents higher at $61.45 a barrel after hitting an intraday low of $59.52, the lowest level for a front-month crude contract since early March.

Oil prices dipped early in the day on an announcement made by BP PLC late Friday that it would increase oil flows from its Prudhoe Bay field in Alaska.

DOJ_NMG_0069437

"The market seems to dislike trading under $60," said Tom Bentz, an analyst at brokerage BNP Paribas Futures in New York.

The headlines from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries "perhaps spooked the shorts away from getting too bearish."

OPEC President Edmund Daukoru said yesterday he and other oil ministers from the 11-member producer group were mulling the implications of the 20% plunge in oil prices seen over the past six weeks. "I am conferring with some ministers," Mr. Daukoru said.

The comments gave prices some "rhetorical support," said Jim Ritterbusch, president of oil and gas consultants Ritterbusch & Associates in Galena, Ill.

"They're going to talk the market up a bit with statements about meetings, but the chances of a production cut are slim unless we fall" to about $55 a barrel, Mr. Ritterbusch said.

OPEC agreed Sept. 11 to leave its official output ceiling unchanged at 28 million barrels a day but vowed to "respond rapidly to any developments which might jeopardize their interests."

Many traders took that and other recent comments by OPEC officials to suggest that the cartel will cut production to prevent prices from falling significantly below $60 a barrel.

"Guys on the floor were speculating that OPEC was going to protect $60," said Pete Donovan, vice president with Vantage Traders in New York.

While the threat of an OPEC output cut remains alive, "prices could very easily return to new lows unless we can see some upside follow-through" today, Mr. Bentz said.

In other commodity markets:

SUGAR: Futures dropped to 13-month lows on the New York Board of Trade as speculators liquidated previously bought positions and also established short positions, betting that prices will fall further. Sellers were influenced by a recent downdraft in energy markets, since sugar cane is used for ethanol, and by hedge fund Amaranth Advisors's heavy losses in natural gas, traders said. October sugar fell 0.71 cent to 9.75 cents a pound.

NATURAL GAS: Futures settled at their lowest point in nearly three years as demand was on the wane while plenty of gas remained in storage. October futures on the Nymex settled at $4.475 per million British thermal units, down 15.2 cents, or 3.3%. The front-month contract, which expires tomorrow, has lost 39% of its value from a month ago.

COFFEE: Futures at the Nybot rose to 2 ½-week highs as Brazilian groves remain dry during the flowering season, when yields are set, despite recent rain. Speculative buying was seen behind the rise, too. December coffee rose 2.20 cents to $1.0665 a pound.

Opec Considers Drop In Output (FT)

By Kevin Morrison And Javier Blas

Financial Times, September 26, 2006

Oil exporting countries may consider a cut in output after crude prices fell below $60 a barrel on Monday for the first time in six months.

The decline came as global demand fell back from its mid-year peak and tensions over Iran eased.

Ministers from the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries are understood to be concerned about the drop in oil prices, which are down almost a quarter from their recent peaks.

They have discussed the prospect of trimming production ahead of the oil cartel's next ministerial meeting in Nigeria in December, according to Opec officials.

The oil price fall over the past month has been accompanied by investor selling in oil and other commodity markets, mainly on concerns that economic growth in the US is slowing.

"There is a concern by hedge funds that oil and commodities are no longer the one-way bet they once were," said an Opec official.

Brent, the European benchmark oil price, dropped 50 cents to $59.91 a barrel, down 24 per cent from its record peak of $78.40 reached last month.

The US benchmark oil price, West Texas Intermediate, yesterday hit $59.62, its lowest level since early March, before recovering to $60.54. It was flat on the day.

The WTI is now lower than the level it ended at last year. The magnitude of the decline in percentage terms is the largest in more than three years.

Investors have been selling out of oil futures over the past month, after taking bets earlier in the year on expectations of hurricanes disrupting oil supplies in the Gulf of Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0069438

But with the Atlantic hurricane season finishing at the end of September, there is little prospect of a repeat of last year's devastating storms.

Opec is not only worried about investor activity in oil markets, but also about preserving high export prices, which underpin government budgets in member countries.

Many Opec producers have embarked on big spending programmes in recent years on the back of the higher oil price.

Opec maintained its quota of 28m barrels a day at its recent meeting in Vienna, and this is close to the cartel's actual production last month.

Saudi Arabia, Opec's linchpin member and the world's largest oil exporter, has been cutting its output since the end of last year.

If Opec does trim its official production ceiling, it would be the first cut since December 2004, when oil prices were close to $42 a barrel.

Oil Contract Dips Briefly Below $60 A Barrel, As Speculators Bet On Lower Prices (NYT)

By Heather Timmons

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 25 — Crude oil prices dropped below $60 a barrel for the first time in six months on Monday before rebounding a bit as nervous speculators retreated from the commodity markets, spooked by the improving picture for oil supplies and cooling economies.

The market reacted at first to news that Iran was willing to enter negotiations about its nuclear program and that BP would resume pumping oil ahead of schedule from part of its site in Prudhoe Bay, Alaska. But underlying economic jitters, particularly fears about a United States slowdown, also contributed to the price drop, analysts said.

The price of a barrel of light crude oil for delivery in November fell as low as $59.52 a barrel in New York. By late afternoon in London, it was trading at $60.55 and it closed in New York at $61.45, ending up 90 cents. Oil prices have fallen about 20 percent since July, after being driven up by hedge funds and traders concerned about supply squeezes because of geopolitical unrest and hurricanes.

Whether oil prices will drift back up or continue their general slide is a matter of fierce debate.

"The oil market's fundamentals have finally asserted themselves," the Centre for Global Energy Studies in London said in a report on Monday. Markets reached a point recently where "the upward momentum of oil prices disappeared, and it will therefore take a combination of special factors to bring it back," said the group, which was founded by a former Saudi petroleum minister.

Noncommercial buyers, which are generally pension, mutual and hedge funds, poured money into oil and other commodities in recent years, in part because they thought that the growing emerging-market economies had created a so-called supercycle that guaranteed price increases. In recent weeks, they have exited the market rapidly as prices started to fall when the hurricane season proved to be less severe than had been feared and several producers increased supplies or announced new oil discoveries.

The net number of long contracts, not including options, held by noncommercial buyers — bets that the price of crude oil will increase — is 22,000, down from 83,000 on Aug. 15, according to an analysis by PFC Energy of the most recent report from the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. "It is a huge reversal in position," said David Kirsch, an oil markets analyst with PFC in Washington.

Kamal Murari, global head of energy marketing for Dresdner Kleinwort, said: "The move down that's taken place has been sharp and sudden. The fact that it's moved as significantly as it has means that any forced liquidation has been mostly priced into the market," he said. Some of the selling in the oil market may be linked to the recent well-publicized losses in the natural gas markets, Mr. Murari said, as some funds may have been forced to liquidate assets across energy. Most market participants think OPEC will be concerned enough to take steps to stem further declines if the prices fall to $55 a barrel, he said.

The members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, or OPEC, have been in contact by telephone since their last meeting on Sept. 11 to discuss falling prices but have no plans for an emergency meeting on the subject, a spokesman said on Monday. Questions about the future growth of the United States economy are also pushing investors out of the oil market. American consumers are often referred to by economists as the engine that drives the world's markets, and when they stop spending, other economies are affected. United States home prices are cooling down, giving consumers less confidence and stripping them of paper gains.

In the United States, market experts estimate that the falling oil prices will help soften the effect of the weakening housing market. "The sudden change in oil price direction in the last month has reduced the total cost of oil to the United States economy by $40 billion a year," said Lawrence J. Goldstein, the president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation. The fall in oil prices has added back one-quarter to one-half of a point of growth to the United States gross domestic product, Mr. Goldstein estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0069439

The immediate impact of lower oil prices in Europe is bound to be muted unless a sustained decline becomes apparent, economists said. At the pump, prices tend to fluctuate less in Europe than in the United States in large part because of heavy excise taxes.

While prices were on their way up, it made sense to adjust growth prognoses downward, though even then the European economy was proving remarkably resilient to the run-up. Now the picture is even more complex, with Europe poised to benefit from less expensive oil, but facing a slowing of its main export market, the United States.

“Do you want to be nudging your forecasts upwards in Europe when the main reason is a possible slackening of demand in the United States?” said Rob Carnell, an economist at ING Baring in London. “Personally, I would not be touching them right now.”

Rice Boils Over At Bubba (NYPOST)

By Ian Bishop

The New York Post, September 26, 2006

September 25, 2006 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday accused Bill Clinton of making "flatly false" claims that the Bush administration didn't lift a finger to stop terrorism before the 9/11 attacks.

Rice hammered Clinton, who leveled his charges in a contentious weekend interview with Chris Wallace of Fox News Channel, for his claims that the Bush administration "did not try" to kill Osama bin Laden in the eight months they controlled the White House before the Sept. 11 attacks.

"The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false - and I think the 9/11 commission understood that," Rice said during a wide-ranging meeting with Post editors and reporters.

"What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years," Rice added.

The secretary of state also sharply disputed Clinton's claim that he "left a comprehensive anti-terror strategy" for the incoming Bush team during the presidential transition in 2001.

"We were not left a comprehensive strategy to fight al Qaeda," Rice responded during the hourlong session.

Her strong rebuttal was the Bush administration's first response to Clinton's headline-grabbing interview on Fox on Sunday in which he launched into an over-the-top defense of his handling of terrorism - wagging his finger in the air, leaning forward in his chair and getting red-faced, and even attacking Wallace for improper questioning.

The "Fox News Sunday" show had its best ratings since the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003, according to Nielsen Media Research. Two versions of the interview were the two most-watched clips on YouTube yesterday, totaling more than 800,000 views.

After Clinton got angry during the questioning, Wallace said Clinton aide Jay Carson tried to get his producer to stop the interview. Carson said he was concerned that time was running out and that little of the philanthropy efforts of the former president had been addressed.

At The Post, Rice also touched on hot spots around the globe:

On Iran: "There isn't a particularly good, direct way to neutralize the Iranian threat."

On Iraq: "You're never going to have a just Sunni-Shia reconciliation if you don't have a political system in which the interests of all can be represented - and that's what Iraq represents."

On Pakistan: "The future of Pakistan, as [President Pervez] Musharraf and his people fully understand, is to de-radicalize elements of the population."

On the Middle East conflict: "It would help to have a moderate force in the Palestinian territories and to have the beginnings of rapprochement with Israel and the rest of its neighbors."

On the Far East: "I would like to see an improvement in Japanese-China relations." In her pointed rebuttal of Clinton's inflammatory claims about the war on terror, Rice maintained the Bush White House did the best it could to defend against an attack - and expanded on the tools and intelligence it inherited.

"I would just suggest that you go back and read the 9/11 commission report on the efforts of the Bush administration in the eight months - things like working to get an armed Predator [drone] that actually turned out to be extraordinarily important," Rice added.

She also said Clinton's claims that Richard Clarke - the White House anti-terror guru hyped by Clinton as the country's "best guy" - had been demoted by Bush were bogus.

DOJ_NMG_0069440

"Richard Clarke was the counterterrorism czar when 9/11 happened. And he left when he did not become deputy director of homeland security, some several months later," she said.

Rice noted that the world changed after 9/11.

"I would make the divide Sept. 11, 2001, when the attack on this country mobilized us to fight the war on terror in a very different way," Rice said.

Rice cited the final 9/11 commission report to substantiate her claims, while Clinton relied on Clarke's book as the basis for many of his rehashing the events leading up to the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I think this is not a very fruitful discussion. We've been through it. The 9/11 commission has turned over every rock and we know exactly what they said," she added.

Transitioning to the global war on terror, an animated Rice questioned, "When are we going to stop blaming ourselves for the rise of terrorism?"

Asked about recently leaked internal U.S. intelligence estimates that claimed the Iraq war was fueling terrorist recruiting, Rice said: "Now that we're fighting back, of course they are fighting back, too."

"I find it just extraordinary that the argument is, all right, so they're using the fact they're being challenged in the Middle East and challenged in Iraq to recruit, therefore you've made the war on terrorism worse.

"It's as if we were in a good place on Sept. 11. Clearly, we weren't," she added.

"These are people who want to fight against us, and they're going to find a reason. And yes, they will recruit, but it doesn't mean you stop pursuing strategies that are ultimately going to stop them," Rice said.

She insisted U.S. forces must finish the job in Iraq and the wider Middle East to wipe out the "root cause" of violent extremism - not just the terror thugs who carry out the attacks.

"It's a longer-term strategy, and it may even have some short-term down side, but if you don't look at the longer term, you're just leaving the problem to somebody else," she said.

She also said Middle East countries like Saudi Arabia and Pakistan have a "major educational reform" effort under way to root out propaganda literature and extremist brainwashing.

In Latin America, home to outrageous Venezuelan bomb thrower Hugo Chavez, Rice said the U.S. approach is to "spend as little time possible in talking about Chavez and more time talking about our positive agenda in Latin America," including several trade agreements.

The Real Clinton Emerges (HILL)

The Hill, September 26, 2006

From behind the benign façade and the tranquilizing smile, the real Bill Clinton emerged Sunday during Chris Wallace's interview on Fox News Channel. There he was on live television, the man those who have worked for him have come to know – the angry, sarcastic, snarling, self-righteous, bombastic bully, roused to a fever pitch. The truer the accusation, the greater the feigned indignation. Clinton jabbed his finger in Wallace's face, poking his knee, and invading the commentator's space.

But beyond noting the ex-president's non-presidential style, it is important to answer his distortions and misrepresentations. His self-justifications constitute a mangling of the truth which only someone who once quibbled about what the "definition of 'is' is" could perform.

Clinton told Wallace, "There is not a living soul in the world who thought that Osama bin Laden had anything to do with Black Hawk Down." Nobody said there was. The point of citing Somalia in the run up to 9-11 is that bin Laden told Fortune Magazine in a 1999 interview that the precipitous American pullout after Black Hawk Down convinced him that Americans would not stand up to armed resistance.

Clinton said conservatives "were all trying to get me to withdraw from Somalia in 1993 the next day" after the attack which killed American soldiers. But the real question was whether Clinton would honor the military's request to be allowed to stay and avenge the attack, a request he denied. The debate was not between immediate withdrawal and a six-month delay. (Then-first lady, now-Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) favored the first option, by the way). The fight was over whether to attack or pull out eventually without any major offensive operations.

The president told Wallace, "I authorized the CIA to get groups together to try to kill bin Laden." But actually, the 9-11 Commission was clear that the plan to kidnap Osama was derailed by Sandy Berger and George Tenet because Clinton had not yet made a finding authorizing his assassination. They were fearful that Osama would die in the kidnapping and the U.S. would be blamed for using assassination as an instrument of policy.

Clinton claims "the CIA and the FBI refused to certify that bin Laden was responsible [for the Cole bombing] while I was there." But he could replace or direct his employees as he felt. His helplessness was, as usual, self-imposed.

DOJ_NMG_0069441

Why didn't the CIA and FBI realize the extent of bin Laden's involvement in terrorism? Because Clinton never took the 1993 attack on the World Trade Center sufficiently seriously. He never visited the site and his only public comment was to caution against "over-reaction." In his pre-9/11 memoirs, George Stephanopoulos confirms that he and others on the staff saw it as a "failed bombing" and noted that it was far from topic A at the White House. Rather than the full-court press that the first terror attack on American soil deserved, Clinton let the investigation be handled by the FBI on location in New York without making it the national emergency it actually was.

In my frequent phone and personal conversations with both Clintons in 1993, there was never a mention, not one, of the World Trade Center attack. It was never a subject of presidential focus.

Failure to grasp the import of the 1993 attack led to a delay in fingering bin Laden and understanding his danger. This, in turn, led to our failure to seize him when Sudan evicted him and also to our failure to carry through with the plot to kidnap him. And, it was responsible for the failure to "certify" him as the culprit until very late in the Clinton administration.

The former president says, "I worked hard to try to kill him." If so, why did he notify Pakistan of our cruise-missile strike in time for them to warn Osama and allow him to escape? Why did he refuse to allow us to fire cruise missiles to kill bin Laden when we had the best chance, by far, in 1999? The answer to the first question — incompetence; to the second — he was paralyzed by fear of civilian casualties and by accusations that he was wagging the dog. The 9/11 Commission report also attributes the 1999 failure to the fear that we would be labeled trigger-happy having just bombed the Chinese embassy in Belgrade by mistake.

President Clinton assumes that criticism of his failure to kill bin Laden is a "nice little conservative hit job on me." But he has it backwards. It is not because people are right-wingers that they criticize him over the failure to prevent 9/11. It was his failure to catch bin Laden that drove them to the right wing.

The ex-president is fully justified in laying eight months of the blame for the failure to kill or catch bin Laden at the doorstep of George W. Bush. But he should candidly acknowledge that eight years of blame fall on him.

One also has to wonder when the volcanic rage beneath the surface of this would-be statesman will cool. When will the chip on his shoulder finally disappear? When will he feel sufficiently secure in his own legacy and his own skin not to boil over repeatedly in private and occasionally even in public?

Clinton Doth Protest Too Much (LAT)

By Andrew Klavan

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

THERE'S NO LIMIT to what a man can do," President Reagan used to say, " … if he doesn't care who gets the credit."

Former President Clinton's motto seems to be a little different: "There's no limit to how much credit a man can get, if he doesn't care what he's actually done."

Reagan came to office after the Jimmy Carter catastrophe. He pulled the American economy out of a graveyard spin, restored the country's military and its confidence and helped bring one of the most oppressive empires on Earth to the brink of collapse. But in those days, my children, there was no Internet, no Fox News, no Rush Limbaugh — the media was almost all Colmes and precious little Hannity — and if you got your news from the New York Times, say, or CBS, you would've thought the country was being run by a miserly, warmongering idiot instead of the greatest president of the century's second half.

And yet even after his two terms were over, when left-wing news sources sourly continued to portray his administration solely in terms of its faults, as nothing but a big deficit and the Iran-Contra scandal, I cannot remember Reagan ever "defending his legacy" with anything more than a quip and a smile.

Compare and contrast Clinton. Questioned mildly on his anti-terrorism record by Fox's Chris Wallace on Sunday, President Me went absolutely medieval on the newsman, leaning forward threateningly, rapping his fingers against Wallace's notes and proceeding to, well, lie — and in a very angry voice too!

"And you got that little smirk on your face and you think you're so clever," Clinton told Wallace, sounding for all the world like a 6-year-old girl scolding her playground rival. He then proceeded to try to rewrite his coulda-woulda-shoulda presidency by claiming to have had a much more focused and hard-lined approach to terrorism than any reading of his administration can support. Even Clinton counter-terrorism chief Richard Clarke's book — which Clinton cited repeatedly during his tantrum — shows the president as too weak to order Osama bin Laden's death. Other accounts are much less favorable.

But let the political observers fight that one out. My beat is human psychology and the nature of reality and fiction. It's in those realms that at least one key difference between Reagan and Clinton can be found — a difference that sits at the heart of our current divisions.

Reagan was a man who believed in truth. Not your truth or my truth but "the truth," the one that is out there whether you happen to believe in it or not.

DOJ_NMG_0069442

"I never thought of myself as a great man," he said, "just a man committed to great ideas." Those ideas — our founders' ideas — were great because they recognized a central truth: the good of individual liberty. And they guaranteed human beings those rights endowed in them by the "big truth" — their creator.

Clinton, on the other hand, is a narcissist who finds it difficult to grasp in any real sense that there is a place where his "inner man" ends and the rest of the world begins. Clinton's stock phrase, "I feel your pain," is really the insistence of a man who does not truly feel anyone else's pain, does not truly understand that there are other inner realities as urgent as his own.

Take Clinton's misuse of women. One way to understand it is as a symptom of his inability to come to terms with anything that would not conform to his own desire, imagination and grandiose sense of himself.

To put it in his own terms, Clinton has never understood what the meaning of "is" is, the fact that some things happened and others didn't, that some things are true and others simply are not. He believes that his legacy will be created in the spin cycle of history rather than in the fitful but persistent human search for history's truth.

Of course he panics and rages like a child when the spin goes the wrong way, when he is given his portion of the blame for encouraging Bin Laden through his military retreat from Somalia or for allowing the terrorist to escape by refusing to put a kill order on him.

He thinks reality itself is being wrestled away from him, that he can wrestle it back and mold it into the shape he wants it to have.

But he's wrong. That's just "is" being is. That's just "truth" bearing away the victory.

Security And War Take Center Stage As Campaign Break Nears (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25 — Republicans and Democrats scrambled Monday to gain the advantage in their final week before breaking to campaign for crucial midterm elections, with Republicans trying to push through bills on national security and Democrats trying to keep the focus on the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq.

Though Republicans had resolved a major party disagreement over the treatment and trials for terrorism suspects, a new dispute emerged Monday, as Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said he thought a crucial provision of the legislation was unconstitutional and would doom the bill before the Supreme Court.

Meanwhile, Democrats convened a session with three former high-ranking military officers who harshly criticized Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and said the Bush administration's failure to adjust its strategy as the conflict unfolded was immoral.

The Democrats also seized on the newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate concluding that the war had fueled the threat from terrorists to argue that the war had made the country less safe.

Republicans had hoped to use the month before the campaign break to emphasize their national security initiatives, but they have repeatedly run into trouble.

Last week, a trio of Republican senators, led by John W. Warner of Virginia, reached a compromise with the White House after weeks of fiercely resisting President Bush's push to use the legislation to redefine the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

But Mr. Specter said Monday that he still had major concerns about a provision in the bill that would deny terrorism suspects a habeas corpus right to challenge their detention in court.

After convening a hearing with lawyers who criticized the provision as un-American and shameful, Mr. Specter said he would seek to amend the legislation on the floor.

"If it comes back to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court will teach Congress another lesson," Mr. Specter said, referring to a decision in June that struck down the administration's earlier attempt to establish trials for terror suspects. "I don't know that I would support a bill that strips habeas corpus."

But even Mr. Specter said he doubted that his hearing would have any effect on the bill's proceeding to the floor. In the House, Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he was working with the Senate and the White House and expected to have a bill that would pass the Senate and the House, avoiding the need for a conference between the two. House leaders said the bill would go to the floor on Wednesday.

Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, took steps on Monday to ensure there would be enough time to debate the measure, saying debate could begin as early as Tuesday.

But at the Senate judiciary hearing, lawyers urged Mr. Specter to delay any legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0069443

John D. Hutson, a retired rear admiral and the former top uniformed lawyer for the Navy, argued that a habeas right was fundamental to American law and identity. "Without these kinds of protections, we're just another banana republic," Admiral Hutson said.

Many of the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, Admiral Hutson contended, had been caught in a dragnet, and while some may be criminals, he said, it is impossible to know without habeas hearings where the government can produce its evidence.

Thomas P. Sullivan, a former United States attorney in Chicago who has represented detainees at Guantánamo, testified that it was "beyond my capacity to accept" that the Senate would push through a habeas provision "on the eve of elections" with so little public hearing.

"I believe that if this bill is passed with these habeas-stripping provisions in it, then after I am dead and the members of this Senate hearing are dead, an apology will be made," Mr. Sullivan said, "just as we did for the incarceration of the Japanese citizens in the Second World War."

"This is shameful," he added, to the applause of protesters dressed in the orange of Guantánamo jumpsuits, "and it is momentous."

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, and lawyers who support the provision said that status review hearings served the same purpose as a habeas right. But Admiral Hutson said the review hearings did not give detainees the same rights to lawyers, or to see the evidence against them, and would set a dangerous precedent for Americans captured by other countries.

On Iraq, Democrats have accused Republicans of failing to conduct adequate Congressional oversight of the war. They have conducted their own party committee sessions examining the war, have sought to give them the appearance of formal Congressional hearings, and plan to hold similar events outside Washington after Congress goes into recess.

At the hearing on Monday, three retired officers said Mr. Rumsfeld had browbeat the military, ignored expert advice and allowed American troops to press on in Iraq without needed equipment or manpower while arrogantly refusing to acknowledge any mistakes.

"The disconnect between our rhetoric and our actions is both astonishing and immoral," said Col. Thomas X. Hammes of the Marines. But the officers, all of whom have served in Iraq and have been previously critical of the conduct of the war, did not endorse a withdrawal, with Maj. Gen. Paul D. Eaton of the Army saying, "We very much need to succeed."

The Democrats gained the participation of a Republican, Representative Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, a war opponent who supported the Democratic view that Republicans had not asked enough tough questions on the war.

"I don't want our history to show that I didn't do my job as a congressman in helping the American people know the facts and the truth," Mr. Jones said.

Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the second-ranking Republican, dismissed the Democratic session as "another partisan media event.''

"And while it may rile up their liberal base," Mr. McConnell said, "it won't kill a single terrorist or prevent a single attack."

Vice President Dick Cheney said Monday that the administration would not let its approach on Iraq be determined by political pressure and took aim at Democratic leaders. "For the sake of our security," Mr. Cheney said, "this nation must reject any strategy of resignation and defeatism in the face of determined enemies."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, retorted, "When the United States intelligence community confirmed that America is losing the war on terror because of Bush failures in Iraq, this White House lost all credibility on matters of national security."

Battlegrounds (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

Six weeks until Election Day, and in Washington both parties are hitting hard on national security: Republicans by pushing for passage of legislation governing the prosecution of terrorism suspects and Democrats by focusing on an intelligence report that the Iraq war helped increase the terrorism threat. But there is little evidence that Republicans are having success in altering the political climate in the most competitive House and Senate races.

Polls this past weekend showed Republicans trailing in Senate races in Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania. In Indiana, Representative John Hostettler, a Republican, is trailing his Democratic opponent by double digits, according to a new poll.

In one bit of good news for Republicans, Senator Robert Menendez, Democrat of New Jersey, may be in trouble; but that may be countered by the problems of Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia.

With a few exceptions, House Republicans are playing defense rather than offense, spending most of their money to stamp out Democratic challengers in Florida, Indiana, Iowa, New Mexico, Ohio and Pennsylvania. On the Senate side,

DOJ_NMG_0069444

Republicans have put all their advertising money this month, about $3.5 million, into Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee. Winning any of those states would make it almost impossible for Democrats to capture the Senate.

GOP's Uptick Just In Time For Election Day (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

There has been a palpable shift in the mood in Washington in recent weeks. No longer are insiders in both parties sharing predictions of a Democratic rout of Republicans.

Some on both sides had expected an election debacle for the Republicans, driven by the Iraq war, high gas prices and the perception that a Republican-led Washington can neither shoot nor spend straight.

Now those perceptions have changed.

A 58 percent majority of Democratic insiders polled by National Journal, as well as an overwhelming 94 percent of Republican insiders, say the Republican National Committee is doing a better job for November than the Democratic National Committee.

Three weeks past the traditional Labor Day kickoff of campaign season, many Republicans are expressing greater optimism for their party's prospects on Election Day, now just six weeks away.

"This is not an election like 1994 and 1974, when we know the outcome is going to be a massive tsunami for one of the two parties," Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman says. "If the election were today, we would lose some seats, but keep our majorities."

It's the job of Mr. Mehlman and of his Democratic National Committee counterpart, Chairman Howard Dean, to wave pompoms for their respective teams, but there was no press corps eye-rolling over Mr. Mehlman's hopeful statements at a recent Christian Science Monitor breakfast with reporters.

John Zogby, whose polling until recently forecast a Republican debacle, now says a big reason for the mood shift is that President Bush is regaining crucial support among his party's voter base by emphasizing national security -- his strongest suit -- as often as possible.

In a mid-August Zogby poll, only 62 percent of likely Republican voters gave Mr. Bush an "excellent" or "good job" rating. But by mid-September, Mr. Bush's approval rating among Republicans had reached 76 percent.

"You have to turn out your base for congressional elections, and if the president has 62 percent approval among Republicans, you have a third who don't approve and a lot of people who might stay home," says longtime Republican strategist Charles Black. "When the president has 76 percent Republican approval, it makes it a lot easier."

Bolstered by such developments, Republicans are facing November more confidently -- if still cautiously, as with Sen. John McCain's response yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation" when asked if he thought the Republicans would maintain control of Congress on Election Day.

"Yes, I do," the Arizona Republican answered, "but I think it's going to be very, very tough ... the off-year of the second term of any president is always a tough election. And of course, Iraq is a very controversial issue with Americans. And there's uncertainty about our future because of globalization. We understand all that, but we also think we have a record we can stand on."

A popular president makes elections a bit easier for his party's candidates, and Mr. Bush's popularity, though still low, has been rising for three months. The latest USA Today/Gallup Poll has his job approval at 44 percent and disapproval at 51 percent -- a deficit of 7 percentage points, but a huge improvement over his numbers in June, when Gallup found 36 percent approval and 57 percent disapproval, a negative 21-point spread.

The president's improved standing has been reflected in voters' views of the congressional elections. The latest USA Today/Gallup poll has Democratic and Republican candidates for Congress splitting the national vote on the so-called "generic ballot" question, 48 percent to 48 percent. The same poll in June had Democrats leading 51 percent to 39 percent.

Mr. Zogby allows that "things could happen, but right now, I think Republicans hold their majority in both houses." He said he doesn't think anger against Mr. Bush is sufficient to turn Congress over to the Democrats.

"The president is slowly but steadily regenerating support among his own base," he says. "I saw him do it before, going from 78 percent Republican approval before the 2004 GOP convention to 91 percent before Election Day."

Comparing the 2006 midterm elections to previous major shifts, Mr. Mehlman says he sees none of the signs that preceded those landslides. In 1974, following the Watergate scandal, there was a surge in the Democratic primary-voter turnout and a decline in Republican voter turnout. The reverse was true before the 1994 Republican sweep of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0069445

So far this year, there has been no indication of a Democratic surge. In 36 of 39 primaries, the Democratic turnout has been lower than the average of the past 20 years. Only Connecticut, North Dakota and Vermont had higher-than-average Democratic turnouts this year.

Republicans are doing a better job than Democrats of communicating with their core voters, says Mr. Zogby.

"I think Republicans are talking in an effective way to their base, which is particularly concerned about terrorism," says Mr. Zogby. "But Democrats, whose base wants to hear how we get out of Iraq, simply dance around the answer. Democrats are acting like John Kerry in 2004, trying to appeal to swing voters in yet another election in which there are no swing voters."

Republican Campaigns Set To Sling Mud (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sinister characters are scheming in a smoke-filled room, in a television ad that depicts big campaign contributors to Bob Casey, a Democrat running for Senate in Pennsylvania.

After detailing the legal troubles that each donor faces — including an FBI investigation and jail time — the somber narrator asks, "Where does Casey hold his campaign meetings?"

The camera pulls back to show the cigar-smoking "campaign team" — behind bars.

That graphic, personal attack on the candidate challenging Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is a particularly sharp-edged example of a key strategy in the Republican political arsenal as the party fights to keep control of Congress: going negative and personal, early and often.

While President Bush and national GOP leaders are attacking Democrats on such big issues as national security and America's role in the world, individual Republicans are hitting their opponents hard — below the belt, some critics say — on personal and local issues.

Negative campaigning is hardly new, and Democrats are dishing dirt against Republicans too. But mudslinging is crucial to the Republican plan for this year's midterm elections, because the party's hold on power will probably hinge on shifting attention from the unpopular war in Iraq and other national issues that cut against them.

"When people are looking at national issues that are not breaking our way, what you want to do is focus on your opponent," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee chief of staff. "You've got to play the field's conditions. They demand very tough tactics."

Cole spelled out that approach in a recent strategy memo to House Republicans: "Define your opponent immediately and unrelentingly.... Do not let up — keep the tough ads running right up to election day. Don't make the mistake of pulling your ads in favor of a positive rotation the last weekend."

Republican incumbents this year began running attack ads earlier than ever. But the hardest-hitting are yet to come.

"You haven't seen the majority of the negative ads yet," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, where a staff of 10 has been deployed on opposition research.

The strategy rests on the widely held belief that negative political ads make more of an impression on voters than positive ones.

GOP consultant Terry Nelson said current voter cynicism may be particularly fertile ground for negative advertising because voters expect the worst from politicians.

"Voters are in some ways more ready to accept the negative about politicians than they do the positive," Nelson said. "They often say they would like to see a more reasoned debate in campaigns and more talk about the ideas, but in fact they often respond to negative ads because they tend to find them more credible."

Republican incumbents have moved aggressively to shape early perceptions of their Democratic challengers.

Democratic strategist Peter Fenn said: "You have a blackboard that's not written on very much — what Republicans are trying to do is write all over that blackboard in great big letters before the challengers have a chance to write on it."

In one of the most competitive House races, Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) sent about a dozen mailings attacking Democrat Lois Murphy before Labor Day. He aired an ad in August portraying her as a fearsome liberal who wants to raise taxes. His latest ad accuses her of sending illegal campaign mailings, which she denies.

The National Republican Congressional Committee first took to the airwaves back in June. Its first television ad was against Brad Ellsworth, a Democratic sheriff who has mounted a strong challenge to Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.). The ad accused Ellsworth of neglecting his duties as sheriff because his department inadvertently released a suspected child rapist — featured in a grainy mug shot — while the Democrat was campaigning in Washington.

Also in Indiana, GOP Rep. Chris Chocola has been on the air for months hammering his Democratic opponent, lawyer and businessman Joe Donnelly. Chocola did not just use the standard GOP line of painting Donnelly as a tax-and-spend liberal; GOP researchers also combed through county tax records and found that Donnelly had been delinquent on his property taxes 15 times.

DOJ_NMG_0069446

"Joe Donnelly wants to raise our taxes," a Chocola TV ad said in August. "Even worse, he's delinquent paying his own."

In New Mexico, Republican Rep. Heather A. Wilson tried to slow the early momentum of her Democratic challenger, state Atty. Gen. Patricia Madrid, with a tough negative ad. She attacked Madrid's performance as the state's top law officer at a time when corruption scandals spread through the state's upper echelons.

Amy Walter, an analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said that ad helped shift the focus of the campaign from Democrats' charges that Wilson is a rubber stamp for Bush, who is unpopular in the swing district.

"For Wilson, by going on the attack, the goal was to make the debate about the two candidates rather than a referendum on the current environment," Walter said. "It succeeded in that."

Madrid may have cut her losses by quickly fighting back with an ad not only defending herself but linking Wilson to resigned House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

It remains to be seen whether the GOP barrage will do lasting damage, especially since Madrid and other Democrats have made a concerted effort to respond aggressively. Ellsworth countered with an ad attacking Hostettler's record on crime; Donnelly pointed out that Chocola was also once late in paying taxes; Murphy aired an ad challenging Gerlach's claim to be independent of Bush.

Some political operatives say the impact of attack ads may be evident not in today's polls but on election day. Evan Tracey, head of Campaign Media Analysis Group, said negative ads often depressed turnout among voters who might otherwise have supported the candidate under attack.

That underscores why attack ads may be particularly important to Republicans' strategy: Many polls show that Democrats are generally more motivated than Republicans to vote this fall.

But the strategy carries risks: Some voters react badly to a candidate who is seen as smearing another unfairly.

"You're surrounding yourself with live bombs and lighting fuses when you go down this road," said Republican strategist Eddie Mahe Jr. "It is very, very risky."

Some critics say Santorum risks backlash from his ad suggesting that Casey consorts with crooks. The ad uses actors to depict Casey donors, claiming that several are under investigation, one was charged with extortion and another was sentenced to two years in jail. No names are mentioned in the ad, but the Santorum campaign has produced a 70-page document to back up its claims about seven Casey contributors.

G. Terry Madonna, director of the Center for Politics and Public Affairs at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa., sees the ad as an effort to shake up the race because six weeks of positive ads about Santorum had failed to erase Casey's lead in the polls.

"I think it's over the top," Madonna said. "I think it is unfair."

He said the people in question — whom the ad calls Casey's "campaign team" — donated to previous Casey campaigns but were not working on or contributing to his current campaign.

In fact, two of the seven have also donated to Santorum. One of the seven is dead. And though the ad puts the group behind bars, only one of the seven went to jail.

Santorum spokeswoman Virginia Davis said the ad provided important information about Casey at a time when polls showed that about a third of Pennsylvania voters still did not know enough about Casey to have an opinion about him.

"This ad is about character," said Davis. "It is important that voters know the kinds of people he is surrounding himself with."

janet.hook@latimes.com

Presidential Face Time Isn't Everything, Except To Big Donors (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

CINCINNATI, Sept. 25 — Republicans do not expect to be riding President Bush's record to re-election this fall. But they are trying to ride his gravy train — as quietly as possible.

Mr. Bush scooped up $1.7 million for Republicans in Connecticut and Ohio on Monday, at fund-raisers that, like so many of his events this campaign season, took place in private homes behind closed doors. He lunched in Greenwich, at a home overlooking the Long Island Sound, raising $700,000 for the Connecticut Republican Party before dashing off to Ohio to help Senator Mike DeWine.

DOJ_NMG_0069447

Three House Republicans from Connecticut — Representatives Nancy Johnson, Rob Simmons and Christopher Shays — face tight re-election races, but only one, Mr. Shays, whose district includes Greenwich, showed up for the afternoon affair at the home of the investment banker L. Scott Frantz.

There, 65 wealthy donors dined on Chilean sea bass, ravioli with butter sage sauce and a salad of field greens, while the White House press corps was served the same fare outside — at a respectable distance.

"He is helping us to raise money and get out the vote and that is very helpful," said Mr. Shays, though he acknowledged the downside: "You know and I know that my opponent is running as if President Bush is up for re-election, and he obviously isn't."

In Ohio, Mr. Bush toured a Cincinnati factory that makes gas turbine engines for airplanes and spoke for two and a half minutes about his tax cuts. Then he zipped off to another private event, a dinner at the home of John F. Barrett, chairman of a financial services company, which raised $1 million for Ohio Republicans — $400,000 of it for Mr. DeWine.

Such private events — five are planned for this week alone — give Mr. Bush a chance to mingle with donors out of the earshot of reporters, and far from photographers who might capture him with candidates leery of being viewed as too close to the White House.

Among them is Senator DeWine, who faces a difficult challenge from Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat. The senator skipped two presidential visits to Ohio this year but was on hand Monday to give Mr. Bush a hearty — and very public — handshake and clap on the back when Air Force One landed at the Cincinnati airport.

"I appreciate the president coming in," Mr. DeWine said later, on the tarmac at Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland, after flying home with Mr. Bush on Air Force One. "He raised a lot of money. It's always good to be with the president."

Asked if Mr. Bush could do him any good, the senator paused, and repeated himself, "It's always good to be with the president."

One thing Mr. Bush can do — and has done — is raise money for Mr. DeWine; Monday's was his third fund-raiser for the senator. All have been closed to the press, which is the senator's policy.

The Republican National Committee, which tracks Mr. Bush's fund-raising appearances, does not keep statistics on whether he is attending more closed events this year than in the past. The White House says events are closed when they are in private homes.

Democrats, meanwhile, have been quick to point out that so far this election season, Mr. Bush has not done any traditional campaign rallies. "There's a four-letter word Republican candidates are not using: B-U-S-H," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

In Ohio, the Democratic committee is running a television advertisement featuring an image of Mr. DeWine draping his arm around Mr. Bush, with lyrics that take off on a children's song: "The more we work together, together, together, the more we work together, the happier we'll be."

Despite the risk of providing fodder for such advertisements, Republicans can ill afford to keep too much distance from the president. Even with public approval ratings in the 40 percent range, Mr. Bush remains a powerful fund-raising draw. Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, told reporters recently that Mr. Bush had more fund-raising invitations for the remaining weeks of the campaign than he could possibly accept.

As of Monday, the committee said, Mr. Bush had raised nearly $176 million for Republican candidates this election cycle.

By week's end, that figure will rise; Mr. Bush's schedule includes an "Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin Victory 2006" reception on Tuesday (closed); an event on Wednesday for Bob Corker, the Republican Senate candidate in Tennessee (closed); a reception in Birmingham on Thursday for Alabama's governor, Bob Riley (open); and another Ohio fundraiser on Thursday, for Representative Deborah Pryce (closed).

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said the trend would change. "We'll have a lot of open events," he said, talking to reporters in a grove of trees along the waterfront in Greenwich. And in any case, he said, nothing very newsworthy was going on inside: "It's not like the administration is pulling rabbits out of its hat. He's saying things that you've heard before."

Bush Helps GOP Incumbents In Conn., Ohio (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, September 26, 2006

President Bush combined two fundraising trips for threatened GOP incumbents Monday with a tour of a family-run manufacturing business he pointed to as proof that his tax cuts are helping the economy.

But the most powerful economic news could be found at the gas stations all over Cincinnati, where gas could be bought for a little more than $2 a gallon.

DOJ_NMG_0069448

"This economy of ours is strong," Bush said after touring Meyer Tool Inc. in Cincinnati. He said the company is benefiting from those tax cuts and added 125 jobs over the last year.

The president has had trouble convincing the public that the economy is doing well. Only four in 10 people approve of the way he's handling the economy, according to AP-Ipsos polling.

But the rapid drop in gas prices over the last month could attract more attention from the public than countless speeches about economic policy.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said that "everyone notices gas prices." He scoffed at suggestions the administration is pushing prices down just before elections, saying people are crediting Bush "with the kind of magisterial power unknown to any other human being."

But the administration message on Monday was more focused on maintaining business conditions that help companies thrive and create more jobs.

Bush advocated making his tax cuts permanent, a frequent theme at stops around the country. He said such a move would help small businesses like Meyer Tool. During his tour of the plant, Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio was close by his side. DeWine was criticized when he did not appear with Bush on some earlier visits.

Bush raised almost $1 million for DeWine, who is in a close re-election contest with Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown.

Earlier in the day, Bush met privately with Republican donors at an estate in Greenwich, Conn., raising almost $800,000 for GOP House members facing tough re-election fights.

About 65 people attended the Connecticut event at the mansion on Long Island Sound. The money was raised to help Republican candidates, but mostly to help GOP Reps. Christopher Shays, Nancy Johnson and Rob Simmons. The three are top targets for Democrats trying to gain the 15 seats needed to take control of the House.

Incumbent Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman is running as an independent after losing the Democratic primary to anti-war candidate Ned Lamont. The Republican in the race, former Derby mayor Alan Schlesinger, has been drawing less than 5 percent in the polls and was not invited to Monday's fundraiser.

Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell was invited but did not attend, citing a previous commitment. It's the second time since becoming governor in 2004 that Rell, who remains popular in the polls, skipped a visit from Bush.

Snow, meanwhile, suggested the White House was staying out of a flap over whether former President Clinton did enough as president to try to kill or capture Osama bin Laden.

In a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday," Clinton defended his handling of the threat posed by bin Laden, and said he tried to have bin Laden killed but was attacked for his efforts by "all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now."

"President Clinton really had strong feelings about this. We're not going to engage," Snow told reporters.

The presidential spokesman also criticized news reports based on a government-produced intelligence assessment suggesting the war in Iraq had worsened the terrorism threat by helping to create a new generation of Islamic radicals.

"The report is not limited to Iraq," Snow said of the still-classified report. He said "a variety of factors in addition to Iraq" had fueled the spread of terrorist activity.

Bush Touts Tax Cuts (CINE)

By Howard Wilkinson

The Cincinnati Enquirer, September 26, 2006

INDIAN HILL -- President Bush wanted to make the point in Cincinnati this afternoon -- he wants part of his legacy as president to be that he cut taxes permanently.

To do it he will need to have Republican senators like Ohio's Mike DeWine re-elected this fall. And that explains why Bush came to Cincinnati: to help DeWine tap once again into Indian Hill's almost bottomless well of Republican campaign money.

So, once again, Air Force One touched down at the Greater Cincinnati-Northern Kentucky International Airport, and the presidential motorcade snaked its way through late afternoon traffic to the Indian Hill home of John Barrett, CEO of Western & Southern Financial Group, for a DeWine fundraising event that was expected to raise at least $1 million for DeWine's tough re-election campaign against Democrat Sherrod Brown.

Bush wasn't here long. Air Force One took off from CVG at 7:25 p.m.

Before heading to Indian Hill and an enthusiastic crowd that had paid $5,000 a piece to hear him, the president stopped in Camp Washington at the Meyer Tool plant, where about 900 workers do machine-tooling for GE and other aviation manufacturers.

At Meyer Tool, with DeWine and company officials at his side, Bush made his case in brief remarks.

It was the Bush tax cuts of 2001 and 2003, the president said, that enabled Meyer to expand and hire more workers.

"They've hired another 125 workers here, and expanded their business, all because of the tax cuts,'' Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0069449

DeWine didn't speak at the Meyer Tool event, but he has said that he would support making the Bush tax cuts permanent - a pledge that his Democratic opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown, has said will do little good for middle class working families because most of the tax cuts have gone to the wealthiest Americans.

About 30 protesters greeted Bush in Camp Washington behind a huge banner reading "Mission Not Accomplished."

"George Bush is a war criminal and the worst thing that's ever happened to this country," said Ellen Arnold of Northside. "He's doing the best he can to erode democracy. He's a liar and a cheat."

Said Richard Luken of Green Township: "I'm here because I'm concerned about what I see as the attack on the fundamental principles on which our country was founded."

President Speaks To Donors In 2 States (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

President Bush headlined closed-door fundraisers for embattled Republican congressional candidates in Connecticut and Ohio yesterday, events that underscored both his continued ability to attract donations and his continued unpopularity with much of the public.

The president stopped first at a luncheon at a palatial Greenwich, Conn., home overlooking Long Island Sound. The event, hosted by investment banker Scott Franz, was attended by 65 people and raised almost $800,000 for the state GOP's coffers, according to White House press secretary Tony Snow. Most of the money is expected to help Republican Reps. Nancy L. Johnson, Rob Simmons and Christopher Shays, all of whom are locked in tough races with Democratic challengers.

The White House is not supporting the candidacy of Republican Senate candidate Alan Schlesinger. He is running against antiwar Democrat Ned Lamont and incumbent Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary and is now running for reelection as an independent.

After the event, the president jetted to Cincinnati, where he took part in a fundraiser for Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine. It marked the third time this year Bush has held a closed-door fundraiser for DeWine, who is in a tight contest with Rep. Sherrod Brown (D).

Although Bush won Ohio during his reelection campaign two years ago, the state's relatively high unemployment rate and growing opposition to the war in Iraq have helped erode the president's popularity there. One television ad for Brown, financed by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, shows a blurry photograph of a laughing DeWine arm-in-arm with Bush. "Mike DeWine likes working together . . . with George Bush," reads text laid over the photograph.

The situation in Ohio is hardly unique. Bush has been featured in the ads of Democratic congressional candidates across the country who are trying to tie the unpopular president to GOP candidates. At the same time, many Republican candidates have chosen to stay out of public view when with the president, even while seeking his help to raise money. The president's two events yesterday were among five closed fundraisers that he is scheduled to take part in this week.

Snow brushed aside suggestions that Bush was meeting privately with Republicans because of his low approval ratings. "We're having them closed because they are in private homes," he said.

Vice President Cheney also hit the road yesterday, headlining a $140,000 event at a Milwaukee hotel, where he warned that "reckless" Democrats would undermine the nation's security if they win in the fall. Withdrawing from Iraq, Cheney said, would "validate the al-Qaeda strategy and invite even more terrorist attacks in the future."

Cheney then spoke at a rally of Michigan Army National Guard troops at an armory in Wyoming, Mich., with scores of camouflage-clad soldiers standing behind him. Afterward, the vice president headed for a closed-door fundraiser in East Lansing, expected to raise $935,000 for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard and state Republicans.

Staff writer Peter Baker contributed to this report.

No Silent Majority For Bush (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

What could prove to be the most important factor in the 2006 elections is overlooked because it is unseen: The Republicans cannot try to curry favor with a "silent majority" that favors the Iraq war because a majority of Americans, both vocal and quiet, have come to see the war as a mistake.

President Bush's defenders have cast opponents of the war as weak on terrorism. Yesterday, Vice President Cheney accused Democrats of "resignation and defeatism." But the charges have not taken hold, because most Americans don't agree with the premise linking the war on terror with the war in Iraq.

And blame for the failures in Iraq has fallen not on some liberal coterie supposedly holding our generals back but on the choices of civilians in a conservative administration. Those civilians, and their allies outside the administration, find themselves under increasing fire from leaders of the military and the intelligence services for bad planning, flawed analysis and unrealistic expectations.

DOJ_NMG_0069450

Moreover, the tone of the opposition to this war is quite different from the tenor of some sections of the movement against the Vietnam War. Reaction to "hippie protesters," as the phrase went, allowed President Richard Nixon to pit a hardworking, patriotic "silent majority" -- it was one of the most politically potent phrases of his presidency -- against the privileged, the young and the media, whom his vice president Spiro Agnew memorably characterized as "effete snobs" and "nattering nabobs of negativism."

As the historian and Nixon biographer Stephen Ambrose noted, tiny minorities -- "they numbered less than 1 percent of the demonstrators," he wrote of a 1969 rally -- "waved Viet Cong flags . . . and even burned American flags" and served as "magnets to the television cameras." They were used to exemplify an entire movement.

By contrast, critics of the Iraq war, deeply influenced by the post-Sept. 11 climate of national solidarity, have been resolutely patriotic and pro-military. They have often chastised the administration for offering American troops too little in the way of body armor and armored vehicles, and for shortchanging veterans.

Among the most visible critics of the administration's approach have been generals, vets, parents with sons and daughters in the military, and foreign policy realists who think of themselves as moderate or even conservative opponents of what they see as the administration's radical direction.

That is why news over the weekend of a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq is especially troublesome for Republican electoral chances. By finding that the war in Iraq has encouraged global terrorism and spawned a new generation of Islamic radicals, the report by 16 government intelligence services undercuts the administration's central argument that the Iraq war has made the United States safer.

Nor is there any way to dismiss the assessment as partisan, left-wing or unpatriotic. That high-level government officials have offered their own criticisms of the war's impact makes it difficult for Republicans to force the argument into a classic "he said-she said" framework in which facts can be set aside and the claims of critics dismissed as political.

It is no wonder that the administration immediately insisted that news reports were "not representative of the complete document," in the words of a White House spokesman. The phrase was a classic instance of the non-denial denial, a defensive response from an administration that has tried, with some success, to remain on offense on the terrorism issue all month.

The conventional, and accurate, view of this fall's elections is that Iraq is a Democratic issue and the broader war on terrorism is a Republican issue. Accordingly, Democrats such as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid were understandably eager to point to the report as a commentary on the president's "repeated missteps in Iraq and his stubborn refusal to change course," as Reid put it Sunday.

But beneath the conventional account is a more revealing truth: that over the past four years, the burden of proof on the Iraq war has been turned on its head.

During the 2002 election campaign -- before the war had actually begun -- Democratic candidates all over the country fled the Iraq debate and feared raising any questions about Bush's national security choices. In 2006 it's the administration trying to keep Iraq out of the campaign and to move the public conversation to anything else as an alternative to an accounting for its war decisions that so many middle-of-the-road Americans now regret. There is no silent majority to bail the president out.

postchat@aol.com

Snow To Raise Money For GOP Candidates (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, September 26, 2006

White House press secretary Tony Snow is taking his gift of gab across the country in the coming weeks to raise money for Republican candidates, an unusual task for the president's top spokesman.

On the job just four months, the former Fox News commentator is in-demand on the GOP circuit. He said he decided to help maintain the party's majority in Congress after some consideration of his proper role — and that doesn't include a lot of red meat rhetoric like some speakers offer at partisan events.

"They asked, and I thought about it a lot and we went back and forth," Snow said. "It's one of those things where I certainly want to help the president. But you have to make sure it's a fine line, and that's why I don't want to get into opponent bashing.

"The approach I'm going to take is not going to be one of going out and whacking Democrats by name, but straightforward comments about what the president has accomplished," Snow said.

Snow already has been speaking at some events with Republican activists, such as an appearance before about 800 with the Pennsylvania Republican Party on Sept. 15. But his first big candidate fundraisers come next week, when he headlines fundraisers for Reps. Jean Schmidt in his hometown of Cincinnati and Geoff Davis of a neighboring district in northern Kentucky. Expectations are high, with Republicans hoping for as much as $100,000-$150,000 per appearance.

DOJ_NMG_0069451

White House political director Sara Taylor, who handles political scheduling for all senior administration officials, said she's slated Snow for about half a dozen fundraisers in the final month of the campaign and may add more. She said Republicans who have been watching Snow for years on Fox and are intrigued by his new job are eager to meet him.

"This is a new person who is a great messenger, who is very funny, who is very affable and who people like to be around," she said.

Snow said taxpayers will not pay for any of his travel — the bill is being footed by the Republican National Committee. He said fundraising is "fairly unusual ground" for a sitting press secretary, and he won't hesitate to cancel a political appearance if he's needed at the White House.

"If there's a conflict between that and my day job, then the day job wins," he said.

GOP Brass To Meet Lobbyists (RC)

By Kate Ackley And Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 26, 2006

With only a few days left before they leave town for the campaign trail, House Republican leaders — with an assist from White House strategist Karl Rove — will mount one final push this week for the financial support of GOP lobbyists.

Thursday afternoon at the Capitol Hill Club, Rove will join the top six House GOP leaders to address as many as 200 lobbyists, the first large-scale meeting between lobbyists and leaders in recent months.

“This is a straight-out appeal to [lobbyists] to contribute to Republicans — to remind them what Republicans do not only for their specific industries but for the whole business community,” said a GOP leadership aide. The aide added that the leaders would emphasize that “reports of the Republican majority’s demise have been greatly exaggerated, and we’re coming back.”

Several GOP sources said the leadership also would reiterate a warning against giving to Democrats that was conveyed by National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) earlier this month to a smaller group of lobbyists and political action committee directors.

As one aide put it, part of Thursday’s message will be, “if you’re hedging your bets you’re making the wrong decision.”

A leadership aide from another office made the same point, saying that if lobbyists give to Democrats, “they might want to think twice about it.”

For the party’s true believers, the second aide added, the message will be one of comfort — that “they’re going to be on the side that’s going to win.”

Thursday’s gathering will be under the auspices of the “coalitions” effort run by Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) that focuses on outreach to the lobbying community.

Lobbyists said they received an e-mail invitation last week from Keri Ann Hayes, executive director of Blunt’s PAC, to a confab that will include pep talks from Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Reynolds, Blunt, Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) and Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio). (Rove was not listed on the invitation, but sources said he’s going to be the “special guest” who was promised to attendees.)

Between 150 and 200 business lobbyists and representatives from interest groups and think tanks are expected to attend.

According to a Republican who had a copy of the agenda, Blunt is scheduled to give the introduction at the meeting. Hastert then will run through the accomplishments of the 109th Congress and Boehner will discuss the party’s vision and “why the majority matters.”

Pryce — who’s in a highly competitive re-election race of her own — will speak on the latest developments on the messaging and polling front, while Reynolds is set to outline the current House election landscape.

Cantor will give an update on the NRCC’s “Battleground” program to aid vulnerable incumbents and Rove will conclude with his own remarks about the importance of the coming elections.

Several lobbyists who said they planned to attend expect a cheerful outlook on the upcoming midterm elections. One lobbyist said he expected a “pep rally atmosphere.”

The event will be modeled after the Whip operation’s coalitions meetings, which had been routine in the past few years. Back then, lobbyists and lawmakers frequently met to talk strategy in Room HC-5 of the Capitol on issues such as passing the Central American Free Trade Agreement and other major pieces of legislation.

But a series of scandals involving lobbyists, Members and Congressional aides sent a chill through such large-scale interactions between K Street and Congress, and the full coalitions team has not met recently.

Recounts, Run-offs To Mark Races In 2006 (AP)

By David Espo

AP, September 26, 2006

It's Nov. 8, the day after the election. The costliest and nastiest campaign for control of the House in history is .... not yet over.

Instead, in this hypothetical case, both parties are short of the 218 seats needed to guarantee control. The outcome will be decided by run-off elections in Louisiana and Texas, recounts in a half-dozen races that are too close to call and perhaps a party switch or two.

Unprecedented? Yes. Impossible? Absolutely not, given an era of polarization that has produced a presidential election so close the Supreme Court had to settle it, and a 50-50 tie in the Senate.

"It means that all of your focus and energy will be on trying to get to 218 in two ways," said Steve Elmendorf, who was chief of staff to Dick Gephardt, former Democratic leader. "One, in recounts and trying to make sure you're throwing every legal strategy and lawyer you can find into try and win the recounts.

"Secondly, you're going to be looking for every potential person on the other side who can switch."

"I have no one in particular in mind," said Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., asked about Democrats who might be approached to become a Republican. He said he doubted any of his rank-and-file would defect.

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win control of the House, and strategists in both parties agree Republicans are likely to lose at least some ground on Nov. 7.

Looking past election night, the possibility exists for December runoff elections in Louisiana, where state law turns Election Day into an open primary; and in Texas, where a court ruling had the same effect.

Louisiana's 2nd Congressional District has been heavily Democratic and likely to stay that way, despite the exodus of thousands of residents since Hurricane Katrina. Yet Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., is at the center of a federal bribery investigation, and two of his 12 opponents are Republican.

A runoff will be held Dec. 9 if no candidate gains a majority of the votes Nov. 7, and Republicans nurse hopes that the Democratic vote splinters and Jefferson advances along with a GOP contender.

In Texas, the Supreme Court ruled a San Antonio-area district violated the Constitution, and the lines were redrawn to bring it into compliance. Rep. Henry Bonilla, a Republican, has drawn two Democratic opponents, former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez and Lukin Gilliland. Democrats hope to deny Bonilla the 50 percent he needs to win re-election outright on Nov. 7, then beat him in a run-off.

In addition, both parties will be ready for races that are too close to call on Nov. 7.

"On election nights we have six to eight teams of people with their bags packed ready to go," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the Republican campaign committee. Each team includes a lawyer, a political aide and a communications expert.

For Democrats, "there is a program in place to make sure that if there is a recount in place, there are folks ready to go," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Recounts mean lawyers, and run-offs mean television commercials. The common denominator is money.

Burton said if the battle for control of the House goes into overtime, Democrats will "raise money like crazy for the recount efforts and for the special elections." So will the Republicans.

Both parties also will be on the hunt for lawmakers willing to switch allegiances.

It sounds unlikely, given that the winners on Nov. 7, particularly the newcomers, will have benefited handsomely from party assistance.

But at least one challenger has said he doesn't want to make any pre-election commitments on the choice for speaker.

"I will do my interview process and pick the person that not only fits the best for our district, but also fits our party best," said Heath Shuler, a Democrat challenging Rep. Charles Taylor in North Carolina.

The election of a speaker is the first order of business when a new Congress convenes, and underscores the importance of party control. The majority party also decides what legislation comes to a vote, appoints its own lawmakers committee chairmen, decides what hearings to hold and what investigations to conduct.

The choice of a speaker always falls along party lines, although some Democrats have strayed in recent years.

Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss., voted for a Democrat, but not Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California in 2005. Interviewed recently, he said, "if it comes out to my vote deciding whether I can be a subcommittee chairman, I'm going to vote in the nation's best interests as well as my own," and go with Pelosi.

Then there are factors beyond the reach of mortals.

Republicans won control of the House by one seat after the votes were counted in 1930, according to Fred Beuttler, deputy historian of the House. Between Election Day and the time Congress convened, 19 lawmakers had died, and special elections to pick replacements delivered control to the Democrats.

Can it happen again?

"Their guys are older than our guys," said one Republican aide.

He was joking, maybe.

Parties Lining Up Lawyers For Election Day Challenges (CCT)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins

The Contra Costa Times, September 26, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio - Democrats are openly lining up election-day teams of lawyers around the country to fight what they allege could be GOP efforts to suppress votes.

Republicans quietly say they have their own strategies for potential problems Nov. 7 but won't give specifics. They say Democrats' concerns are overblown.

"They're going to have an awful lot of people standing around with nothing to do," said Bill Todd, a Republican lawyer in Columbus who expects to work for the state GOP on election day.

The parties' efforts come in the wake of the 2000 recount in Florida and irregularities in Ohio's elections two years ago.

Those problems included long lines, a shortage of voting machines and some electronic machines that malfunctioned or miscounted votes. Ohio gave President Bush the White House in 2004.

The goal is that "everyone who is entitled to vote votes, and everyone who votes has their vote counted," said Kent Markus, co-chair of the legal team being assembled by the Ohio Democratic Party.

Scrutiny of vote counting is sure to he high this election with parties fighting in many close congressional races around the country. Republicans are struggling to keep their House majority, while in Ohio Democrats have their best chance in almost a decade to take back the governor's office.

The Democratic National Committee has set up a toll-free hot line for voters having problems and boasts it will have thousands of volunteer lawyers in 18 states available to fight ballot challenges.

Markus said Ohio will have more than 200 lawyers available on election day in all 88 counties.

In Florida, Democrats will have teams of lawyers working around the state beginning Oct. 23 when Florida begins early voting. The party expects Republicans to be on the watch for voter fraud despite Democrats' contention that widespread fraud does not exist.

In Indiana, at least 200 volunteer attorneys will monitor voting in selected legislative races and three closely contested congressional races in which the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee plans to run campaign ads.

The party is worried about Indiana's new voter identification law, which sets strict limits on the type of photo ID that poll workers can accept, said Kip Tew, an Indianapolis attorney organizing the Democratic lawyers.

The Indiana GOP will have volunteer poll watchers and challengers in place around the state, but says it has no equivalent legal strategy. Republican party spokesman Robert Vane said Democrats are manufacturing a GOP threat to scare voters.

State and national Republicans say only that they're working with state parties and campaigns to make sure every vote is counted.

The Republican National Committee says it's confident it can handle any legal challenges brought by Democrats. But spokesman Aaron McLear said he wasn't going to lay out the party's strategy.

"We want to make that sure every legitimate voter is able to vote and we don't want legitimate votes canceled out by illegitimate votes," he said.

As part of its efforts, the Ohio Democratic Party sued Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell, demanding he issue orders to county election boards on how to deal with potential election-day problems.

Those include instructions on securing electronic voting machines, what to do if those machines break and what to do in the case of long lines.

Counties' bipartisan election boards have existing rules in place for handling security, said James Lee, a Blackwell spokesman.

He said the state added $3 million to contracts with voting machine makers Diebold Inc. and Elections System & Software to ensure they have extra employees working election night. He said counties expecting large turnouts are pushing absentee ballots, available for the first time this year for anyone who requests them.

"We have experienced election officials who have proven over and over they can successfully administer elections at the county level," Lee said.

Democrats continue to react to 2000 when they felt outgunned by GOP lawyers in Florida, said Nathaniel Persily, a University of Pennsylvania election law professor.

DOJ_NMG_0069454

"The Democrats are better off now than they were six years ago, but it's still fair to say the Republicans, as in many areas of elections, have a more disciplined legal hierarchy and strategy," Persily said.

That might explain why the GOP isn't saying much about its plans for election day.

"If you run your legal team like an army you don't talk about strategy before the battle," Persily said.

ON THE NET

Ohio Democratic Party: http://www.ohiodems.org/

Ohio Republican Party: http://www.ohiogop.org/

Election Homestretch Yields Surprises (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash. -- Not long ago, Democrats in Washington state were threatening to abandon Sen. Maria Cantwell to protest her 2002 vote authorizing the war against Iraq. Now, the first-term senator says, "People here never wanted to lose this seat."

The senator spoke after an enthusiastic campaign rally underscored her suggestion that disgruntled Democrats have fallen in behind her, after concluding that their protest would only throw the seat to Republicans. Now, her bridge-building and the mistakes of her Republican rival, Mike McGavick, have Democratic leaders in the East resting easier about a seat that topped their endangered list for much of the year.

Mr. McGavick, a former chief executive of insurance company Safeco, says he is making up ground. In any case, the Washington state race illustrates the fluidity of the fall finale for Senate control as voters tune in. Republicans are struggling in a hostile climate to protect a 55-45 majority on Election Day. Democrats have to seize nearly every Republican target while losing none of their own.

The picture in the final stretch isn't what either side expected when the election cycle began. Republicans have given up on early targets among Democrats from states that backed President Bush's re-election, and are now struggling to keep some of their own red-state seats. Democrats, safe in red states, are campaigning hardest in blue ones, especially New Jersey.

Five Republican incumbents trail in polls. In Tennessee's open-seat contest to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford yesterday released a poll showing he had overtaken Republican Bob Corker. Two other Republican incumbents -- Virginia's George Allen and Arizona's John Kyl -- have seen their once-formidable leads erode to single digits.

Mr. Allen is perhaps the year's biggest surprise. He began on no one's watch list, but since summer he has been on the defensive -- first for using what some consider a racial slur against an Indian-American aide to Democratic rival Jim Webb and next for reacting angrily to revelations of his Jewish heritage. Even Republicans say he has stoked the controversies by his responses. Yesterday, Mr. Allen was denying new allegations from a college football teammate that he often used a slur to refer to black people and once stuffed a deer's head into a black family's mailbox.

The Senate Democrats' campaign committee is for the first time considering spending significant funds against Mr. Allen. Meanwhile, Democrats have grown less worried about three of their seats. Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Amy Klobuchar, seeking Minnesota's open spot, showed wide leads in polls released last week. Yesterday in Maryland, a Baltimore Sun poll showed Rep. Ben Cardin up by 11 points over Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. That leaves New Jersey as Democrats' biggest worry. Sen. Robert Menendez, seeking the seat he got last year by appointment, slightly trails Republican Tom Kean Jr., son of the former governor, after allegations of ethical breaches that the Democrat denies.

Nonpartisan analyst Stuart Rothenberg, in revised ratings yesterday, downgraded Republican Allen's prospects, and upgraded those for Democrats Klobuchar and Cantwell.

Last week's Washington primary results confirmed that Ms. Cantwell -- like Sen. Hillary Clinton in New York's Democratic primary the week before -- paid little price among party liberals for her war vote. That was a blow to Republican hopes that Connecticut Democrats' mutiny last month against three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman would prove contagious. (Mr. McGavick sent Mr. Lieberman, now running as an independent, a $1,000 contribution.)

When Washington's mostly mail-in vote was finally tallied late last week, Ms. Cantwell had 91% of the Democratic vote. An unfunded antiwar challenger, Hong Tran, won 5%. The ease of her renomination, and Mrs. Clinton's, suggests that the circumstances behind Mr. Lieberman's defeat were unique. Ms. Cantwell's record has been moderate, not maverick like Mr. Lieberman's; she has been critical of the president when he hasn't, and, perhaps most important, she didn't draw a deep-pocketed antiwar challenger.

DOJ_NMG_0069455

In past election years, Washington's combined Republican and Democratic primary vote has been a clue to what is ahead in November. Democrats' participation was significantly greater than Republicans', and Ms. Cantwell drew 53% of the combined vote to 36% for Mr. McGavick.

Ms. Cantwell has more money than Mr. McGavick, and while Republican leaders had hopes the wealthy businessman would spend more of his own money, he says he has no plans to go beyond the $2 million he has lent his campaign. Mr. McGavick was in Washington, D.C., last week for fund raising, but the first priority of Senate Republicans' campaign committee is helping beleagured incumbents.

Meanwhile, the McGavick campaign cites a poll by the independent Rasmussen Reports last week that has Ms. Cantwell's lead back to six points, as in mid-August -- down from a 17-point edge in a Rasmussen poll earlier this month. But Senate Democrats say their poll gave her a 12-point edge. The 48-year-old Mr. McGavick, a onetime top aide to former Washington Sen. Slade Gorton, says he "is coming back rather nicely" after a self-inflicted wound. In late August, he disclosed on his Web site a 1993 driving-under-the-influence incident, but his account differed significantly from the police report a state newspaper subsequently unearthed.

Ms. Cantwell, who turns 48 next month, ousted Sen. Gorton six years ago by just more than 2,000 votes. That close call, and her businesslike aloofness since, made her seem all the more vulnerable this year. After she refused in January to call her war vote a mistake, liberals' rebelliousness built. Two potentially worrisome candidates surfaced. Meanwhile, state and national pundits were praising Mr. McGavick. By late June, a Seattle paper headlined its poll story, "Cantwell's Lead Nearly Gone."

The senator explains her recovery simply: "We had a lot of meetings with people." She met with groups to let them vent. Supporters promoted Ms. Cantwell's work on other issues important to liberals -- for abortion rights and against drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, in particular. In July, the two rival Democrats had joined her campaign, leaving just Ms. Tran. And Ms. Cantwell issued a statement that if she had known the U.S. wouldn't find weapons of mass destruction, she wouldn't have voted for force against Iraq.

Write to Jackie Calmes at jackie.calmes@wsj.com1

In West, GOP No Longer A Shoo-in (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 26, 2006

CASPER, Wyo. — If history is any guide, Democrat Gary Trauner is on a fool's errand as he campaigns door-to-door to unseat six-term Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin.

A Democrat hasn't held Wyoming's at-large House seat since 1979, when Rep. Teno Roncalio retired after five terms — and an up-and-coming politician named Dick Cheney replaced him. In this state where Republicans are 61% of registered voters and Democrats 26%, President Bush won with 69% two years ago, a margin he exceeded only in Utah.

Trauner's campaign may not be entirely quixotic. National publications that track elections such as The Cook Political Report and Congressional Quarterly have started paying attention to what once was regarded as a Republican shoo-in.

In a Republican neighborhood here in Wyoming's second-largest city, Trauner, 47, a businessman, found some traction on a recent weekend even though he's yet to get funding from the Democrats' House campaign committee.

“People really do think it's time for a change,” says Marlene McLain, 61, after Trauner knocks on her door. McLain, a Republican, is critical of Cubin: “She doesn't listen to us. … She's not paying attention.”

Trauner's chances could also be affected by broader changes in the Rocky Mountain West, such as strong population growth. Democrats could build on gains they made in the region in 2002 and 2004.

Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz predicted the GOP is “going to continue to be successful in the Rocky Mountain West because ideologically we stand with voters, while Democrats have taken positions contrary to the views of a majority of voters.”

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, the West became the most reliably Republican region in the country. But in 2002, Democrats won gubernatorial races in Wyoming, New Mexico and Arizona. In 2004, at least below the president on the ballot, more splotches of blue appeared in the largely red region, as moderate Democrats with strong local ties won key races.

In 2004, Montana Democrats won the race for governor, took control of the state Senate and tied for control of the state House. In Colorado, Democrats won control of the Legislature for the first time in more than 40 years, and Hispanic brothers Ken and John Salazar won seats in the U.S. Senate and House that had been Republican.

Amy Walter of The Cook Political Report attributes the Democratic wins in the West to an influx of new residents, “a big chunk of it Hispanic.” She also believes voters in states like Montana want to balance Republican federal officeholders with Democratic state officials.

Some of the most up-for-grabs elections are in the West:

DOJ_NMG_0069456

·Colorado. Democrats have a chance to win the open governor's race because Bill Owens, a Republican, is retiring because of term limits. Democrat Bill Ritter, a former Denver prosecutor, has a 17-percentage-point lead over U.S. Rep. Bob Beauprez, a Republican, according to a recent Rocky Mountain News poll.

"So far, the Democrats have done everything right, and (Beauprez) has had a lot of trouble getting started," says Bob Loevy, a political science professor at Colorado College.

If Ritter wins, Democrats could be governor in five of the eight Mountain West states. Before the 2002 election, all these states — Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming — had Republican governors.

Also in Colorado, Democrats have one of their "best opportunities in the country" to pick up a House seat, Walter says. In the Denver-area district left vacant by Beauprez's run for governor, Democrat Ed Perlmutter, a former state senator, is running against Republican Rick O'Donnell. Both candidates emphasize tough measures to combat illegal immigration.

·Montana. Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is rated by many analysts as one of the most endangered GOP senators as he battles for a fourth term against Democrat Jon Tester, president of the state Senate. "Despite spending millions, Burns hasn't gained the momentum he wanted," says Craig Wilson, a political scientist at Montana State University-Billings.

Dogged by his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Burns has also made a number of highly publicized missteps. He criticized firefighters for their performance in this summer's wildfires. He also asked the governor to declare a fire emergency and activate the National Guard more than a month after the governor had.

·New Mexico. U.S. Rep. Heather Wilson, a Republican, is in a dead heat against Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Madrid has hammered Wilson for supporting the Iraq war; Wilson has charged Madrid with ignoring a corruption scandal in the treasurer's office.

·Arizona. The House seat of retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe makes most political analysts' lists of possible Democratic pickups. The Republican Party poured $200,000 into the primary campaign of moderate Steve Huffman, who lost Sept. 13 to the more conservative Randy Graf, a former state representative. Graf now faces Democrat Gabrielle Giffords, a former state senator.

In Wyoming, Cubin says she's confident of winning a seventh House term. She says Bush and the Iraq war have more support here than in other areas of the country, and she says voters will recognize her record of helping the state's energy industries. "I'm very optimistic about this race, but I always run as if I'm one vote behind."

Cubin won her August primary with an underwhelming 61% against a little-known opponent. "She's never racked up the numbers you'd expect of a Republican in a predominantly Republican seat," says University of Wyoming political science professor Jim King.

Trauner faces many obstacles, including what he calls the "heavy weight" of the GOP advantage here. He's a New York native in a state that values deep Western roots. As he tells voters that "we need a little fresh air in D.C.," Trauner tries to appear in the mold of moderate Democratic Gov. Dave Freudenthal, who is far ahead in his bid for a second term.

"I'm not a typical Democrat," Trauner says. "I'm pro-gun and pro-business."

Endangered Members Told: Pony Up (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 26, 2006

The most endangered House Republican lawmakers have been asked by their leaders to give $75,000 to party coffers, significantly more than was asked of rank-and-file members two years ago, a sign of how desperate party leaders are to raise money when their individual donor receipts are down and lobbyists are increasing their contributions to Democrats.

Rank-and-file Republicans are being asked to give $75,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC): $25,000 or 50 percent more than they were supposed to give in the last election cycle. Committee chairmen have been asked to give $200,000, or $50,000 (33 percent) more than last cycle, according to one chairman.

Even lawmakers who are fighting for their political lives, such as GOP Reps. Jim Gerlach (Pa.) and John Sweeney (N.Y.), have been asked to contribute $75,000 to party coffers.

The increase of individual giving targets is surprising because the overall fundraising goal for the program is the same as in 2004: around $18 million, according to a Republican who helped organize the effort last cycle. At a time when many Republicans feel they are more threatened than two years ago, it appears that leaders have decided that the best way to ensure they reach their fundraising goals is to overreach, knowing that some lawmakers will not hit their targets.

There is new urgency for Republicans to raise money from their members because the NRCC has raised nearly $20 million less from individual donors compared to 2004. Meanwhile, its counterpart, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has boosted individual receipts by $16 million. Adding to the pressure, lobbyists are reporting that their corporate clients are giving more to Democrats in case they recapture the House this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0069457

The top three House GOP leaders have been asked to give $550,000 each, the rest of the leadership has been asked for $300,000 per lawmaker. The chairmen of the most powerful committees, such as Appropriations, Energy and Commerce, and Ways and Means have been given $350,000 fundraising targets, while the chairmen of the other panels have $200,000 targets.

The heads of powerful subcommittees, such as the Appropriations Energy and Water sub-panel, should give $150,000, and the members of A-list committees have been billed for $100,000. Lawmakers may raise the funds or give them from their campaign accounts, said several participants.

The NRCC has revealed its overall $17.5 target for the fundraising program, known as Battleground, but has not made public the individual targets for lawmakers or how they compare to last cycle's. Lawmakers who've been asked to fund the effort, however, spoke of the goals.

Many lawmakers have yet to reach their new, higher targets, which they were given shortly before the August recess.

But perhaps more unusual, several vulnerable members including Gerlach and Sweeney said they are making every effort to meet the target, even if it means siphoning funds away from their own campaigns to help the party. Sweeney, who is battling in Democratic friendly New York, has vowed to meet his goal.

But other lawmakers say they will not meet their goal, viewing it only as a suggested target, and an expensive one at that. These lawmakers say their focusing on their own races.

"I've got a race back home I've got to finish," said Rep. Jim Ryun (R-Kan.), who won in 2004 with 56 percent of the vote.

Ryun admitted he has not given as much as he would like to the program.

"You do the best you can: if you make it, great, if you don't maybe it was a little high but you do the best you can," he said.

Ryun has given $12,000 to the NRCC as of the end of August.

Some members wish the perpetual money chase would stop, but realize it's part of the business.

"It's always a challenge raising money," said Rep. Scott Garrett (R-N.J.). "I'm not particularly good at it. I wish we didn't have to do it but it's part of the game."

House Republican leaders will remind the rank-and-file how important a part of the game it is this Wednesday at a meeting of the Republican conference. At that meeting leaders will put more pressure on their colleagues to hit their targets.

Battleground is a grueling program for participants and organizers.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) headed the effort in the last cycle and raised $22 million. But he declined to lead it again this year so House leaders drafted Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) to lead it, taking Cantor's staff by surprise.

Cantor said the program is going well and that many of his colleagues have participated enthusiastically.

"The initial goal was $17.5 million," he said. "We're well on our way to exceeding that goal."

A review of party receipts since July, when GOP lawmakers were first given their fundraising goals, reveals those who may be angling to move up in the GOP leadership or gain more powerful committee posts.

Rep. Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.), a senior member of the Financial Services Committee who may replace retiring Rep. Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) as chairman has given $435,500 in excess funds to the NRCC.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), who is running to chair the Budget Committee, gave $200,000. Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), who has emerged as a leader of the conservative House Republicans, gave $202,000.

Blue Dog PAC Tops $1 Million (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, September 26, 2006

Looking to shore up their influence in a more evenly divided House next year, conservative Blue Dog Democrats reached a fundraising milestone in August, raising more than $1 million for their PAC for the first time.

The 37-member Blue Dog Coalition has raised nearly $1.1 million for its PAC so far this election cycle and has doled out $600,000 in contributions, dwarfing the fundraising totals of other PACs associated with groups of lawmakers, according to figures recently filed with the Federal Election Commission. The 43-member New Democrat Coalition, in contrast, raised only $490,000 in the same period.

The Blue Dogs' cohesion and visibility among House Democrats has contributed to their fundraising prowess. Most of the group's members are white, conservative Democrats and hail from red states. All share a desire to balance the budget.

The group also sticks together—both politically and in where they choose to congregate on the House floor. They often sit shoulder-to-shoulder in seats bordering the House's center aisle, and they travel en masse to fundraisers. These bonds have long made them among the most unified and active groups in the House Democratic Caucus.

This year, though, they have added cachet. With Democrats predicted to gain seats in November, many corporate PACs are looking to curry favor with Democrats, especially those who have been sympathetic to business interests. (Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), the coalition's co-founder, was an early supporter of the Central America Free Trade Agreement despite Democratic leaders' opposition.) Other companies give to the business-friendly Blue Dogs in order to augment the total percentage they contribute to Democrats, a way to start currying favor with Democrats before an dif they gain the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0069458

For the Blue Dogs themselves, the newfound popularity is a recognition of the delicate position they may occupy in a Democratic House, that of balancing their own conservative tendencies with the liberal politics of their colleagues.

"We'll play a significant role in terms of agenda setting. That could pose some problems," Tanner said, alluding to the ideological differences. "I don't worry about it; We'll just have to see how things work out. If Democrats win, we'll certainly have a voice to be heard."

Rep. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), who co-chairs the PAC with Tanner, offered similar sentiments.

"There are those on the left side who want a pure agenda. But if we follow that, we are doomed to be the minority party," Boyd said. "I have heard [House Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi [D-Calif.] say a number of times that she wants to be Speaker of the House not the Speaker of the Democratic Party. If she does that...then it will work out right."

A number of prime Democratic pick-up opportunities involve conservative candidates the Blue Dogs have endorsed, making it nearly certain that the coalition will expand in the next Congress, perhaps dramatically. The Blue Dogs have endorsed former Reps. Ken Lucas (D-Ky.) and Baron Hill (D-Ind.), as well as Democratic challengers Brad Ellsworth (Ind.), Mike Weaver (Ky.), Heath Shuler (N.C.), Maxine Moul (Neb.), Kirsten Gillibrand (N.Y.), John Cranley (Ohio) and Phil Kellam (Va.). In open seats, they are backing Christine Jennings (Fla.) and Charlie Wilson (Ohio).

Blue Dogs already constitute nearly one fifth of the 201 House Democrats, but they are outnumbered by the Congressional Progressive Caucus (64), the Congressional Black Caucus (43), and the New Democrats (42).

Some of those caucuses are likely to grow as well. The CBC has endorsed candidates Keith Ellison (Minn.), Angie Paccione (Colo.) and Les Miller (Fla.). The 11-member Congressional Asian and Pacific American Caucus (CAPAC) is backing candidates Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) and Mazie Hirono (Hawaii) through its work with the Asian American Action Fund.

The Blue Dogs' fundraising, however, has dramatically outpaced that of similar groups. The CBC had raised $504,000 as of June 30. The House Conservatives Fund, which represents more than 100 conservative Republicans, took in $541,000 as of August 31.

For the Blue Dogs, their robust fundraising bolsters a viable political center in an ever more partisan Congress.

"There's a group of Democrats who aren't going to give their voting card to either leadership," Tanner told The Hill in July.

Teammates: Allen Used "N-word" In College (SAL)

By Michael Scherer

Salon.com, September 26, 2006

Three former college football teammates of Sen. George Allen say that the Virginia Republican repeatedly used an inflammatory racial epithet and demonstrated racist attitudes toward blacks during the early 1970s.

"Allen said he came to Virginia because he wanted to play football in a place where 'blacks knew their place,'" said Dr. Ken Shelton, a white radiologist in North Carolina who played tight end for the University of Virginia football team when Allen was quarterback. "He used the N-word on a regular basis back then."

A second white teammate, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he feared retribution from the Allen campaign, separately claimed that Allen used the word "nigger" to describe blacks. "It was so common with George when he was among his white friends. This is the terminology he used," the teammate said.

A third white teammate contacted separately, who also spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear of being attacked by the Virginia senator, said he too remembers Allen using the word "nigger," though he said he could not recall a specific conversation in which Allen used the term. "My impression of him was that he was a racist," the third teammate said.

Shelton also told Salon that the future senator gave him the nickname "Wizard," because he shared a last name with Robert Shelton, who served in the 1960s as the imperial wizard of the United Klans of America, a group affiliated with the Ku Klux Klan. The radiologist said he decided earlier this year that he would go public with his concerns about Allen if a reporter ever called. About four months ago, when he heard that Allen was a possible candidate for president in 2008, Shelton began to write down some of the negative memories of his former teammate. He provided Salon excerpts of those notes last week.

On Sunday morning, Salon spoke with David Snepp, a spokesman for Allen's Senate office, to ask for a response to the recollections of the three former teammates. E-mail and phone messages were also left for Bill Bozin, a spokesman for the Allen campaign, and Dick Wadhams, the campaign manager. Though Snepp indicated that the campaign, and probably Wadhams, would respond, eight hours later no one in the Allen camp had replied to Salon. Chris LaCivita, a consultant to the Allen campaign, hung up when a Salon reporter reached him midafternoon Sunday. Additional attempts to contact the campaign were unsuccessful. (Since Salon published this story, Allen has denied to other reporters having ever made such a racial slur.)

DOJ_NMG_0069459

The racial attitudes of Allen, a once formidable presidential contender in 2008, have become an issue in his highly contested reelection campaign against Jim Webb, a former Marine and author. Last month, Allen was videotaped calling an Indian-American college student "macaca," an obscure word for monkey that is also used as a racial epithet in some parts of the world. Allen has since apologized to the student, saying that he made up the word, and did not know its other meanings.

Last week, Allen again created controversy by appearing offended when a reporter asked about the Jewish lineage in his mother's family, which he has since acknowledged. Allen has also faced questions about his affinity for the Confederate flag, which he wore as a pin in a high school yearbook photo and exhibited in his home in Virginia.

In public statements, Allen has said that he realized later in life that the Confederate flag was a symbol of violence for black Americans, and he has expressed some regret. "There are a lot of things that I wish I had learned earlier in life," Allen said in an appearance this month on NBC's "Meet the Press." But Allen has maintained that he never harbored any discriminatory attitudes toward blacks. "Even if your heart is pure, the things you say and do and the symbols you use matter because of how others may take them," he said in the prepared transcript for remarks to a luncheon with black educators on Sept. 13.

Over the past week, Salon has interviewed 19 former teammates and college friends of Allen from the University of Virginia. In addition to the three who said Allen used the word "nigger," two others who were contacted said they remember being bothered by Allen's displaying the Confederate flag in college, but said they do not remember him acting in an overtly racist manner. Seven others said they did not know Allen well outside the football team, but do not remember Allen demonstrating any racist feelings. A separate seven teammates and friends said they knew Allen well and did not believe he held racist views. "I don't believe he was insensitive," said Paul Ryczek, who played center in Allen's year before joining the Atlanta Falcons. "He had no prejudices, biases or anything else."

In the interviews, old teammates generally spoke of him highly, as a good friend, a bright and ambitious student, and a colorful character who embraced Southern culture, listened to country music, and attracted the nickname "Neck," as in redneck. "If a black guy dropped a pass, he would say something to him," said Gerard Mullins, who played defensive back in Allen's year. "If it was a white guy, same thing. It really didn't matter where you were from, who you were, or anything."

The three former teammates, however, painted a very different picture of Allen when he was around his white friends. Shelton said he feels a personal responsibility to tell what he knows about Allen's past, especially now that Allen has been mentioned as a possible presidential candidate. "I got to know Allen a little too well," Shelton said, adding that he does not believe Allen should hold elective office. "He had prejudices that were deep-seated."

Shelton said no political animosity has driven his decision to speak out. He has switched between Democratic and independent registration in recent elections, he said, and does not consider himself politically active. Four years ago, Shelton and his wife donated $1,000 to Sam Neill, the Democratic challenger to Rep. Charles Taylor, R-N.C., because Shelton said they knew Neill and were upset by the allegations of corruption against Taylor, who was reelected. In February, Shelton supported Rick Davis, a current Republican candidate for sheriff, and penned a letter to the editor in the Hendersonville Times-News backing Davis' campaign. Shelton says he does not know much about Allen's political ideology and says he hasn't spoken to him in about 30 years. "There are no personal grudges," Shelton said. "There was no falling out."

Shelton played football with Allen in the 1972 and 1973 seasons, according to the team media guides from those years. Shelton remembers Allen's attitudes about race surfacing early in their relationship. At one point, Shelton says, Allen nicknamed him "Wizard," after United Klans imperial wizard Robert Shelton. "He asked me if I was related at all," Shelton remembers. "I knew of that name, and I said absolutely not." Several former teammates confirmed that Shelton's team nickname was "Wizard," though no one contacted by Salon could confirm firsthand knowledge of the handle's origin. "Everyone called me 'Wizard' that knows me from those days," said Shelton. "My nickname stuck."

Shelton said he also remembers a disturbing deer hunting trip with Allen on land that was owned by the family of Billy Lanahan, a wide receiver on the team. After they had killed a deer, Shelton said he remembers Allen asking Lanahan where the local black residents lived. Shelton said Allen then drove the three of them to that neighborhood with the severed head of the deer. "He proceeded to take the doe's head and stuff it into a mailbox," Shelton said.

Lanahan, a former resident of Richmond, Va., died this year at the age of 53, said his aunt Martha Belle Chisholm of Richmond. In an interview on Thursday, Chisholm said that she remembered Lanahan speaking highly of Allen. "Bill was very complimentary of George Allen," she said. "He said he was just one of the boys." Chisholm also confirmed that the Lanahan family owned hunting land near Bumpass, Va., about 50 miles east of the University of Virginia campus.

Allen, a college quarterback, arrived at Virginia in 1971 as a sophomore transfer from the University of California at Los Angeles, where he had a football scholarship after graduating from nearby Palos Verdes High School. He relocated to Virginia around the same time that his father, also named George Allen, took a job as the head coach of the Washington Redskins. At the time of his arrival, race relations at the University of Virginia were delicate. Allen's graduating class was the first to offer scholarships to black athletes, and included the first four black players on the football team and the first black starting quarterback, Harrison Davis, who did not return calls from Salon.

DOJ_NMG_0069460

Accusations of racial insensitivity have long dogged Allen's political career. As a member of the Virginia Legislature, Allen opposed a state holiday honoring Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. As Virginia's governor, Allen issued a proclamation honoring Confederate History Month that contained no mention of slavery. In recent years, however, Allen has made a point to reach out to minority communities, sponsoring legislation to fund historically black colleges and a resolution to condemn the lynching of blacks in the South. In a New Republic article by Ryan Lizza earlier this year, Allen discussed a "civil rights pilgrimage" he had taken to Birmingham, Ala., in 2003. "I wish I had [gone] sooner," the magazine quotes Allen saying. "I was listening to the old civil-rights movement, the strategies, the foundations, the tactics."

Several of Allen's teammates remember him arriving at the University of Virginia in 1971 with long sandy blond hair and surfer stories of the Pacific Ocean. "He was a Californian," remembers Craig Critchley, a family doctor in Ohio who played linebacker in Allen's year, and did not remember the senator displaying racial views. "It was like, 'Wow, man, yeah.'"

Shelton last remembers speaking with Allen in the mid-1970s, in Charlottesville, when Allen, then in law school, played with Shelton, who was in medical school, in an inter-city football league. For Shelton, the memories of Allen's behavior during his football days raise clear questions about the senator's fitness for office. "I just think that someone who attains that level of higher office needs to have higher standards," Shelton said. "He has deep-seated core values that are hard to reverse despite what he says."

By contrast, Allen has pointed to a different lesson from his days of football playing in recent public statements. On "Meet the Press," he said his football career was an experience that taught him racial tolerance. "I grew up in a football family, as you well know, and my parents and those teams taught me a lot," Allen said on the program. "And one of the things that you learn in football is that you don't care about someone's race or ethnicity or religion."

2 Ex-Acquaintances Of Senator Allen Say He Used Slurs (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25 — Two former acquaintances of Senator George Allen said Monday that he used racist slurs in the 1970's and 1980's, a development that compounded accusations of racial insensitivity that have dogged his re-election campaign in Virginia. Mr. Allen denied that he had ever used such words.

One of the two old acquaintances, Christopher Taylor, now an anthropology professor at the Birmingham campus of the University of Alabama, said he heard Mr. Allen use an epithet to describe African-Americans in the early 1980's.

Mr. Taylor, who is white and was then a graduate student at the University of Virginia, said the term had come up in a conversation about the turtles in a pond near Mr. Allen's property. Mr. Allen, Mr. Taylor said, told him that "around here" the only people who "eat 'em" were African-Americans, whom he described with the notorious epithet for blacks.

Separately, Dr. Ken Shelton, who was a football teammate of the senator at the University of Virginia and who is also white, said that while in college in the early 1970's Mr. Allen often used the same racially charged term. Mr. Shelton, whose account was first reported Sunday night in the online newsmagazine Salon, said Mr. Allen had told him that he had moved to Virginia "because the blacks know their place."

Mr. Shelton, a radiologist now living in North Carolina, said that on a hunting trip Mr. Allen had sought out the home of an African-American and affixed the head of a dead deer to the mailbox. He also said Mr. Allen had called him Wizard, for Robert Shelton, who used the title as a leader of the Ku Klux Klan.

"He wanted to know if I was related," Mr. Shelton recalled in an interview. "I said no."

Mr. Allen, a Republican once considered a front-runner for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, told The Associated Press on Monday that Mr. Shelton's accusations were "ludicrously false." And Dan Allen (no relation), an adviser to the Allen campaign, said the racial slur Mr. Taylor attributed to the senator was "not part of his vocabulary."

In a statement released by the campaign, Anne Waddell, who was George Allen's wife at the time, confirmed Mr. Taylor's visit to the Allen property but also said her former husband would never have used such terms.

In the A.P. interview, conducted before Mr. Taylor came forward, the senator said Mr. Shelton's "comments and assertions in there are completely false."

"I don't remember ever using that word," he said, "and it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Mr. Allen's campaign also distributed statements in his defense from three other college football teammates and a former trainer for the team. The three players said Mr. Allen had never used racist slurs, and two of them, as well as the trainer, said Mr. Shelton had been nicknamed Wizard — and not by Mr. Allen — because of his magicianlike football skills.

DOJ_NMG_0069461

"It appears to me that Kenny Shelton has some deep-rooted problems with his self-identity and a rather hyperactive imagination," one former teammate, George Korte, said in his statement.

Until a few weeks ago, Mr. Allen appeared to have a solid advantage in his re-election campaign, in which he faces Jim Webb, secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, who is running as a Democrat.

But insinuations of racial insensitivity have hovered in the background of the Allen campaign ever since The New Republic reported last spring that he had worn a Confederate flag pin in his yearbook picture. After that report, two odd episodes in the space of a few weeks this summer prompted new questions and cut into his lead.

The first occurred at a campaign appearance where Mr. Allen called a young Democratic operative of Indian descent "macaca" and welcomed him "to America." Liberals called the term a racist slur derived from the name of a type of monkey. Mr. Allen apologized for any offense and said he had simply made up the word.

A few weeks later Mr. Allen, who is Presbyterian, grew angry at a reporter's question about whether his mother had been born Jewish. Mr. Allen later said that after the question came up, his mother told him for the first time that her family was indeed Jewish. His subsequent statements about the matter — attesting that he still ate ham sandwiches, for example — appeared awkward, even to fellow Republicans.

"His mishandling of a name-calling incident, and his ham-handed denial and subsequent revelation that his mother was raised Jewish, have almost eliminated him from the field of serious presidential candidates and even jeopardized his Senate seat," Matthew Continetti of the conservative Weekly Standard wrote in the magazine's current cover story, "George Allen Monkeys Around."

Previous accusations about Mr. Allen's racial views have centered mostly on symbolism, especially involving the Confederacy.

In addition to the pin in his high school yearbook picture, for example, he later displayed a Confederate flag on his living room wall. As governor of Virginia, he declared a Confederate History Month without reference to slavery. He made a cameo appearance as a Confederate officer in the film "Gods and Generals." And he once opposed the creation of a Virginia state holiday to memorialize the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

Mr. Shelton, who described himself as a political independent, said that reports of the "macaca" comment had reminded him of his college experiences with Mr. Allen and that he had decided he should have come forward long ago.

Mr. Taylor, the Alabama professor, said he was a politically active Democrat. He initially wrote of his recollections in a private e-mail message to a colleague after the "macaca" incident. The message was eventually forwarded to The New York Times, and Mr. Taylor subsequently agreed to discuss his recollections of Mr. Allen with a reporter.

Mr. Taylor said that he had been "kind of taken aback" by Mr. Allen's language because it occurred at their first meeting and that Mr. Allen had known he was talking to a graduate student in anthropology. "Most of us are antiracist," Mr. Taylor said.

Still, he said, he did not give Mr. Allen "a moral lesson." He said he had been visiting Mr. Allen to pick up an Australian shepherd puppy and had simply left with the dog.

Allen Denies Using Racial Slur In School (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 26, 2006

Sen. George Allen on Monday denounced as "ludicrously false" allegations from a former college football teammate that he frequently used a racial slur to refer to blacks in the early 1970s and that he once stuffed a severed deer head into a black household's mailbox.

Allen's campaign also released statements from four other ex-teammates defending the senator and rejecting Dr. Ken Shelton's claims. Shelton leveled the allegations against the former University of Virginia quarterback in an article published Sunday in the online magazine Salon.com and during an Associated Press interview Sunday night.

"The story and his comments and assertions in there are completely false," Allen said during an interview with AP reporters and editors. "I don't remember ever using that word and it is absolutely false that that was ever part of my vocabulary."

Larry J. Sabato, one of Virginia's most-quoted political science professors and a classmate of Allen's in the early 1970s, said in a televised interview Monday that Allen used the epithet.

"I'm simply going to stay with what I know is the case and the fact is he did use the n-word, whether he's denying it or not," Sabato, now director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics, told Chris Matthews on MSNBC. Sabato would not say whether he had heard Allen say the word, and did not know whether it was true that Allen used the word frequently in college.

Allen, a Republican, has been mentioned as a possible presidential candidate in 2008, but questions about racial insensitivity have dogged him during his re-election bid against Democrat Jim Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0069462

Allen's use of the word "macaca" in referring to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent in August prompted an outcry. The word denotes a genus of monkeys and, in some cultures, is considered an ethnic slur. But the senator insisted he did not know that and had simply made the word up.

Shelton, a Hendersonville, N.C., radiologist who was a tight end and wide receiver for the university in the early 1970s, said Allen used the n-word only around white teammates.

Shelton said the incident with the deer head occurred during their college days when he, Allen and another teammate who has since died were hunting on a farm the third man's family owned near Bumpass, Va., 40 miles east of the university.

Shelton said Allen asked the other teammate where black families lived in the area, then stuffed a deer's head into the mailbox of one of the homes.

"George insisted on taking the severed head, and I was a little shocked by that," Shelton said.

"This was just after the movie `The Godfather' came out with the severed horse's head in the bed," Shelton told the AP.

He said he came forward because of Allen's presidential prospects and the "macaca" incident.

"When I saw the look in his eye in that camera and using the word `macaca,' it just brought back the bullying way I knew from George back then," Shelton said.

Shelton described himself as an independent who has supported Democratic and Republican candidates. He said he regretted that he had not spoken against Allen in the early 1980s, when he was first entering politics. Shelton said he began writing down his recollections as Allen's career "ascended to heights I never could have imagined."

Other former teammates rushed to the senator's defense.

Charlie Hale of Abingdon, a college roommate of Shelton's and an Allen campaign volunteer, said that he had hunted often with Allen, and "there was not even a rumor on the team" about the alleged deer incident.

Doug Jones, another Allen campaign volunteer who said he had roomed with Shelton, also dismissed the allegations. "I never heard George Allen use any racially disparaging word, nor did I ever witness or hear about him acting in a racially insensitive manner," Jones said.

Another former teammate, Gerard R. Mullins of Roanoke, said he recalled nothing racist about Allen.

"George had a strong personality, and I guess that's why he was a quarterback," Mullins, who is not close with Allen, said in a telephone interview.

Sometimes, he said, Allen was confrontational with teammates.

"He would kind of pick on everyone a little just to get a reaction," said Mullins, a defensive back responsible "From a football standpoint, if you were black or white it didn't matter: if you dropped a pass, he'd have something to say to you."

Shelton's claims came a week after a debate in which Allen bristled at questions about his Jewish ancestry. Allen later acknowledged publicly for the first time that his grandfather, a prisoner in a Nazi concentration camp, was Jewish, and on Monday he said both his maternal grandparents were Jews.

Explaining his initial reaction, Allen has said his mother swore him to secrecy when she told him about his ancestry last month.

Allen's father, the late George H. Allen, was a legendary football coach with the Los Angeles Rams and the Washington Redskins. Allen transferred from the University of California, Los Angeles, to Virginia when his father took the Redskins job.

McCain Boosts Allen At Rally (RTD)

Richmond Times-Dispatch, September 26, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen yesterday forcefully denied allegations that he used the n-word to describe black people while a football player at the University of Virginia more than 30 years ago.

The Republican denounced as "completely false" a report published Sunday in the online magazine Salon.com, which quotes three U.Va. teammates as saying Allen frequently used the inflammatory racial slur.

"This story and these allegations are false," Allen told reporters after a news conference yesterday morning with mostly black pastors in support of the proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage in Virginia.

"I don't ever remember ever using that word. That word was not a part of my vocabulary as was asserted in this article. It wasn't then, it hasn't been since then and it is not now. It is not who I was, and it is not who I am. It is contrary to every fiber of my being."

Two of the former players spoke to Salon.com on the condition of anonymity, fearing retribution from the Allen campaign. The other teammate, Dr. Ken Shelton, a radiologist in Hendersonville, N.C., spoke publicly and stood by his comments in an interview yesterday with The Times-Dispatch.

"He did use the n-word," Shelton said in a phone interview. "He used it often. And it was, I'm sure, intended in a very derogatory manner. George's racial views were fairly obvious by some of his actions, too."

DOJ_NMG_0069463

Shelton played tight end for the Cavaliers when Allen was quarterback in the early 1970s.

In separate interviews, both men described the other as teammates. Allen said he last spoke to Shelton 32 years ago.

Shelton, 53 and a registered inde- pendent, cited a hunting trip where he said Allen stuffed the severed head of a deer in a mailbox in a neighborhood where blacks lived. Allen called that "absolutely false."

He also contended that Allen gave him the nickname "Wizard" because Shelton shared the same surname as Robert Shelton, the imperial wizard of the United Klans of America in the 1960s. Allen said he didn't know how Shelton obtained the moniker: "I assume he got that name because he did make some acrobatic catches. He had good hands."

The Allen campaign yesterday released statements from four other U.Va. teammates and the long-time trainer supporting the senator and rejecting Shelton's assertions.

Doug Jones, who roomed with Shelton and played on the team with Allen during the 1972 and 1973 seasons, said, "During that time I never heard George Allen use any racially disparaging word, nor did I ever witness or hear about him acting in a racially insensitive manner."

Allegations of racial insensitivity have plagued Allen's career. As a state legislator, he voted against a holiday to honor the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the civil-rights leader. As governor, he issued a proclamation recognizing Confederate History and Heritage Month, which generated controversy because it did not mention blacks or the sacrifices of those who fought against slavery and for the union of the country.

As senator, Allen has reached out to minorities. He sponsored legislation to help historically black colleges upgrade technology and a Senate apology for its failure to ban lynching in the early 20th century.

Allen, a former governor and first-term senator, is fighting the political battle of his life against Democrat Jim Webb, a decorated Marine and author. Webb has also had problems during the campaign. Allen has attacked the Democrat for writing a 1979 article in Washingtonian magazine that was critical about women in the military.

Recently, the Allen campaign has made some high-profile stumbles. In August, Allen addressed as "macaca" a Virginia-born Webb volunteer of Indian-American descent; macaca is a genus of monkey which is also considered a racial slur in some parts of the world. Last week, Allen acknowledged, after first refusing to answer, that he has Jewish ancestry.

The Webb campaign had no comment on the Salon.com article.

National publications are speculating about the effects on Allen's 2008 presidential aspirations. A cover story about Allen in the latest edition of The Weekly Standard is titled, "George Allen Monkeys Around. Forget the presidential campaign. Can he still win his Senate race?"

Larry J. Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia, said that in politics, one event can help generate another.

"And the boulder just keeps rolling down hill and gaining momentum," Sabato said. "Fundamentally, one of the basic problems for Allen is that he refused to make a choice between running for the Senate again and running for president. These are two contradictory campaigns, and they have encouraged some of the revelations."

Last night, in a nationally televised interview, Sabato said that Allen had used the epithet. "I'm simply going . . . to stay with what I know is the case and the fact is that he did use the n-word, whether he's denying it now or not," Sabato told Chris Matthews on MSNBC's "Hardball" program. Sabato would not say whether he personally heard Allen use the word.

Christopher J. LaCivita, an Allen strategist, told The Associated Press that Allen and Sabato, who were at U.Va. together, were not friends, nor did they associate with each other in college. "Larry is obviously relying on words he heard from someone else. We believe it's completely inaccurate."

Allen Denies Using Epithet To Describe Blacks (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 25 -- Virginia Sen. George Allen on Monday denied allegations by a college football teammate and another former acquaintance that the senator used a racial epithet to refer to blacks during and after his time at the University of Virginia in the early 1970s.

The accusations by R. Kendall Shelton, 53, a radiologist in North Carolina, and Christopher C. Taylor, 59, an anthropologist at the University of Alabama, reignited questions about Allen and race as he campaigns for reelection against Democrat James Webb.

Shelton said Allen frequently used the "N-word" to describe blacks and nicknamed him "Wizard" because of the similarity of his name to that of Robert Shelton, a former imperial wizard of the Alabama Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. He also recounted an event from 1973 or 1974 in which he, Allen and a third friend were hunting deer. After the deer was killed, Shelton said, Allen cut off the doe's head, asked for directions to the home of the nearest black person and shoved the head into that person's mailbox.

DOJ_NMG_0069464

Taylor said that during a visit to Allen's Charlottesville house in 1982, Allen pointed to turtles in a pond on his property and said only "the [epithets] eat them."

Allen adviser Chris LaCivita said that Taylor is lying and that "this guy is not credible, period." LaCivita said Taylor is a liberal activist.

In comments Monday to reporters, Allen called Shelton's recollections about the deer incident "absolutely false," "pure fabrication" and "nonsense." He said he called Shelton "Wizard" because of his acrobatic catches on the football field. Allen said he does not recall ever having used the "N-word" or any other racial epithets at the University of Virginia.

"That word was not a part of my vocabulary," the senator said. "It wasn't then. It hasn't been since then. And it is not now. It is not who I was, and it is not who I am. It is contrary to every fiber of my being. This story is an attack piece. It is deplorable, and it is false." Allen was referring to a story posted Sunday night on Salon.com, which first reported Shelton's allegations. Salon.com is an Internet magazine of news and opinion.

Allen's campaign released statements Monday from four former teammates and coaches who defended Allen, saying they never heard him use racial epithets or saw him act insensitively toward blacks. Allen is running for a second term against Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan.

"I have never known or heard him use racial epithets to describe blacks either in public or in private," George Korte, a linebacker on the U-Va. team from 1970 to 1973, said in the statement. "It appears to me that Kenny Shelton has some deep rooted problems with his self-identity and a rather hyperactive imagination."

Several former teammates interviewed by The Washington Post agreed.

"I have never heard him use that word," said Rob Berce, a wide receiver who graduated in 1976. "He just seemed to be a pretty upfront, good guy."

Jim Grobe, the head football coach at Wake Forest University, said he is "shocked" by Shelton's allegations. "I never heard George say anything like that," Grobe said.

The allegations are the latest to shake the Allen campaign after weeks of negative publicity about his describing a Webb volunteer of Indian descent as "macaca," which is a genus of monkey and a racial slur in some cultures. He has also spent the past week dealing with revelations that his mother was raised Jewish, which he says he did not know until just weeks ago.

Stuart Rothenberg, an independent analyst who edits the Rothenberg Political Report, said the senator is caught in a media frenzy that threatens his campaign and his consideration of a possible run for president in 2008.

"Every day, the campaign is about who George Allen is or what he said," Rothenberg said Monday. "It keeps him totally off message. He's constantly responding to charges and criticisms and his own stumbles."

In interviews with The Post on Sunday night and Monday, Shelton said Allen frequently used the "N-word."

"I have no doubt George was a racist in the early 1970s," said Shelton, who described himself as a former Democrat who is registered as an independent. "I couldn't care less if George was a Democrat or a Republican. He shouldn't be in public office."

Shelton is listed as "unaffiliated" in voter registration records but voted in the state's Republican primaries this year. He was registered as a Democrat from 1988 through 2004, according to the Henderson County, N.C., elections office.

The former tight end and wide receiver said his recollections were jarred by the controversy over Allen's use of "macaca." Shelton said he has felt guilty for years that he didn't stop Allen during the deer incident.

Taylor said he was invited to Allen's house by the senator's first wife, Anne, after they participated in a photo shoot celebrating the expansion of a Charlottesville shopping center. He said she had offered to give him one of the Allens' Australian shepherd puppies.

"I asked him about waterfowl landing at the lake," Taylor recalled. "He said if they hatched out into ducklings, they would all get attacked by the big turtles. I said, 'Why don't you kill and eat these turtles?' He said: 'We don't eat them. The [epithets] eat them.' "

Anne Waddell confirmed that Taylor came to their house to pick a puppy but said: "I can say with absolute certainty that his recollection that George said anything at all that could be considered racially insensitive is completely false. He would never utter such a word."

She said she was "the one who fished for the turtles in our pond because they were eating the young goslings. The person who ate the turtles was our neighbor."

Taylor first offered his account in an e-mail this summer after seeing the tape that caught the "macaca" incident. He repeated the account Monday.

Two other former U-Va. athletes also said they recalled Allen using racial epithets frequently in college. They spoke on condition of anonymity, saying they feared the effect of coming forward on their livelihoods and families.

DOJ_NMG_0069465

Allen struggled for years with questions about his past, including reports that he displayed a Confederate flag and had a noose in his law office. In the past several years, he has sponsored legislation to apologize for slavery and has been endorsed by a leading Democratic black state senator for his efforts to help historically black colleges and universities.

Several black ministers came to his defense Monday after appearing with Allen on behalf of a proposed state constitutional amendment banning gay marriage.

"We're standing for his character and for his integrity," said the Rev. Martin Brown. "We should be focusing on the issues instead of focusing on character assassination."

Staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

George Allen's Day Of Atonement (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 26, 2006

It looks as though Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) might be embracing his Jewish roots after all.

The Senator long ago had scheduled a field hearing of the Senate Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee for Monday, Oct. 2, which is Yom Kippur. Last week, Allen moved the date to Oct. 3 to avoid conflict with the high holiday, according to the interest group involved in the hearing.

"He's Jewish and Monday is Yom Kippur," explained Brynn Slate, spokeswoman for the National Association of Women Business Owners, completely matter-of-factly to HOH.

Allen spokesman David Snepp said the date of the hearing, which will explore women-owned businesses vying for federal contracts, was changed at the request of the association. And technically, that's true.

After reading about the blockbuster revelation that Allen is (technically) Jewish, the deputy executive director of the women's business association, Michele Jerome, contacted Allen's staff to see if the Senator would prefer delaying the hearing until after the holiest day of the year for Jews.

"The date was set and then Michele contacted one of his staff because she had read that he had sort of — I don't know what you would call it — he had just announced that he's newly Jewish," Slate told us. "So Michele contacted them to ask if they would want to change it because of the holiday."

Slate said the Allen staffer "got back to" the executive director of the association and "said yes, he'd like to move it to the 3rd."

We ran this explanation past Snepp, Allen's spokesman. He replied, "If the group wanted to change the date of this field hearing in honor of the Jewish holiday, that is certainly appropriate, and Sen. Allen is looking forward to the testimony the following day on how to get more women-owned businesses fairly represented in federal contracts."

Hey, now Allen even has a Jewish nickname. Overheard at a party the other night: "Sen. Macacawitz."

Livin' La Hearing Loca. Sadly, Ricky Martin says he will not go karaoke on us when he testifies this morning before the House International Relations Committee. We were hoping for a live impromptu performance of "She Bangs" or "Livin' La Vida Loca" or something — anything.

"I'm not going to stand up and start dancing," Martin told HOH. "That's not the idea. This is a very, very serious subject that needs to be discussed in front of the media."

Indeed, Martin is testifying about an issue dear to him: human trafficking. Having created the Ricky Martin Foundation to combat human trafficking, the Grammy Award-winning performer is on a quest to create a universal law to make 18 the legal age of adulthood in order to protect children worldwide from sex-slave traffickers.

Asked whether he thought his singing partner President Bush, with whom he danced on stage at W's 2000 inauguration, has done enough on the issue, Martin said, "There's always room for improvement." Though he added politely, "I believe he's done his part."

What about Bush's overall job performance? "I'm here to talk about trafficking," Martin said sheepishly.

"I'm so not political — I hope you understand this," Martin told us. "I want to simplify my life as much as possible. Right now, it's not even about music, it's about my foundation. This is about the children."

Political Confidence. As the clock ticks closer to Election Day, House Democrats are getting cockier by the minute. Plotting — expecting even — to regain the majority, Democrats apparently want to put the "science" back in the House Science Committee.

Just check out the new ad that begins running this week in the official House jobs listing service:

"HOUSE SCIENCE COMMITTEE — Seeking experienced science policy professionals for possible expanded Democratic committee staff in the 110th Congress. Desire to build a nonpartisan staff of experienced and highly motivated professionals.

DOJ_NMG_0069466

Good communication skills and ability to work effectively with a team of credentialed and experienced existing committee staff more important than past Party affiliation."

Now that's what we call putting the House before the carriage!

Mmmm ... Scotch. HOH is heading to the British ambassador's residence this evening to sip rare scotch with Prince Andrew, or, as we prefer to call him, His Royal Highness The Duke of York.

The Distilled Spirits Council and the Scotch Whisky Association is hosting the reception at Ambassador David Manning's residence in honor of Prince Andrew. (We wonder whether he's bringing supermodel Angie Everhart, whom he reportedly was dating over the summer.) Several Members of the Congressional Scottish Caucus are expected to be there.

On Wednesday afternoon, the Duke of York is scheduled to cut the ceremonial ribbon at the dedication of George Washington's Distillery at historic Mount Vernon.

Please send your hot tips, juicy gossip or comments to hoh@rollcall.com.

Green Party Candidate For Senate Off Pa. Ballot (WP/AP)

By Martha Raffaele

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

HARRISBURG, Pa., Sept. 25 -- A judge said Monday that he will remove the Green Party candidate for U.S. Senate from the November ballot because the party did not have enough valid signatures in its nominating petitions.

Carl Romanelli's candidacy for the Pennsylvania seat had been challenged by state Democrats. Romanelli's bid was backed by Sen. Rick Santorum (R), who hoped that Romanelli could siphon votes from his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Robert P. Casey Jr.

Santorum has consistently trailed Casey in polls.

Commonwealth Court Judge James R. Kelley ruled that Romanelli, a railroad industry consultant from Wilkes-Barre, was 8,931 signatures shy of the 67,070 he needed to qualify as a minor-party candidate.

State law requires minor-party and independent candidates to collect a number of signatures equal to 2 percent of the ballots cast for the largest vote-getter in the last statewide election. This year's requirement was unusually high because it was based on Casey's record vote count in winning the treasurer's office in 2004.

Clifford Levine, an attorney for the Democrats, said the ruling "allows there to be a head-to-head matchup between Bob Casey and Rick Santorum, which is what obviously, in our view, Senator Santorum was trying to avoid."

Santorum campaign spokeswoman Virginia Davis said the lawsuit was an attempt by Casey's campaign to silence a candidate who was willing to debate the issues.

"Rather than focus on the issues, Casey and his crew spent weeks stifling democracy and disenfranchising the tens of thousands of voters who signed Green Party petitions," Davis said.

Romanelli did not attend Monday's hearing. In a statement issued afterward, he said his fate would ultimately depend on an appeal he has made to the state Supreme Court to try to lower the number of signatures required. "The Democrats have a long way to go to get me off the ballot," Romanelli said.

Casey's campaign and the state Democratic Party have accused Santorum of engineering Romanelli's candidacy.

Lieberman Calls For Having More U.S. Troops Training Iraqi Forces (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

EAST HAMPTON, Conn., Sept. 25 — In his first major speech on Iraq since his loss in the primary election, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman called on Monday for the number of United States troops embedded with Iraqi forces to be doubled or tripled, to speed up the training of the Iraqis and help hasten the withdrawal of the Americans.

In a 40-minute speech at a Veterans of Foreign Wars post here, Mr. Lieberman, who has been under attack for his support of the war, said that those troops could be added through redeployments, rather than by committing additional troops in the region.

At the same time, he called for increasing the overall size of the United States Army and Marine Corps, to better prepare for looming conflicts.

"We've got to do that to make sure we are building the numbers and types of units we need to fight and win the kinds of conflicts that we are likely to fight — unconventional conflicts — during this century,'' Mr. Lieberman said.

"This is not going fix the shortages we have now in Iraq, or reduce the strain on our forces," he said. "It will begin over time to give us the greater capabilities we will need."

Mr. Lieberman, a Democrat in his third term in the Senate, is running for re-election as an independent.

DOJ_NMG_0069467

He said that he did not back an open-ended commitment — as the victor in the Democratic primary on Aug. 8, Ned Lamont, has accused him of doing — but that he also opposed setting a timeline for withdrawal.

And he attacked Mr. Lamont, portraying his rival's position on the withdrawal of American troops as "giving up on Iraq."

The Republican candidate, Alan Schlesinger, is far behind in the polls.

Mr. Lieberman's speech came on the heels of the latest National Intelligence Estimate, which concluded that as result of the war in Iraq, the overall terrorist threat to the United States has grown rather than diminished since the Sept. 11 attacks.

Like other Democrats around the country, Mr. Lamont seized on the report, saying it showed that the policies of the Bush administration had failed, and he said that Mr. Lieberman had continued to support them. "Trying to make a military statement there is just making the situation worse," Mr. Lamont said on Monday during a campaign stop in New Haven, adding that Mr. Lieberman was still calling for "more of the same."

But Mr. Lieberman used the news of the intelligence report, which he said he had not read, to argue that a deadline for withdrawal would make the threat of terror "exponentially worse" and give a battle plan to factional militias, insurgents, terrorists, Syria and Iran.

Using his harshest language to date to attack Mr. Lamont, Mr. Lieberman called his opponent's stance "a slippery, deadly slope every step of the way."

"The Lamont plan for immediate withdrawal and an arbitrary deadline is doomed to fail and weaken our security," Mr. Lieberman added. "It will leave our troops more vulnerable to attack while they remain, and will leave Iraq to become a failed state and a terrorist breeding ground when we're gone."

Mr. Lamont has said he would support beginning the immediate withdrawal of "frontline" troops and setting a timeline for the withdrawal of all combat troops.

He has also said that he would have supported a Senate resolution in June that set a deadline of July 1, 2007, for troop withdrawal — a measure supported by 13 Democrats as it went down to defeat.

Mr. Lieberman seized on that on Monday, saying that Mr. Lamont had "fudged" his position by using the terms timeline and deadline interchangeably.

Asked about the senator's comments, Mr. Lamont said that Mr. Lieberman was mischaracterizing his position because he would have supported both the amendment calling for a deadline and another unsuccessful resolution that called for a timeline without setting any dates. Mr. Lieberman was one of a handful of Democrats to oppose both resolutions.

But Mr. Lamont also said that he would still support a similar resolution establishing a deadline if it were to come up in the Senate again. He said that the main issue was not the number of months, but the establishment of some framework for withdrawal.

"I don't care whether it's 6 months, 12 months or 18 months, what is important is that you put in place a process," Mr. Lamont said, adding that he would consult with the Iraqi government and generals in the field to determine an exit strategy.

Mr. Lieberman said he believed "success is possible" because the majority of Iraqis "want a better life." He added: "I have total confidence in the ability of the American military to get the job done and win the war in Iraq."

In his speech, Mr. Lieberman also said he would work to create a "bipartisan working group" with members of the House and Senate committees that monitor national security to meet with President Bush.

Mr. Lieberman said again that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld should resign. That, he said, would "reinvigorate" the military and allow a "new dialogue" with allies as well as the public.

Mr. Lieberman has both attacked and defended Mr. Rumsfeld in the past. In 2003, he said that if he were president he would seek Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation. But in 2004, he said Mr. Rumsfeld should not be forced to step down. Last month, he once again said Mr. Rumsfeld should resign.

During his speech on Monday, Mr. Lieberman again expressed his support for the war, saying that he had backed the use of force to remove Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq because he believed Mr. Hussein "was a grave threat to our country, his people, the region and the world."

The Lamont campaign has tried to put Mr. Lieberman on the defensive by talking about his early support of the war, but on Monday, he made it clear that he would not take that bait.

"We don't have the luxury of playing 'what if' games with the past," Mr. Lieberman said, later quoting Winston Churchill: "If the present tries to sit in judgment of the past, it will lose the future."

Highway Backer A Steady Ehrlich Donor (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069468

The $4,000 checks started arriving in Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s reelection campaign treasury Jan. 2 from such obscure corporations as Freestate Owner LLC, Muirkirk, Chase Limited and President Street Associates.

By Jan. 3, there were seven of the checks, each from a company directly linked to developer Kingdon Gould III, a descendant of railroad barons who is one of Maryland's most prolific political donors and a vigorous booster for the intercounty connector.

That same day, Ehrlich's transportation secretary signed off on a final study of the controversial highway, an 18-mile ribbon of asphalt that would extend east from Rockville to the gravel pits where Gould plans a massive commercial and residential development called Konterra.

State officials said they had no idea the checks were coming in as they were sending out the long-expected report. Ehrlich (R) said the contributions, and numerous others from Gould and his companies, were based on friendship and a shared belief that the road connecting Interstates 270 and 95 should be built and that Konterra should flourish.

Gould declined to be interviewed for this report; his brother, Caleb Gould, did not return several messages left at his office.

Billed as a future mini-city the size of Reston, the 2,000-acre development site near Laurel has spent two decades stalled at the intersection of commerce and politics. Success has always banked on economic factors and on key decisions made by local and state politicians.

From Ehrlich, who is now seeking reelection, Gould has sought help pushing a series of transportation projects through the pipeline. Among them, a new I-95 exit that would feed directly into Konterra; a well-placed stop along a proposed Metro Green Line extension; and two ramps off the endlessly debated intercounty connector, itself a critical artery for Konterra.

The transportation proposals, and the connector, long predate Ehrlich's tenure as governor.

But records show that Ehrlich has helped move those proposals forward and that the Goulds have had ready access to the governor and his top aides to advocate for the projects. Supporters as well as critics of Ehrlich said they believe that the Goulds' contributions flow only to those who help.

"The connection between contributions and land use is something some people find sinister, but it's nothing new," said Thomas E. Dernoga (D), chairman of the Prince George's County Council and an opponent of the connector. "I always tell people, the battle to get a politician's attention pits your vote against developers' money."

Former governor Parris N. Glendening (D) said Gould was one of his top donors when he first ran for governor in 1994. "But when I started cooling on the idea of the ICC," he said, "the support I was getting from the whole Konterra crew basically evaporated."

When Ehrlich ran in 2002 pledging to build the connector that Glendening had shelved, Gould's companies gave generously. This year, as Ehrlich seeks reelection against Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), Gould has plainly pinned his hopes on the Republican incumbent. His corporations have donated $750 to O'Malley since 1999, compared with $50,500 directly to Ehrlich.

Further, they've given $21,000 to Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R), $163,100 to the GOP's state and federal accounts, and $65,000 to other state and local politicians.

If those numbers sound jarring -- Maryland campaign finance laws prohibit donors from giving more than $4,000 to any individual and from donating more than $10,000 in one four-year cycle -- there is an explanation. Gould exploits a well-worn loophole by making his donations through his limited liability corporations.

Gould is not alone. Homebuilder J. William Ruppert gave O'Malley $25,000 through various companies at a Jan. 11 fundraiser, according to a Common Cause Maryland analysis. Aris Mardirossian, developer of Crown Farm at the western end of the intercounty connector, gave $20,000 through relatives and businesses to County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) who was running for governor, and $8,000 to Ehrlich, campaign finance records show.

Montgomery County Council member Phil Andrews (D-Gaithersburg-Rockville), a former state Common Cause director, has criticized this practice, saying such donations "make a mockery of the campaign finance laws."

"These contributions unquestionably have a corrupting influence on state government," he said.

Ehrlich disagrees, saying the donations were not intended to exert influence but rather to lend support because of a longtime friendship between the Goulds and first lady Kendel S. Ehrlich.

"Kendel lived with Susan Gould on their property as a bachelorette, and they've been supportive of my campaign all the way along," Ehrlich said last week.

Ehrlich said he has met with the Goulds on "Konterra-related issues" on a couple of occasions, and he wouldn't rule out the possibility that Gould has attempted to press him on various transportation projects over the years.

"Obviously, I mean, does he have credibility? Is he a success? Of course he has credibility," Ehrlich said.

DOJ_NMG_0069469

The governor said he considers the development a terrific project, ideally suited for the expected explosion of jobs from the expansion at nearby Fort Meade. He also supports the intercounty connector, persuading the federal government to "fast track" its approval.

The gravel pits in Laurel that the family bought in 1981 have much to offer a developer. The land sits halfway between Washington and Baltimore. It is not far from a major airport. And it straddles busy I-95 and the CSX rail line used by the state's commuter railway.

Kingdon Gould Jr. first circulated his mini-city proposal in 1982. Early estimates suggested that it could yield at least $500 million in tax revenue for the county, more than $700 million for the state and, ultimately, more than 40,000 jobs.

What has kept the family from building, said former Prince George's county executive Wayne K. Curry (D), is one simple thing: "They don't have the interchanges."

Without major road improvements, said former Montgomery planning chairman Gus B. Bauman, "Konterra can only develop so far."

Under Ehrlich, several projects aimed at resolving those problems have moved ahead. A study published Oct. 14, 2004, for instance, details plans to build a $100 million interchange off I-95 and makes clear the purpose:

"Sufficient access to the Interstate system will be critical for the Konterra property to develop into its full potential," the State Highway Administration report states.

Ehrlich also included $1 million in the budget this year to study extending Metro's Green Line through Konterra. One option would divert the rail line from the CSX tracks into the project's town center.

State Sen. John A. Giannetti Jr. (D-Prince George's), whose legislative district includes Konterra, said he began aggressively pushing the Metro extension after meeting with Caleb Gould.

"He told me someone approached him and asked if he would be interested in a station there," recalled Giannetti, who has received $3,000 in contributions from the family. "I thought, 'Wow, we had never thought about that.' "

Giannetti took the idea to Metro officials and argued for it in the Senate Budget Committee. Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan said it is an idea that has been discussed but that at this early stage virtually every idea will be considered.

Prince George's planners are also discussing the idea but have questioned diverting the rail line through the town center. "Getting off the straight line probably doesn't make a lot of sense," Dernoga said. But the Konterra team is pursuing it aggressively. "They have essentially tried to take the bull by the horns."

No project, though, has been more central to the Goulds' plans than the connector, which was slated to intersect the property before the family owned the land. On master plans going back decades, the road includes off-ramps into the property, and in more recent years, Konterra has been clearly identified as the destination.

One ramp is "needed to provide access to a proposed upscale mall," planning documents say. Another is for access to the "proposed Konterra Town Center area."

As much as the Goulds have sought the highway, though, they are not donating land for the road or its interchanges, as some developers do. State Highway Administrator Neil J. Pedersen said the properties involved are being appraised and that it would be improper for him to estimate the cost to the state.

Pedersen, who signed the final environmental statement, said he knew nothing about the campaign contributions but said the Jan. 3 approval was certainly a momentous occasion.

"This was an indication that they were prepared to approve the intercounty connector," he said. "That's probably how [the Goulds] viewed it, too."

Research database editor Derek Willis, researcher Meg Smith and staff writer Miranda S. Spivack contributed to this report.

In Ohio, A Battle Of Databases (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

CINCINNATI, Sept. 25 -- There is no sexier topic in politics these days than "microtargeting." That's the new science (some say dark art) by which candidates use the latest data-mining technology to vacuum every last scrap of information about voters, then churn out custom-tailored messages designed to herd their supporters to the polls.

Here in Rep. Steve Chabot's campaign headquarters, microtargeting does not seem quite as glamorous as advertised. There are 10 phones arranged neatly on a long wooden table. Nearby sit two stacks of paper, each filled with names, each name assigned a bar code.

Every evening, volunteers file into this room to place waves of phone calls aimed at identifying the people who are most likely to reward this six-term Republican with a seventh. At the end of the evening, the results -- a trove of the likes and dislikes of 1st District voters -- are scanned into a database. It is painstaking work.

DOJ_NMG_0069470

But Chabot and his Democratic challenger, Cincinnati City Council member John Cranley, have placed large bets that it will prove effective. Both candidates have spent months combing through voter lists to find "drop-off" voters -- those who turn out in presidential election years but rarely in midterm contests. In a district as evenly divided as this one -- President Bush won it by just 3,000 votes in 2004 -- the party best equipped to find and persuade these individuals to turn out on Nov. 7 will probably end up on top.

"Elections are not rocket science," said Brad Greenberg, executive director of the Hamilton County Republican Party. "They are about identifying voters who are Republicans and getting them out to the polls."

In the past several elections, especially in Ohio, Republicans have won the ground game, building a vast and constantly growing network of potential voters identified less by their formal party affiliation than their church membership or magazine subscriptions.

The more information a campaign has on who lives at a particular address, the more tailored the pitch that will follow. A suburban mom? Make sure she receives material highlighting the candidate's strong stands on homeland security. An out-of-work pipefitter? Let him know that the candidate supports penalties on businesses that hire undocumented workers.

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee and one of the principal architects of the GOP turnout apparatus nationwide, said a top-notch voter identification and turnout effort matters more in a congressional race than a presidential one because there is "much less of a public dialogue" about individual House contests. They get less news coverage and are less likely to be talked about in offices and bars. That means targeted information delivered by the campaigns is potentially decisive.

While Chabot's army of phone volunteers searches for new votes each night, Cranley and his team mine voter lists at his headquarters, the former home of People's Community Bank. (It may be the only campaign headquarters in the country with its own vault.) Cranley says his goal is to reach out three times to every 1st District resident who backed Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004 but failed to vote in 2002 -- roughly 25,000 people. Thanks to heavy commitments by organized labor and national Democrats, Cranley believes he can corral many of these fall-off voters.

But he acknowledges that Democrats were "late to the game" on turnout in 2004. Visits to the two headquarters and conversations with campaign staff members suggest that Chabot's voter identification and turnout operation is more advanced.

One factor in Cranley's favor is that Democratic voters, not Republicans, are seemingly most energized this fall. When he first ran against Chabot in 2000, Cranley said, people regularly told him that they "hated" President Bill Clinton and could not stomach voting for any Democrat. "You could feel there was this motivation of anger," he said. Six years later, the anger is on the other foot. Cranley says voters approach him constantly, vowing to vote against every Republican on the ballot because they are "so angry at these guys."

Anecdotes aside, national polling bears out this trend. While Bush's job-approval numbers have rebounded slightly of late, there remains a wide disparity between the relatively small number of those who strongly approve of his performance and the number of those who say they strongly disapprove. In Ohio, this national trend merges with voter disgust over ethics scandals surrounding outgoing Gov. Bob Taft (R).

Chabot knows that angry people vote. That helps explain his unrelenting focus on illegal immigration, an ire-inducing issue for conservatives, in this year's campaign. Chabot has run three television advertisements attacking Cranley as a backer of amnesty for illegal immigrants -- and, by insinuation, weak on terrorism. "This is an issue that is very concerning for people in our area," said Chabot spokeswoman Jessica Towhey. "It is not just illegal immigrants but terrorists who are able to exploit our borders."

Cranley has responded with an ad of his own that asks why the incumbent has done nothing about the problem of illegal immigration during his 12 years in Congress. He dismisses Chabot's attacks as feeble attempts to frighten voters. "They are trying to scare up votes on it," Cranley said.

In a district that takes only 25 minutes to drive from end to end, undecided voters will have plenty of chances to sound out the candidates' views on immigration and other issues between now and Election Day. If polling is any indicator, even a few hundred votes could tip the seat one way or another.

While Democrats are confident, they are haunted by memories of 2004. That fall, Democrats were certain they had met all their turnout goals to ensure victory in Ohio for Kerry. On election night, it turned out Bush's campaign had done an even better job of meeting their own goals.

Cranley said his supporters have learned the lesson. "This will be the most targeted field campaign in the country," he boasted.

Panel Recommends Basic Insurance Plan (NYT)

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0069471

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25 — A federal advisory panel said Monday that Congress should take immediate steps to guarantee that all Americans have access to affordable health care by 2012.

As a first step, the 14-member panel, appointed by the comptroller general of the United States, said, "A national public or private program must be established to ensure protection against very high out-of-pocket medical costs for everyone."

The panel, the Citizens' Health Care Working Group, said Congress should create an independent "public-private entity" to define a basic set of health care benefits and services for all Americans.

While leaving many details to be worked out, the panel declared, "It should be public policy, written in law, that all Americans have affordable access to health care."

The panel was created by the 2003 law that added a drug benefit to Medicare. Under the law, President Bush has 45 days to comment on the recommendations and offer his views in a report to Congress. The citizens' group went to great lengths to solicit opinions from average Americans, in addition to health experts. It tried to forge a consensus after listening to views expressed by more than 7,000 people at 98 community meetings in 37 states.

Obamas Enjoy Good Year (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Barack Obama's first year in the Senate turned out to be prosperous not only for the newly elected senator but also his wife, according to information Obama released Monday from their joint 2005 tax return.

Shortly after Obama took office, his wife, Michelle, received a promotion from her employer, the not-for-profit University of Chicago Hospitals, nearly tripling her earnings to $316,962 from $121,910 the previous year.

The senator also reached a three-book deal worth $1.9 million with Random House shortly after his 2004 election, with the senator receiving $1.2 million in payments last year.

In all, including Obama's $154,047 Senate salary, the family earned $1.67 million last year, more than the family's combined income for the prior seven years, according to information provided by the senator's office.

Obama released information from the tax return in response to a request from The Associated Press, which first reported the financial details. A spokesman for Obama later confirmed the tax information.

Senate ethics rules require only that members disclose financial information in broad ranges and do not require disclosure of a spouse's salary. But some members of the Senate, including Obama's home-state counterpart, Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), voluntarily release their annual tax returns, which provide a more complete picture of an office-holder's finances.

Obama press secretary Tommy Vietor attributed the jump in Michelle Obama's earnings in part to additional time she could devote to her work at University of Chicago Hospitals once Obama's Senate campaign was complete.

"After the campaign ended, Michelle was able to accept a more time-consuming and senior position," Vietor said. "She has degrees from Princeton University and Harvard Law, and would be a major asset to any organization."

In March 2005, she was promoted to be the hospitals' vice president for community and external affairs, becoming one of 17 vice presidents for the hospital. She had previously been executive director for community affairs. She does not do any lobbying work for the hospital in her position, Vietor said.

In June 2005, she joined the board of directors of Westchester, Ill.-based TreeHouse Foods, a food processor with various product lines, including pickles, refrigerated salad dressing and non-dairy creamer. For her work as a director, she received $12,000 from TreeHouse and $33,000 from a subsidiary, Bay Valley Foods.

The Obama family paid $545,614 in federal income taxes for 2005, according to the senator's office.

They reported $13,385 in interest income and $2,754 in dividends. The previous year they reported no income in either category.

Their tax forms reported $77,315 in charitable contributions, about 4.6 percent of their total income.

Their largest donations were $25,000 to the Illinois Reading Council; $20,000 for the Michelle Lee Fund, a literacy program; $16,000 for CARE, including funds targeted toward an AIDS project in Kenya, the home country of Obama's father, which the senator recently visited in part to highlight efforts to counter the spread of AIDS; and $5,000 to the Trinity United Church of Christ.

The Obamas also reported payments to care providers for their children, including payment of employer contributions to Social Security on their behalf.

mdorning@tribune.com

Political Wife Edwards Shares Private Pain (USAT)

By Susan Page

DOJ_NMG_0069472

USA Today, September 26, 2006

During the 2004 presidential campaign, Elizabeth Edwards was in many ways the most likable figure among all the contenders for national office and their spouses: unpretentious and direct. Sharp. Funny. Real.

News that the wife of Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards had discovered a lump in her breast during the campaign's final push — and was diagnosed with cancer the day after the election — brought 65,000 e-mails from strangers and the promise of a book about how she coped with a national political campaign and a devastating personal diagnosis.

That is not the book Elizabeth Edwards has written.

Instead, the heart of Saving Graces is the story of surviving the central tragedy of her life: the death of her son, Wade, in 1996. At 16, he was killed on his way to the family's beach house when the wind flipped over his car.

She describes the shocking news, the overwhelming sorrow, the long recovery and her continuing grief with raw honesty and the benefit of a decade of reflection.

Surely no parent could read her account without aching in empathy.

For two years, she went to Wade's grave every day, clearing twigs and reading aloud to him. Through that time, Wade's younger sister, Cate, slept in chairs pulled together alongside her parents' bed rather than retreat alone to her room.

And during those days, a community of longtime friends and complete strangers enveloped Edwards in endless conversations and online chats, trying to understand the inexplicable.

Years later on the campaign trail, people, most of them women, would take her aside and say quietly, “I lost a child, too,” instant sisters in a terrible sorority.

In the end, Edwards' resilience and humor reasserted themselves, especially as she struggled to get pregnant again in her late 40s and early 50s. The two rambunctious additions to the family: Emma Claire and Jack.

In the aftermath of that, her account of undergoing chemotherapy, a lumpectomy and radiation — her prognosis is now good, she says — seems almost perfunctory.

With Wade's death, she writes, “we had all been through the worst life could deal us” already.

Edwards is engagingly transparent about her private life but less candid about her political one — though there are a few tidbits. For one, she indicates that before the 2004 campaign began, John Edwards moved away from Democratic superstrategist Bob Shrum, not the other way around. (With some fanfare, Shrum signed on with John Kerry.)

But Elizabeth Edwards generally curbs her wry eye when it comes to the campaign, including her views of Kerry and his wife, Teresa. John Edwards and his future, including an expected bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, aren't center stage here.

Despite the expectations, this book is not about politics. It's about life and making sense of death.

No Ruling On Clintons Case Yet (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

A Los Angeles superior court judge yesterday said he could not rule on a complaint filed by a Hollywood producer in a lawsuit accusing President Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of reneging on a multimillion-dollar Internet deal until a pending appeal in the case is settled.

State Superior Court Judge Aurelio N. Munoz said he could not rule on the complaint filed by Peter F. Paul until an appeal by Paul challenging a decision granting Mrs. Clinton First Amendment immunity in the case is resolved.

In April, Mrs. Clinton invoked a California law that protects candidates from being silenced by frivolous lawsuits during their election campaigns.

In the complaint, Paul, a convicted felon, said Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, orchestrated a scheme to convince him to spend $1.9 million on campaign fundraisers before her November 2000 election to the Senate and then failed to honor promises on the Internet deal.

The complaint seeks $30 million in stock losses and $1.9 million in cash.

Paul has claimed in the lawsuit the Clintons "looted" his business to generate the largest contribution to Mrs. Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign in New York. He said he was "cajoled and then coerced" by Mr. Clinton as "an erstwhile future business partner" to make expenditures to benefit the president and his wife.

He produced and underwrote an August 2000 fundraiser called the "Gala Hollywood Farewell Salute to President William Jefferson Clinton," attended by numerous Hollywood celebrities.

A trial date in the case is set for March 27.

The Clintons' attorney, David Kendall, did not return calls for comment. He previously has declined to talk with reporters about the case.

DOJ_NMG_0069473

Paul also challenged a statement by Mr. Kendall in an affidavit yesterday, saying the Washington lawyer sought to mislead the court with an erroneous claim in a court filing seeking to quash the pending lawsuit.

He said Mr. Kendall wrongly asserted in the filing that Paul admitted during a March 2005 court hearing that he caused the collapse of his company, Stan Lee Media. In his lawsuit, Paul has said Mr. Clinton's refusal to honor an agreement to act as a "rainmaker" for the company led to its demise.

Paul said that in the affidavit, Mr. Kendall misleadingly combined two separate statements to suggest the producer was admitting fault for Stan Lee's demise. Paul said the affidavit joined together his allocution remarks on his guilty plea to a Securities and Exchange Commission violation with a final statement Paul made to the judge at the end of the hearing, which was not part of the allocution.

A federal court ruled in 2003 that Paul's SEC violations did not cause the stock of Stan Lee Media to collapse, but were intended to help the company survive.

Iran Close To Nuclear Suspension (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

Iran is close to an agreement that would include a suspension of uranium enrichment but wants the deal to include a provision that the temporary halt be kept secret, according to Bush administration officials.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, has been working with Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani on the enrichment-suspension deal that could be completed this week.

Disclosure of talks on the secret element of the arrangement comes as Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani are set to meet today or tomorrow in Europe when the deal could be completed, said officials opposed to the deal, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

According to the officials, the suspension of uranium enrichment by Iran would be for 90 days, so additional talks could be held with several European nations.

Many U.S. officials are opposing the agreement as a further concession to Iran, which continues to defy a United Nations' call for a complete halt to uranium enrichment. A Security Council resolution had given Iran until Aug. 31 to stop its enrichment program or face the imposition of international sanctions. Tehran ignored the deadline, but diplomacy has continued.

Some in the State Department are supporting the deal, which they view as a step toward achieving a complete halt to uranium enrichment.

However, other officials said that keeping any suspension secret would be difficult and that it would drag the United States into further negotiations with Iran.

Iran is seeking to continue talks on its nuclear program while attempting to avoid the imposition of sanctions, something the Bush administration favors but that several other key states, including Russia, oppose.

The United States would then be faced with the difficult position of negotiating against the 90-day deadline, a position that favors Iran.

"The Iranians are very good negotiators," said one official close to the issue.

The officials opposed to the deal want any agreement on uranium suspension to be announced publicly.

Also, any suspension of enrichment would require International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspections to verify that work has stopped at Iranian facilities. The inspections would likely be disclosed, exposing any secret arrangement with Iran on suspension.

Failing to publicly announce the suspension also would be a face-saving measure for the Iranian government.

Officials said President Bush is not happy with the secrecy demand, although he continues to support the use of diplomacy to solve the problem.

Asked about the pending deal, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said in an e-mail, "The terms laid out by the Security Council are clear: Iran needs to suspend its uranium enrichment activities, and it needs to do so in a verifiable way. If it does, we can start negotiations. If it doesn't, we move to sanctions. It is a clear and unambiguous standard."

In New York yesterday, Iran's Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said that talks between European and Iranian officials were on track and that a negotiated settlement is possible.

"I think very soon they will have the next round of discussions," Mr. Mottaki told the Associated Press, noting that "there was good connection between the two sides" after Iran's Aug. 22 response to a package of incentives offered by six nations -- the United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia -- for a halt in enrichment efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0069474

A recent report by the IAEA said that as late as Aug. 24, Iran had continued to feed uranium hexafluoride into its 164-centrifuge cascade, which is used to enrich uranium. The report also said that Iran is building additional facilities, including a second 164-centrifuge cascade and that work on a plutonium-based heavy-water reactor is continuing.

The Bush administration is convinced that Iran's nuclear program is intended to develop weapons, contrary to repeated statements from Iranian leaders that the program is aimed at producing electrical power for civilian use.

The Bush administration wants to impose internationally approved economic sanctions on Iran in the next several weeks, based on the IAEA report and Iran's missing the deadline to halt enrichment.

Iran Minister: Nuclear Talks 'On Track' (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer And Scheherezade Faramarzi, Associated Press Writers

AP, September 26, 2006

Iran's foreign minister said Monday that talks between top Iranian and European negotiators on his country's disputed nuclear program are "on track" and could pave the way for a negotiated solution to the standoff.

But Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told The Associated Press in an interview that Iran still believes there should be no conditions on the resumption of negotiations, implicitly rejecting demands that Tehran first suspend uranium enrichment.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani have held two rounds of preliminary talks to discuss Iranian questions about a package of incentives put forward by six key nations if Tehran agrees to suspend its enrichment program and return to full-scale negotiations.

Mottaki said Solana and Larijani will hold their third meeting "very soon," probably in Europe, though he did not have an exact date or location. They had been expected to meet in New York on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly ministerial meeting that began last week, but Mottaki said it was not possible because Larijani's deputy and members of his delegation were not given U.S. visas.

"But the last two or three days, they have been in contact and they are coordinating," he said.

The six nations — Britain, France, Germany, the United States, China and Russia — are hoping Tehran will agree quickly to suspend uranium enrichment after it missed an Aug. 31 Security Council deadline and return to negotiations. But they are considering U.N. sanctions if it does not.

Mottaki said "there was good connection between the two sides" after Iran responded on Aug. 22 to the incentives package.

"We had good discussion with most of the parties of the package," he said, adding that Larijani and Solana both called their talks "positive, constructive and another step forward."

"We do believe that (the) case has gone once again to track — on track," Mottaki said. "All the parties should support and make a commitment to support the negotiations, and generally I believe there are possibilities to reach a comprehensive solution based on negotiations for both parties."

Oil-rich Iran says it needs uranium enrichment to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that would generate electricity and insists its program is peaceful. Enrichment can also create weapons-grade material, however, and the United States and other nations have accused Tehran of seeking to develop nuclear bombs.

"We do believe that the time for nuclear weapons is over and we do not need nuclear weapons," Mottaki said. "Nuclear weapons is not in the doctrine of Iran's defense policy and nuclear weapons will not help the countries for the problems which they are facing."

Nuclear weapons could not prevent the collapse of the Soviet Union and did not help "prevent 9/11, and (there are) a lot of examples you can raise. That's why Iran is sincere in its policy — not looking for the nuclear weapons," he said.

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said for the first time at a press conference Thursday that Iran is prepared to negotiate the suspension of its enrichment activities "under fair and just conditions." He was speaking at a news conference at the United Nations in New York where he was attending the annual General Assembly.

Asked what those conditions are that the president referred to, Mottaki laughed and said Ahmadinejad believes that "any condition, any questions, any decision should be based on justice."

How does he define justice?

"In its convenient time, we will explain. I'm sorry," the foreign minister replied.

Asked for comment on Mottaki's remarks, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said, "I'm glad to hear that they may be thinking about it. But what we need to see is an actual decision, and then have that decision implemented in a verifiable way."

Mottaki was asked about Iran's response to a possible compromise proposal from French President Jacques Chirac that would simultaneously have Iran suspend enrichment and the Security Council put off the push for sanctions at the start of negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0069475

The Iranian minister did not answer directly, but indicated he did not like the French proposal.

"All the elements for a comprehensive solution are there — either in the (incentives) package or in the (Iranian) response," Mottaki said.

"That's why ... we support starting negotiations and let negotiators considers all the items in the agenda, all the items in the package at the same time, all the items in the response of Iran," he said.

One problem Iran had with the incentive package was that it talked about several new nuclear power plants in Iran, Mottaki said. He complained Iran would "have to pay billions of dollars for those power plants."

Mottaki said he had discussed the need for negotiations with French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy.

"I told him, `Let the negotiations start and they can go to details. There's no ... barrier to raise any questions, to consider any issue. ... That's why we do believe we should not put any conditions for that," the Iranian minister said.

Mottaki stressed there are two important elements for any solution.

"The first element is recognizing ... the right of Iran to have nuclear technology, of course for peaceful purposes," he said. "The second element is the transparent activities of Iran."

Mottaki reiterated Ahmadinejad's invitation at last year's General Assembly to foreign government-run and private companies "to participate even in the ownership of the site of nuclear activities in Iran" to demonstrate that Iran's activities are transparent.

'An Economic Coalition Of The Willing' (WSJ)

By Ilan Berman

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

By now, it has become all too clear that when it comes to the Iranian nuclear crisis, the ball is squarely in Washington's court.

Aug. 31 has come and gone, and with it the international deadline for Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment. Iran's ayatollahs, however, have shown no signs of curbing their atomic ambitions. "The Iranian nation will not accept for one moment any bullying, invasion and violation of its rights," Iran's radical president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has defiantly told his supporters. In response, the Bush administration has signaled its commitment to seeking punitive measures against the Islamic Republic, sanctions chief among them. In practice, however, Washington has not yet seriously tackled the economic dimension of the current crisis -- or explored the financial levers by which Iran can be confronted.

This amounts to a critical oversight, because Iran's economy is deeply susceptible to foreign pressure on at least three fronts. All that is necessary is the proper political will to exploit these weaknesses.

Iran's first vulnerability is its dependence on foreign investment. Today, though a bona fide energy superpower that produces some 3.9 million barrels of oil daily, the Islamic Republic still requires sustained international engagement. Studies say that the regime in Tehran currently needs $1 billion a year to maintain current oil output levels, and $1.5 billion to increase them -- and that without it, Iran could quickly become a net energy importer. To be sure, this sum is just a pittance compared to the dozens of billions of dollars that Iran has reaped over the past several years, thanks to the high price of world oil (as much as $50 billion as of March 2006). But, by complicating the flow of foreign investment into Iran, the U.S. and its allies can force the regime to draw down its hard-currency reserves, reducing the resources that it has available to forge ahead with its nuclear program -- or to fund radicalism in the region.

Iran's second weakness stems from its centralized economic hierarchy. For all of its lip service to fiscal reforms and grass-roots prosperity, the vast majority of the regime's wealth remains concentrated in the hands of a very small number of people. The extended family of former Iranian president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, which practically controls copper mining in Iran, the regime's lucrative pistachio trade, and a number of profitable industrial and export-import businesses, is just one example. Another group of key economic players is the Islamic Republic's sprawling charitable foundations, known as bonyads, which control over 30% of Iran's national GDP (and as much as two-thirds of the country's non-oil GDP). By impeding their access to global markets and curtailing their capacity to engage in commerce, the international community can immediately capture the attention of these key decision-makers.

Far and away the biggest chink in Iran's economic armor, however, is its reliance on foreign gasoline. Today, Iran's antiquated, socialist economy -- where a gallon of gas still sells for roughly 40 cents -- has become a major Achilles' heel. Iran now consumes over 64.5 million liters of gasoline a day, with close to 40% coming from foreign sources (among them India, France, Turkey and the Gulf states). This energy habit is expensive; Iran will spend over $3 billion -- and perhaps as much as $8 billion -- on gasoline imports this year alone. And, with just a 45-day domestic supply available, steady supplies from abroad are vital to the continued functioning of the regime. All of which suggests that a comprehensive gas embargo on the Islamic Republic could quickly wreak havoc on Iran's industrial sectors -- and, potentially, galvanize serious social unrest on the Iranian street as well.

DOJ_NMG_0069476

But the West's window of opportunity to implement such measures is rapidly closing. Already, Iran has begun to make serious economic countermoves, transferring financial assets from Europe to China and Southeast Asia and initiating a large-scale privatization of governmental funds. Most significant of all, the Iranian regime recently approved a new fiscal budget that calls for a halt to gasoline imports and the institution of gasoline rationing beginning this fall. The aim of these efforts is crystal clear: to proactively limit potential economic leverage over its behavior.

Sadly, international diplomacy so far has played directly into Iran's hands. In the best case, serious U.N. Security Council action will still take weeks or months to materialize, buying Iran's ayatollahs valuable time to forge ahead with their nuclear program. What's more, if and when they do eventually emerge, U.N. sanctions are guaranteed to be limited in scope, so as not to offend two of Iran's chief strategic partners, Russia and China. As such, they are not likely to offend Iran's ayatollahs much either.

By hitching itself to this flawed policy, the Bush administration is courting disaster. Instead of relying on the United Nations, the White House should be thinking creatively about another sort of grouping -- an economic "coalition of the willing" capable of implementing the specific financial levers that are most likely to alter Iranian behavior, and of doing so without further delay.

The stakes could not be any higher. If the U.S. and its international allies fail to promptly use their existing economic leverage to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions, they will soon have just two choices: to acquiesce to the emergence of an atomic Iran, or to use military force to prevent it from happening.

Mr. Berman is vice president for policy at the American Foreign Policy Council, and the author of "Tehran Rising: Iran's Challenge to the United States" (Rowman & Littlefield, 2005).

N Korea 'likely To Test Nuclear Bomb' (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, September 26, 2006

North Korea will probably test a nuclear weapon, with an even chance of doing so this year, as Kim Jong-il's regime tries to assert its defiance in the face of increasing international pressure, said Richard Armitage, former US deputy secretary of state.

Mr Armitage, who is urging Washington to talk directly to Pyongyang to try and resolve the nuclear stand-off, estimated there was a 50 per cent chance of a test by the end of the year.

"I think it is more likely than not," Mr Armitage, who served in President George W. Bush's first administration, told the Financial Times. This follows weeks of speculation that Pyongyang is preparing to prove its nuclear capability and its resolve to resist US demands.

"I think that in their thought-process it's the next logical escalation. A [North Korean] spy was captured here [in August], there were shots fired in the demilitarised zone and they launched missiles [in July] . . . so their next logical thing is to demonstrate that they actually do have a device," he said in Seoul yesterday.

Pyongyang fired seven missiles, including one unsuccessful long-range rocket, despite repeated warnings against such provocative action. It has suffered little tangible punishment but neither has it gained anything as a result.

South Korean newspapers have for weeks been reporting rumours of preparations for a test. Chung Hyung-keun, a South Korean lawmaker on the national intelligence committee, said last week that North Korea was ready to conduct a test.

"All that is needed is Kim Jong-il's approval," Mr Chung said, citing South Korean intelligence. "If the US continues the financial sanctions and if China also turns up the heat, North Korea will be forced into a corner and will have to resort to a nuclear test."

Selig Harrison, of the Washington-based Center for International Policy, said after returning from Pyongyang at the weekend that North Korea was planning to remove fuel rods from its nuclear reactor within the next three months.

The thousands of rods that North Korea claims to have processed so far could have provided enough fissile material for as many as 10 bombs, although it is impossible to verify whether Pyongyang has been able to build a workable nuclear weapon.

Amid the sabre-rattling, South Korean, Chinese and US diplomats have been trying to restart the six-party talks aimed at persuading North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons programme. Pyongyang is refusing to return to the talks while Washington imposes financial sanctions that have effectively shut North Korea out of the international banking system.

"I don't hold with the idea that just because we don't like some regime we don't talk to them," Mr Armitage said yesterday. "After all we didn't like the Soviet regime and we talked to them and we didn't like the Mao Zedong regime and we certainly talked to them, and we've all benefited from having done so."

Armitage Expects North Korean Nuclear Test Before Year-end (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0069477

AFP, September 26, 2006

Former US deputy secretary of state Richard Armitage said that North Korea may test a nuclear weapon by the end of this year, sparking "huge international ramifications."

"As a personal opinion I think you have an even chance of a nuclear device detonation by the end of the year, and that in the longer time it's more likely than not that North Korea will detonate a nuclear device," he told a forum in the South Korean capital Monday.

"I think in their logic it's the next rational escalation point," Armitage said in response to a question from the audience.

"Clearly, this will have huge international ramifications."

In response, Armitage said, he would expect US President George W. Bush to send Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to consult other countries involved in six-nation talks on North Korea, and simultaneously to take the issue to the United Nations.

"I personally think that if North Korea were to do that (conduct a test), then the United States should move more forces into the area ... to make it clear to North Korea that each time they provoke, they find themselves in a less advantageous military situation."

The six-nation talks, involving the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States, are aim at persuading Pyongyang to scrap its nuclear program in exchange for economic and diplomatic benefits and security guarantees.

They have been suspended since November when the North boycotted them in protest at US financial sanctions.

In July the communist state test-fired seven missiles and there have been reports it is preparing a nuclear test.

North Korea declared in February 2005 that it had built nuclear weapons but is not known to have conducted any tests.

In Book, Musharraf Expands On North Korean Nuclear Link (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25 — President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan wrote in a memoir published Monday that he now believes that the equipment sent to North Korea several years ago by Pakistan's nuclear chief included some of Pakistan's most technologically advanced nuclear centrifuges.

The assertion deepened the mystery about how much progress North Korea has made in what is often called its second, and very secret, nuclear program.

Mr. Musharraf has been promoting the new book, "In the Line of Fire" (Free Press), everywhere from the East Room of the White House to appearances on the morning talk shows.

In it, he says for the first time that his suspicions about the activities of Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer who build an illicit nuclear network that also supplied Iran and Libya, dated from 1999.

"I received a report suggesting that some North Korean nuclear experts, under the guise of missile engineers, had arrived" at Pakistan's nuclear laboratories "and were being given secret briefings," the book says.

The timing is significant, because it was not until more than three years later, in 2002, that the United States gathered solid evidence that North Korea was trying to enrich uranium, a step toward producing nuclear fuel for weapons that requires centrifuge technology. But Mr. Musharraf, who took over as president in 1999 in a coup, apparently never shared his suspicions with the United States.

"It's a significant admission," one senior American intelligence official said, "since the Pakistanis spent years denying that there was any evidence of dealings with North Korea and telling us, 'No problem here.' " The official would not agree to let his name be used and said he had not had time to read the book closely.

North Korea has openly boasted of producing plutonium, a different approach to getting fuel for nuclear weapons, at its main nuclear facility at Yongbyon since it forced international inspectors to leave the country three and a half years ago.

But through much of the 1990's, the plutonium program was frozen under an agreement reached with the Clinton administration. Mr. Musharraf's account — which seems to be based on his own recollections and on Pakistani interrogations of Dr. Khan, who is under house arrest and undergoing treatment for cancer — supports other intelligence reports that North Korea began searching in the 1990's for an alternative way to a bomb.

It settled on the same approach Iran is using: enriching uranium, with prototypes and designs provided by Dr. Khan and his network for tens of millions of dollars. Iran says its enrichment is solely for peaceful purposes.

But American intelligence officials say it is still unclear where in North Korea this uranium enrichment may be under way, or how much progress may have been made.

Indeed, American assessments of North Korea's nuclear programs have been largely guesswork. In late 2002, the Central Intelligence Agency estimated that North Korea could produced a uranium-based atomic weapon by 2004 or 2005. But the widespread assumption now among North Korea experts is that the country is still some time away from that achievement.

DOJ_NMG_0069478

A year ago, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for Asian affairs, said that "where there is not a consensus, is how far they have gone with this."

Part of the mystery surrounds what kind of technology North Korea received. At first it was assumed that it bought Pakistan's cast-offs, like a first-generation centrifuge, the P-1, identical to the kind that Iran is now trying to get running at its main nuclear fuel plant. But Mr. Musharraf's account suggests that North Korea might have leapt ahead to the next generation, the P-2, which can enrich more uranium, and faster.

The Bush administration has said it had no hard evidence of any enrichment effort until 2002, when its negotiators confronted North Korea with evidence they had been cheating on a nuclear-freeze agreement reached with the Clinton administration. The North Koreans seemed to confirm the existence of a secret program to enrich uranium at that time, but since then have said they were misunderstood and have denied any such effort.

Mr. Musharraf's account is important because it suggests that North Korea and Iran are working with the same advanced equipment, at secret locations.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran boasted earlier this year that his engineers are also working on the P-2, in what he termed a "research program." But inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations nuclear monitoring agency, have never been shown the advanced machines in either country.

Mr. Musharraf denies in the book that any senior Pakistani officials, himself included, knew about Dr. Khan's illicit activities. He never explains how Dr. Khan was able to fly his goods to North Korea and Iran on Pakistani military aircraft. He describes the engineer as "such a self-centered and abrasive man that he could not be a team player."

"He had a huge ego," Mr. Musharraf writes, adding that, "he had managed to build himself up into Albert Einstein and J. Robert Oppenheimer rolled into one."

Musharraf Tells All In Memoir (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's just-released memoir, "In the Line of Fire," breaks sharply with the political tradition of publishing only pablum while still in office.

Gen. Musharraf's tell-all, released yesterday as the Pakistani leader was in the midst of a U.S. visit, has exposed U.S. blustering after September 11, revealed bounties paid for capturing al Qaeda terrorists, and angered India with its account of a still-contested 1999 clash over the disputed Kashmir region.

It has also earned a unique televised endorsement from President Bush at his joint press conference with the general last week and generated a pre-release buzz that a publicist for a rival publishing house called "priceless."

"It's a highly unusual thing for a sitting head of state to do, but it isn't totally out of character for Musharraf," said Walter Andersen, a former top South Asia specialist at the State Department who now teaches at Johns Hopkins University's Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies.

"He's cultivated a reputation for blunt talk, for being a military man who's not afraid to be frank," said Mr. Andersen. "I'm sure his publishers are loving it, although I imagine there are some people in his own foreign ministry and intelligence service who are staying up late these days."

Mr. Bush made his semi-serious endorsement at a press briefing in which Gen. Musharraf deflected reporters' questions by saying he was pledged to New York publisher Simon & Schuster not to reveal details of the manuscript before yesterday's official release date.

A senior publicist for another New York publishing house said the exchange amounted to an advertising mother lode for the book.

"I'm listening to this stuff and thinking, 'This kind of talk is priceless,'" she said, speaking on the condition her name not be used.

Gen. Musharraf's account of how U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage issued a threat to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age" if it did not join the post-September 11 U.S. war on terror -- a threat Mr. Armitage has denied making -- has been followed by other revelations as the book has hit the bookstores and has been serialized in the London Times.

According to the book:

·Gen. Musharraf "war-gamed" a confrontation with the United States if he refused to fight the fundamentalist Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan, concluding neither the country's military nor its economy would survive the fight.

·Five units of Pakistani troops -- despite continued denials by Islamabad -- took part in the 1999 clash with Indian troops in Kargil district of Kashmir, a divided land claimed by both nations. Mr. Andersen said Pakistan's official position has long been that only Kashmiri "freedom fighters" took part in the strike.

DOJ_NMG_0069479

Indian military officials, meanwhile, were sharply denying Gen. Musharraf's contention in the book that the battle was a "victory" for Pakistan. The Indian officials said Pakistan-backed forces took heavier casualties and were forced to sue for peace.

·The CIA secretly paid Pakistan "hundreds of millions of dollars in bounties" for the capture of over 350 al Qaeda figures after September 11, according to the London Times' excerpt. The U.S. Justice Department denied any knowledge of the payments, saying such bounties were intended as rewards for individuals, not foreign governments.

·Indian scientists may have used equipment and technology bought from the black-market nuclear network set up by Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani engineer considered the father of Pakistan's own nuclear bomb.

Mr. Andersen said the book's contents would probably prove "irritating" for the governments involved, including Pakistan itself, but said it was unlikely to have a major impact on the Musharraf government's relations with its key partners, including the United States, India and Afghanistan.

Encounters: Jon Stewart And Pervez Musharraf (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

When President Bush informed Pakistan after the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago that it faced a stark choice — to be with us or against us — neither he nor his counterpart, President Pervez Musharraf, could have imagined it would come to this.

Continuing a book tour that would make any American politician envious, General Musharraf is to go where no sitting leader of any nation — certainly not Mr. Bush — has gone before. He is to plug his new memoir, “In the Line of Fire,” tonight on “The Daily Show” on Comedy Central.

There, he will subject himself to questioning by Jon Stewart, the host, whose views on the conduct of foreign policy are unlikely to win him an invitation to the White House anytime soon.

But Mr. Bush must think General Musharraf’s work may reinforce his security message; he told reporters at the White House last week to “buy the book.”

Israeli Premier And Saudi Said To Hold Secret Meeting (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 25 — An Israeli newspaper reported Monday that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert held a secret meeting about 10 days ago with a senior Saudi Arabian official to discuss issues that included Iran’s nuclear program and prospects for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

In response to the reports, Mr. Olmert and his aides said he did not meet with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. However, they declined to answer directly when asked if he met with any other senior Saudi leader.

“I did not meet with the Saudi king and I did not meet with anyone who should cause a sensation in the media,” Mr. Olmert was quoted as saying on Ynetnews.com, a Web site affiliated with Yediot Aharonot, the Israeli newspaper that first carried the story.

If a meeting did take place, it would indicate a significant development for two countries that have never had diplomatic ties. Officials from Israel and Saudi Arabia have quietly shared intelligence information, but have never met publicly, said David Kimche, chief of the Israel Council on Foreign Relations.

Both countries are concerned about Iran and its nuclear program, and — with a majority of Saudi Arabia’s Muslims being Sunnis — are also concerned about links between Shiite Muslim groups stretching from Iran to Lebanon, he said.

Yediot Aharonot, citing unidentified government officials, said Mr. Olmert’s meeting took place with an unidentified official who is close to the Saudi king. It did not say where the talks took place.

Later Monday, the Israeli newspaper Haaretz reported on its Web site that there might have been a meeting between one of Mr. Olmert’s envoys and a Saudi official in a third country.

In Saudi Arabia, there was no official comment.

In recent weeks, Saudi Arabia has sought to revive a 2002 peace initiative that calls on Arab countries to normalize ties with Israel in exchange for the creation of a Palestinian state along Israel’s pre-1967 war borders. Israel has rejected the plan, though Mr. Olmert praised King Abdullah when discussing the proposal.

Israel has full diplomatic relations with just two Arab countries, Egypt and Jordan. There have been lower-level ties with other states, though many of those dealings have been frozen during the Israeli-Palestinian fighting over the past six years. Saudi Arabia is among many Arab countries that have never had official ties with Israel, and even the suggestion of an informal contact is considered an extremely delicate matter.

DOJ_NMG_0069480

"If there was a meeting, and I believe there was, the Saudis obviously thought it would be very discreet," Mr. Kimche said. "I'm sure they are shocked this has come out."

In July, when the Lebanese group Hezbollah staged a cross-border raid, igniting a one-month war with Israel, Saudi Arabia was among several Arab nations that initially criticized Hezbollah. It later criticized Israel for its intense bombardment of Lebanon, which resulted in hundreds of civilian deaths.

Still, Mr. Olmert told Ynetnews.com that Saudi Arabia showed "responsibility and judgment" during the war.

Yediot Aharonot reported last week that Saudi Arabia and Israel began holding discussions during the fighting this summer. In an interview with Mr. Olmert last week, the newspaper asked him whether there had been contacts. "I do not have to answer every question," Mr. Olmert replied.

Olmert Met Secretly With Saudis, Paper Says (WT/AP)

By Ramit Plushnick-masti

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

JERUSALEM -- An Israeli newspaper reported yesterday that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert secretly met with a senior Saudi Arabian official to discuss Iran's nuclear program and peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mr. Olmert later told the Web site of the daily Yediot Ahronot that he didn't hold talks with Saudi King Abdullah, but he did not deny meeting with a high-ranking Saudi.

"I did not meet with the Saudi king and I did not meet with anyone who should cause a media stir," Mr. Olmert said.

In Saudi Arabia, the Foreign Ministry said no one was immediately available to comment on the report.

Since Israel's war against Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon ended last month, the leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and Syria have been calling for a new push in peacemaking to prevent future conflicts.

The Yediot report quoted an unspecified number of anonymous Israeli officials as saying Mr. Olmert met with Abdullah 10 days ago. It described other officials as hinting that the talks were with a senior official close to the king.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz later reported that the meeting took place on Sept. 13, and Israel's Army Radio said the talks were held in the royal palace in Riyadh.

Saudi Arabia, which has no diplomatic ties with Israel, has been trying to revive a regional peace initiative it presented in 2002. Israel rejected the plan at the time, but Mr. Olmert has indicated he might be more open than his predecessor, Ariel Sharon.

Yediot first reported last week that Israel and Saudi Arabia had been holding secret talks since fighting erupted in July between Israel and Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Saudi Arabia's peace initiative called for a full Israeli withdrawal from lands it captured in the 1967 Mideast War in exchange for normalization and relations with all Arab countries. Mr. Sharon rejected it outright, but Mr. Olmert struck a different tone in the interview with Yediot last week.

"I am very impressed with different processes and statements that are connected to Saudi Arabia, some that have been stated publicly and others as well. I am very impressed with King Abdullah's wisdom and sense of responsibility," Mr. Olmert was quoted as saying.

There also were signals from Syrian President Bashar Assad that he might consider renewing peace talks with Israel.

"I don't say that Israel should be wiped off the map. We want to make peace -- peace with Israel," Mr. Assad was quoted as saying in an interview to the German magazine Der Spiegel, which was released over the weekend.

Israel rejected the overture, saying Mr. Assad had to stop supplying arms to Hezbollah and sponsoring Palestinian militants allied with the ruling Hamas party before peace talks would be possible.

Hamas And Fatah Call Off Unity Talks (AP)

By Mark Lavie, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

Rivals Hamas and Fatah called off top-level talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government that might ease crippling international sanctions, the latest indication of difficulties in bridging their ideological differences.

With the Palestinians stuck, another channel for Mideast progress appeared to open when Israeli media reported that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had a secret meeting with a senior official from Saudi Arabia. Both sides predictably denied the reports, as they have no official relations.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, the head of Fatah, postponed his planned trip to the Gaza Strip for talks with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, and both sides said no new date has been set.

DOJ_NMG_0069481

Since a Hamas government took office last March, a cutoff of Western aid has brought the Palestinian Authority to its knees, leaving most public sector workers without pay for months and shutting down vital projects. Israel and the West insisted that Hamas must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous peace accords, but the Islamic militant group has refused to comply.

Hamas trounced Abbas' Fatah in January parliamentary elections, a reflection of voter dissatisfaction with decades of inefficiency, corruption and high-handed rule rather than an endorsement of the Hamas ideology rejecting the existence of Israel.

Thrust into power for the first time, Hamas has refused to bend its main goal — an Islamic Middle East without a Jewish state. During the past decade, dozens of Hamas suicide bombers have killed hundreds of Israelis.

Fatah, under the late Yasser Arafat, recognized Israel and conducted several rounds of peace talks, resulting in some partial agreements. However, a full peace treaty eluded the two sides.

Bringing in Fatah now could provide a way to finesse the ideological impasse, entrusting negotiations with Israel to Abbas' PLO, in keeping with previous peace accords. Hamas would reserve judgment until a deal was reached.

Several times in the past months Hamas and Fatah appeared close to a political agreement based on the "prisoners' document," a plan put together by prominent Palestinians in Israeli prisons that calls for a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza. Some believe that implicitly accepts Israel next door, without stating the recognition.

But the U.S., Europe and Israel have signaled this would not be enough — the new government itself would have to accept the three conditions they set for the resumption of aid — although Europe has softened its line recently.

Neither Hamas nor Fatah would give a reason for the latest delay or speculate about the next move.

Israeli media reported Monday that Olmert met a senior Saudi official. Saudi Arabia won praise from Olmert for its measured stance during the recent Israel-Hezbollah war, and it has revived a peace initiative based on pan-Arab acceptance of Israel in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal from all of the West Bank.

The Yediot Ahronot daily newspaper reported that Olmert and an unidentified top Saudi official met 10 days ago for talks that focused on Iran's disputed nuclear program and the need to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians, the newspaper said.

The Israeli daily Haaretz later reported that the meeting took place on Sept. 13, and Israel's Army Radio said the talks were held in the royal palace in Riyadh.

Olmert replied somewhat cryptically. "I did not meet with the Saudi king and I did not meet with anyone who should cause a media stir," Olmert told Yediot's Ynet Web site later Monday. "I didn't hold any meetings with anyone. All the rest is just imagination and speculation."

A Saudi official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media, called the reports of a meeting "a figment of their imagination."

Separately, an Israeli military court ruled Monday that 21 Hamas legislators and Cabinet ministers would remain in Israeli custody, overruling a lower court. Israel rounded up dozens of Hamas officials after Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid from Gaza in late June.

Hamas Lawmakers To Remain In Jail (NYT)

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 25 — An Israeli military appeals court in the West Bank on Monday reversed an earlier ruling and said that 18 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers would have to remain in jail pending trial.

A military court on Sept. 12 ordered Israel to release the Hamas members, but military prosecutors appealed. The men are charged with belonging to a terrorist organization. Aziz Dweik, the speaker of parliament and one of those being held, called the ruling a political decision.

Israel has detained about 40 Palestinian legislators and cabinet ministers in the West Bank over the past three months. The crackdown began after Palestinian militants seized an Israeli soldier on June 25.

Peacekeepers Have 'Robust' Mandate, Rice Says (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the peacekeeping mission in southern Lebanon yesterday to act on what she termed "a very robust" mandate approved by the United Nations that grants international troops authority to challenge anyone who attempts to block their mission, and to use force if necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0069482

"The language says that anything and anyone who keeps them from fulfilling their responsibilities is to be challenged on that, and they even have the right to use force if they need to," Ms. Rice said. "That mandate was written in a very robust fashion."

She acknowledged, however, that "it's always a matter of how it's interpreted."

Members of the international force sent to Lebanon under a United Nations Security Council resolution passed one month ago have said that they cannot set up checkpoints, search cars or trucks, homes or businesses, or detain suspects.

Commanders of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, or Unifil, say the Security Council resolution places Lebanese sovereignty paramount — meaning they first must be authorized to take such actions by the Lebanese Army.

In an interview yesterday with editors and reporters of The New York Times, Ms. Rice said, "I would hope that Unifil would interpret its mission in a way that allows it to really do what it is supposed to do, which is not to allow a return to the status quo ante in the south."

A goal of Security Council Resolution 1701 was to increase the numbers and military punch of the international force in Lebanon, as well as to create the conditions for the Lebanese military to move into the south. Both operations are viewed as important to separate Israeli and Hezbollah forces, halt attacks and prevent Hezbollah from rearming.

The question of how commanders of the international force have interpreted the mandate on the ground "is something we will follow up on," Ms. Rice said.

Ms. Rice noted that the expanded Unifil mission was new and that it was not yet operating with the full number of desired troops. But she stressed that the peacekeepers "certainly got the authority to do whatever they need to do to do their job."

"That's very clear, and it says so," she added. "I think there probably ought to be a conversation with Unifil about how it sees its responsibilities."

In assessing political progress since the resolution was approved, Ms. Rice said that "Lebanon had come to a standstill, politically, well before the Hezbollah attack." Yesterday she said, "I think you could make an argument that after the war things have begun to move — some of them sideways, some of them forward, but they have begun to move. I'm not sure that anything has begun to move backwards."

The political situation in Lebanon "is very fragile," she acknowledged. But the fact that the Lebanese government and the Lebanese armed forces have extended their reach into southern Lebanon "is a major achievement," she said.

Corporate Chiefs Lead Campaign To Aid Lebanon (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush tapped top officials at Cisco Systems Inc., Intel Corp. and two other companies to lead a private-sector rebuilding effort in Lebanon similar to ones the White House launched last year in Pakistan and Central America.

While earlier campaigns followed natural disasters, the Lebanon effort aims to help the country recover from Israel's bombing during the war with the Islamic militant group Hezbollah.

Cisco Chief Executive John Chambers, in an interview after meeting with President Bush, dismissed the idea that postwar Lebanon might be a politically tricky place for a CEO to represent the U.S. government. "The risk of action is a much better alternative to the risk of inaction," he said, describing Lebanon as "the linchpin to many other opportunities around the world."

Mr. Chambers led a presidential delegation to Beirut over the weekend that included Ray Irani, CEO of Occidental Petroleum Corp., and Yousif Ghafari, chairman of Ghafari Inc., an architecture, design and engineering company. Joining the team, but not the trip, is Intel Chairman Craig Barrett.

The group follows administration campaigns to tap companies for help in post-earthquake Pakistan and mudslide-hit Central America, led respectively last year by Pfizer Inc. and Deere & Co.

The four executives handling the Lebanon project chipped in $1 million of their own money to the new U.S.-Lebanon Partnership Fund, while Citibank and the federal Overseas Private Investment Corp. created a $120 million loan facility to offer financing for home repairs, small businesses and long-term mortgages. Cisco is proposing to invest about $10 million in projects in Lebanon, a sum that Mr. Chambers described as "a rounding error in terms of our business."

Mr. Chambers said the companies aren't looking to make big investments in Lebanon but will focus on offering training, venture capital and research-and-development help to Lebanese businesses. "This is not going to be transactional in nature," he said of the fund. "It's about making a difference over the long haul."

President Bush told reporters after meeting with the four executives in the Oval Office that the goal "is to help Lebanese citizens and Lebanese businesses not only recover, but to flourish, because we believe strongly in the concept of a democracy in Lebanon."

DOJ_NMG_0069483

In Lebanon, A War's Lethal Harvest (WP)

By Anthony Shadid, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Threat of Unexploded Bombs Paralyzes the South

DEIR QANOUN, Lebanon -- The messages scrawled in red on the concrete, stone and cinder-block walls near Ali Saqlawi's house are worded differently but mean the same: "CB," "cb strike," "cluster strike." Arrows point with deceptive precision in every direction. Saqlawi, a mechanic, needs no warning. He has already seen the thousands of bomblets the size of cellphones that littered his town, the detritus from hundreds of cluster bombs fired in the last days of the 33-day war with Israel.

"I saw them where your feet are," he said, pointing to the ground next to the rubble of what was once his house and garage. He waved toward the parched lemon groves across the cratered street. "You'll find them there," he said. He pointed at the olive orchard behind him, awaiting a reluctant harvest by workers too fearful to enter. "It's all bombs over there," he said.

The scourge of munitions from the cluster bombs now littering southern Lebanon, mostly American-made but some manufactured in Israel, will be a "lasting legacy," the United Nations has said. U.N. officials estimate that the Israeli military fired 90 percent of the bombs during the last 72 hours of the conflict, which began on July 12 after Hezbollah fighters seized two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid and ended with a cease-fire on Aug. 14. As many as 1 million of the bomblets are unexploded, they say, wounding or killing three people a day. The threat of stumbling across a bomblet has paralyzed life in parts of the south that depend on the harvest of tobacco and now-abandoned groves of bananas, olives and citrus.

"No one's going into the orchards," the 27-year-old Saqlawi said.

His brow sweaty, he watched a bulldozer claw at the wreckage of his house and business. Gray dust billowed up; iron rods still crusted with concrete snapped forward. To the side were the contents of his garage -- mangled car parts and burned tires.

"Rubble and bombs," he said.

International law does not prohibit the use of cluster bombs, which can spread dozens, sometimes hundreds, of smaller munitions, or bomblets, over an area the size of two football fields. But because of their wide dispersal, human rights groups have condemned their use in civilian areas, saying they violate international bans on indiscriminate attacks. The Reagan administration imposed a six-year ban on their sale to Israel after a congressional investigation determined that Israel had misused the weapons during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon. The State Department said it is investigating whether Israel violated agreements with the United States on their use during the conflict this summer.

U.N. officials have said they are still grappling with a problem whose scope has grown by the day. About 100 de-miners on contract to the United Nations are trying to defuse munitions in which as many as two in five of the bomblets failed to detonate. They said many of the bomblets might have failed to explode because they struck soft ground, were snared in trees or other obstructions or were fired too low to the ground to detonate on impact.

Early on, officials estimated that cluster munitions littered 400 sites, anywhere from a house to an entire village. The number now stands at 590, and U.N. officials said they are dumbfounded by the intensity of the firing in the war's last days, when it was clear a cease-fire was approaching.

"It's impossible for me to work out what the logic was," said David Shearer, the U.N. humanitarian coordinator for Lebanon. "To me, it just seems outrageous that it would happen as it did."

Added Chris Clark, the program manager for the U.N. Mine Action Coordination Center: "What we've seen are strikes on top of strikes on top of strikes on top of strikes. It's tantamount to shooting a dead body 20 times."

The Israeli military has limited its statements on the matter, reiterating that the munitions are not banned. Last weekend, a spokesman for the Israel Defense Forces pointed to a public statement first made during the war. "All the weapons and munitions used by the IDF are legal under international law and their use conforms with international standards," it read.

Hezbollah launched an average of about 100 rockets a day into Israel during much of the conflict, climbing to 240 near the end, with many of the rockets landing in populated civilian areas. Some U.N. officials speculated that the Israeli military's inability to stop the rocket firing led it to use weapons that sprayed across a wider area. The result was what U.N. officials euphemistically refer to as "contamination" -- a density of unexploded munitions higher than that left in Kosovo in 1999 and in Iraq after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

In the 2 1/2 years after the Kosovo conflict, de-miners cleared fewer than 25,000 cluster bomblets, Clark said. In four weeks here, they have cleared more than 30,000 bomblets. Adding to the problem, the landscape remains littered with as many as 400,000 land mines left by Israel and its Lebanese allies during the occupation that ended in 2000.

So far, U.N. officials say, exploding cluster bomblets have killed 14 people and wounded 90 since the war ended.

"In the areas where there were strikes, it's the most extensive contamination I've ever seen," said Clark, who has worked in Kosovo, Sudan, Kuwait, Iraq, Bosnia and Afghanistan. It "is just off the scale."

DOJ_NMG_0069484

In the town of Majdel Selm, a short distance from where bulldozers were demolishing the bombed-out remnants of houses, Simon Lovell, a de-miner with the British firm Bactec International, pointed to an American-made bomblet that he had marked off with tape and wooden stakes. Farther off, amid peach, orange and olive trees, lay three others, easy to miss with an untrained eye.

"We treat them almost as a minefield," he said.

Lovell, a former naval diver with a tanned face and adrenaline-fueled exuberance, used to disarm sea mines. He pointed out the bomblets, examples of what he called "a pretty unsmart bomb." The coming rains, he said, would bury them deeper, making them even harder to spot. When they are detonated, they can hurl shrapnel 40 yards.

"The task here is going to be immense," he said.

Shrapnel pockmarked the unfinished two-story house perched over the orchard, its windows still broken. The owner, Marwan Abu Taam, said he and his wife, Shirin Rida, stayed with relatives during the war. When he returned, he walked through the field three or four times without seeing the bomblets, despite the tell-tale signs: a piece of white plastic that keeps the bomblets in tidy rows inside the shell and the white ribbon that helps guide them as they fall. His wife and 2-year-old son, Ali, won't walk outside.

"No one can move anywhere on the land," she said, as her son leaned against her leg.

Southern Lebanon, a furrowed land of valleys and rock-strewn hills, is one of the country's poorest regions. Half the population relies entirely on agriculture. Aid officials say some farmers have taken to burning their unharvested crops in hopes of detonating the bomblets.

Along the barren hills outside Majdel Selm, several goats killed by the bomblets were piled up, the stench of their rotting carcasses carried by the breeze.

"You know how you sprinkle seeds on the ground?" asked Hussein Ali, a 47-year-old municipal worker who had brought Lovell to a hilltop where dozens of bomblets lay unexploded. "That's what the bombs are like down here."

Ali and some of his neighbors acknowledged that there were Hezbollah fighters in the town. But as they looked at the bare hillsides, the men wondered aloud about the military logic of targeting such fields with cluster munitions.

"Maybe if there were trees or something," Ali said.

In Saqlawi's village of Deir Qanoun, Lovell found four holes where residents had picked up 1,013 bomblets on their own. Residents said landowners were paying the more daring among them $1 to $2 for each bomblet they disposed of. The bomblets were piled in crates and boxes. Along the road, a tractor driver asked a passerby, "Will I die if I go in there?"

Down the street, Saqlawi hopped among the piles of rubble where he used to live with his wife and 6-month-old son, Hussein.

"Everything's gone," he said, "the house, the trees, the olive harvest. Everything's gone."

He gave a bitter grin. "Praise God," he said.

Correspondent Scott Wilson in Jerusalem contributed to this report.

U.N. Inquiry Into Death Of Lebanon's Ex-Premier Focuses On Killers (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 25 — The director of the United Nations commission investigating the killing of Rafik Hariri, the former prime minister of Lebanon, reported Monday that it had confirmed preliminary findings that the attack was the work of a suicide bomber but was still pursuing the identities of the participants in the highly organized plot.

In a largely technical 22-page report, Serge Brammertz, the prosecutor leading the inquiry, said he had developed evidence from the crime scene about the bombing to a level suitable for presentation to a court and was intent on doing the same thing with evidence pointing to the conspirators.

Mr. Hariri, who opposed Syrian domination of his country, was killed along with 22 others when a huge truck bomb exploded as his convoy was moving along a downtown Beirut street on Feb. 14, 2005. The public outrage and mass street demonstrations that followed led Syria to comply with international demands and a Security Council resolution calling on it to withdraw its troops from Lebanon after a 29-year presence.

Mr. Brammertz is scheduled to brief the Security Council on his report on Friday.

The report was the third from Mr. Brammertz, a Belgian on leave as deputy prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, who succeeded Detlev Mehlis of Germany in January as director of the commission. The Brammertz reports have been more judicial and technical in tone than the two produced by Mr. Mehlis, which read like crime narratives and pointedly accused Syrian intelligence forces of directing the attack and obstructing his inquiry.

DOJ_NMG_0069485

Mr. Brammertz said he had a better experience with the Syrians. “The cooperation that the commission has received from the Syrian Arab Republic has remained generally satisfactory, and the commission continues to require its full support in providing information and facilitating interviews with individuals located in Syrian territory,” he said in the report.

He said he was also getting “ongoing strong support” from the Lebanese authorities, even during the 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah this summer. The combat forced the entire international staff of the commission to relocate to Cyprus for safety reasons, he said.

John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador, said Monday that he was impressed by the methodical manner with which Mr. Brammertz was proceeding. He said that from many conversations with Mr. Brammertz, “I know that he’s impatient with bureaucratic obstacles and he’s pushing ahead.”

Mr. Bolton noted that it was important as a case neared trial for a prosecutor to establish reasons for eliminating alternative theories that defense lawyers might pursue as well as to establish the evidence to support the prosecutor’s theory of how the incident actually occurred.

The investigation has previously established that the planners of the attack were organized and meticulous and demonstrated a sophisticated knowledge of how to stage such killings.

The commission said it had discovered links between the Hariri bombing and 14 other political assassinations in Lebanon that the Security Council asked it in June to review.

The report suggested that this would help it establish the “political environment” surrounding Mr. Hariri. Before his death, Mr. Hariri had been warned of threats against him from the Syrian government.

The mandate of the commission, created by the Council in December 2005, has been extended once and is scheduled to run until June 15, 2007.

House Passes Bill On Sudan Sanctions (AP)

By Sam Hananel, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

The House on Monday approved a bill that would impose sanctions on the government of Sudan, as lawmakers warned that tougher action is needed to stem the death and suffering in that nation's Darfur region.

The bill, passed by unanimous consent, authorizes sanctions against anyone President Bush determines is responsible for atrocities and war crimes in the conflict that has left more than 200,000 people dead and 2.5 million homeless since 2003.

The Senate passed a nearly identical measure last week and is expected to endorse the House version this week, sending it to the president's desk for his signature.

Penalties under the measure include blocking assets, refusing to grant Sudanese officials entry to the United States and preventing certain ships from entering U.S. ports. The legislation encourages Bush to deny the government of Sudan oil revenues and access to military equipment.

"This bill will do much to help the death and suffering in Darfur, but we, along with the international community, must do more," said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who has championed the measure. "Aid workers are being killed and the people they were helping are disappearing. The situation is growing worse each day and the world must continue to help in any way we can."

The measure also asks the United Nations Security Council to suspend the Sudanese government's rights and privileges of membership in the U.N. until it agrees to halt attacks against its people.

Passage of the sanctions bill had stalled over language in the House version that would have encouraged the growing movement in some states to divest from companies doing business with Sudan. The Bush administration insisted the provision be removed due to legal questions of whether state divestment interferes with foreign policy.

The Darfur conflict began when rebels of ethnic Africans revolted against the Arab-led government. The government responded with a brutal suppression and Arab militias, known as the Janjaweed, attacked villages.

Last month, the U.N. Security Council authorized a peacekeeping force for Darfur of about 20,000 troops to bolster a smaller African Union force that is undermanned and underfunded. But the Sudanese government has refused to consent and the region has become more insecure for aid workers trying to help refugees.

"As we stand here ... the Janjaweed militia is continuing to rape and kill, wiping out generations of people in Darfur," said Rep. Frank Wolf, R-Va., who sponsored the House measure. "It is unacceptable and the world must act."

Bush last week named Andrew Natsios, the former director of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his special envoy to work for peace in Sudan. Natsios met Monday with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and other lawmakers to discuss his mission and how Congress can continue to work on the issue.

House Bills Target Violence In Darfur (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0069486

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

The House yesterday passed several measures aimed at putting a stop to the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region.

Lawmakers adopted by unanimous consent late last night the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act, which imposes sanctions against "those responsible" for the "war crimes, or genocide" in Darfur.

Also, in an early evening voice vote on a nonbinding resolution, the House urged President Bush to support humanitarian and peace efforts in the African nation.

The Senate has already unanimously agreed to the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act, paving the way, lawmakers said, for action in the genocide-stricken region. They said that with estimates of at least 400,000 killed in the past two years, the U.S. cannot allow the atrocities, mostly the work of Sudan's Islamist central government and pro-Islamist militias, to continue.

"The genocide in Darfur is not just an African crisis," said Rep. Tom Lantos, a Hungarian-born Holocaust survivor. "It is a crisis of all humanity and obligates all of us to act with urgency."

"Lives must be saved," the California Democrat said. "A permanent and just peace must come to Darfur."

The bill includes provisions to block Sudanese assets in the U.S., deny Sudanese officials entry to the U.S. and keep Sudan-related ships from U.S. ports. It also encourages Mr. Bush to deny oil revenues and military equipment to Sudan and asks the U.N. Security Council to deny the Khartoum government the privileges of U.N. membership as long as its Darfur attacks continue.

Congress has a "responsibility to ensure that we do not repeat the mistakes of the past" by focusing only on Darfur, said Rep. Christopher H. Smith, New Jersey Republican.

Rep. Barbara Lee, California Democrat, reminded colleagues that 1 million were killed in the 1994 Rwandan genocide, and promised: "Not on our watch will it happen again."

Others agreed, noting the envoys to the region must work to secure a "just and equitable peace" in Darfur and to ensure the peace agreement between northern and southern Sudan remains intact.

"We are sick and tired of being sick and tired," said Rep. Donald M. Payne of New Jersey, the ranking Democrat on the International Relations Committee's subcommittee on Africa, global human rights and international operations. "This bill is just the first step."

The Darfur Peace and Accountability Act imposes sanctions on the Sudanese government and supports measures for the protection of civilians and humanitarian operations. Another measure calls for Mr. Bush to take "immediate steps" to improve the region's security by helping transfer an African Union mission to a United Nations-led force and for NATO to send an interim civilian protection force.

"Did we not learn anything from the lessons of Bosnia, Rwanda?" asked House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, also noting "the consequences of our negligence in the 1930s."

Mr. Hoyer called Sudan "the world's worst current human rights crisis. We must do more."

Meanwhile yesterday, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed bills that impose sanctions on Sudan, including one that bars California's huge public-pension systems from investing in companies with active business in that nation.

"I grew up in Europe after the Second World War so I remember the dark and heavy shadow cast by the Holocaust," the Austrian-born governor said. "It has become clear to me that we cannot turn a blind eye to any genocide."

UN Secures First Pledges For Darfur Peacekeeping Force (AFP)

AFP, September 26, 2006

The United Nations secured its first pledges for a proposed major UN peacekeeping force for the strife-torn Sudanese region of Darfur, officials said.

But about 50 countries that attended a meeting of potential contributors at the UN headquarters were also warned of the many problems that could face any force, including attacks by rebels opposed to a Darfur peace agreement and by Al-Qaeda.

Sudan has strongly objected to the United Nations taking over from an African Union force currently in the western Sudanese region, where at least 200,000 people have died since the war broke out in February 2002, according to UN estimates.

But Jean-Marie Guehenno, the UN under secretary general for peacekeeping operations, said one European country and some developing countries, which he did not name, had offered several battalions for any UN force.

Other UN officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Norway, Nigeria, Tanzania and Bangladesh were the first countries to offer troops. Nigeria and Tanzania already have troops in the AU force but they would increase their contingent.

Though there is no firm agreement on a force, Guehenno said the meeting was held because "we do have interest in the mission and we want to keep up that interest."

DOJ_NMG_0069487

The UN Security Council passed a resolution in August calling for a UN force to take over from the ill-equipped African Union (AU) force in Darfur.

There are currently about 7,000 AU troops there but the organisation wants to increase that to 11,000 by the end of the year. The AU last week extended the force's mandate until December 31.

Guehenno has set a target of a UN force of over 17,000 troops and 3,300 police to keep the peace and investigate allegations of atrocities in Darfur, where rebels turned against the Khartoum government in 2003 seeking a greater share of the region's wealth.

The troop contributors' meeting was warned that any UN force could face attacks from rebels who oppose a peace accord agreed in May, bandits and even from Al-Qaeda, which has in the past had bases in Sudan, officials said.

In April, Al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden called on Muslims to resist "crusader" western forces in Darfur.

Amid reports of renewed intense fighting in Darfur and a statement by a top UN envoy last week that the peace accords were almost dead, the United States has led calls for international pressure on Sudan to accept a UN force.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last Friday that "time is running out" to prevent an all-out Sudanese government onslaught against die-hard Darfur rebels.

"The violence in Darfur must end, and it must end now," she told a special ministerial meeting of two dozen nations plus the European Union and the United Nations in New York.

The meeting discussed sending a delegation to Khartoum in yet another bid to persuade President Omar al-Beshir to drop his opposition to deployment of the UN force.

Beshir told the UN General Assembly last week that the UN force was part of a "Zionist" plot to "dismember" his country and "plunder" his abundant resources, particularly oil.

While waiting for new talks with Khartoum, the Security Council on Friday extended for two weeks the mandate of a 12,273-strong UN force deployed in southern Sudan, which expired Sunday.

Koizumi Ends 5-year Term As Japanese PM (AP)

By Eric Talmadge, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

Five years after taking office for what many analysts had expected to be a short-lived term, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said good-bye to his followers Tuesday and prepared to turn over power to his protege and long-time spokesman, Shinzo Abe.

The transition ends the tenure of one Japan's longest-serving and most popular prime ministers, a term that saw both a gradual recovery of the nation's economy and a rare infusion of lightheartedness — Koizumi waltzing with actor Richard Gere, for example, or serenading U.S. President George W. Bush with an Elvis Presley song at the late singer's Graceland mansion.

Koizumi also, however, left a legacy of discord with neighbors China and South Korea over territorial disputes and his repeated visits to a memorial to Japan's fallen soldiers, including convicted World War II war criminals.

In his final statement, Koizumi stressed the impact of his economic reform program and efforts to trim government spending.

"When I first came to office, Japan's economy was in stagnation and there was a prevalence of pessimistic views," he said. "Today there is a willingness to challenge the new times and a confidence that we can succeed if we try. The bud of reform is beginning to grow into a big tree."

He left his official residence Tuesday to the ringing applause of 150 staff members and senior party leaders, including Abe.

Smiling and relaxed, Koizumi waved to crowd and clutched a bouquet of red and pink roses.

"Thank you," he said.

Koizumi chose the time for his departure and appeared to have no regrets.

He had for several months stressed that he had no intention of seeking re-election when his term as ruling Liberal Democratic Party president ended Sept. 30. He can also be fairly confident that his reforms and basic foreign policy goals will be followed up by Abe, who served as the top spokesman for the Koizumi Cabinet before winning election as party president last week.

Koizumi said he was particularly proud to have maintained high levels of public support. With vows to overhaul the economy and the stagnant ruling party, he started off with record-high approval ratings of about 90 percent. Though in more recent polls that had fallen significantly, to around the 50 percent level, they remained relatively high.

"The economy recovered and people now have the confidence that they can succeed if they try," he said in his parting statement. "I think that was good, because I had the support of the public."

DOJ_NMG_0069488

Chinese Official Is Dismissed In Pension Scandal (WP)

By Maureen Fan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 26, 2006

Move Against Party Figure Is Highest-Reaching in Years

BEIJING, Sept. 25 -- The Communist Party chief of Shanghai was fired Monday in the highest-level purge of a Chinese official in more than a decade. Analysts called the dismissal an effort by President Hu Jintao to make a bold statement against corruption and consolidate his power in advance of an important party congress.

Chen Liangyu, who presided over China's high-rise and business capital and its 17 million people, sometimes clashing with officials in Beijing, also lost his seat on the country's ruling Politburo.

The official New China News Agency said Monday that investigators believe that Chen, 59, helped loot the city's pension fund of hundreds of millions of dollars. He helped enrich illegal entrepreneurs, the agency reported, and engaged in cronyism on behalf of family members and his staff, who also severely violated various laws.

There was no public response from Chen on Monday. His photograph and other personal material about him has been removed from the city's Web site.

Official corruption is a prime concern among the Chinese public, and the Communist Party has promised repeatedly to attack it aggressively.

Analysts also saw the dismissal as related to a party congress that will convene late next year. At that meeting, Hu is to pick party leaders who will serve under him during his second five-year term.

Chen was a political protege of former Chinese president Jiang Zemin, who is from Shanghai. In the same way that Jiang tried to shore up his legacy by promoting his own proteges and loyalists, analysts here said, Hu is making room in the ranks for allies in hopes that they will help him govern and retain influence after he steps down.

The apparent struggle between those loyal to the two leaders does not reflect a disagreement in ideology, according to a Western diplomat with extensive experience in Asia. Instead, the elbowing is about patronage and influence.

Liu Xiaobo, a leading political dissident and literary critic, said that "anti-corruption is always a useful tool in the fight for power among high-ranking officials."

Chen, born in October 1946, earned an architectural degree from a People's Liberation Army institute. He joined the Communist Party in 1980, holding a succession of posts before being appointed Shanghai party secretary in 2002. In that job, he oversaw a metropolitan area that is studded with glass office towers and functions as the hub of one of the world's most dynamic economies.

The city's stature suffered a blow in recent years due to corruption scandals -- at least two people were named earlier in the pension fund investigation -- and an overheated real estate market. Chen reportedly clashed with President Hu and Premier Wen Jiabao over Beijing's attempts to slow the city's economic growth.

His removal will bring no change to local economic policies in Shanghai, state media said. Chen is being temporarily replaced as party boss by Shanghai's mayor, Han Zheng.

The last Politburo member to be fired in a corruption case, in 1995, was Chen Xitong, then mayor of Beijing. But his case pales compared with Chen Liangyu's, which involves far greater amounts of money, Liu suggested. Chen Xitong was sentenced to 16 years in prison. After serving eight years, he was released earlier this year for what officials called medical reasons.

Beijing is believed to have sent teams of investigators to Shanghai, where they went around in black cars with tinted windows to question officials. The Communist Party often conducts what turn out to be criminal investigations of its own before it allows municipal authorities to begin formal investigations by prosecutors or police. The party investigators sometimes use a technique known as shuang gui , an extra-legal procedure that involves secret detention and questioning of suspected officials.

Party officials have been increasingly speaking out against corruption recently, but it is unclear whether their rhetoric is filtering down to the local level, where corruption remains rampant.

"We must realize that China is now experiencing a profound system transformation, a profound structural adjustment, and a profound social change," wrote Wu Guanzheng, head of the party's Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, in an article emphasizing anti-corruption efforts in a party journal this month.

"Generally speaking, the party's working style is good, but there are still some serious problems," Wu wrote in the Sept. 16 issue of Qiu Shi magazine. "For example, some party officials lie to their supervisors, some only focus on getting a higher position, some seek illegal benefits using power, some fight the central government's decisions if they conflict with his regional interests, some appropriate public monies, and so on."

DOJ_NMG_0069489

Because of upcoming elections of local party officials this year and next year, officials should pay special attention in rooting out the guilty, he said. "We should bring ruin and shame to their political reputation and make them suffer from great financial loss and moral regret."

The New China News Agency report about Chen Liangyu stressed that senior cadres must pay particular attention to "improving their performance." It also called on them "to guard against temptation and to persist in stringent self-discipline."

China Sacks Shanghai's Top Leader (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, September 26, 2006

Beijing Pushes to Tighten Control, Consolidate Power Amid Corruption Scandal

SHANGHAI -- China's government fired Shanghai's top official for his alleged role in a corruption scandal, escalating President Hu Jintao's efforts to consolidate power and restrain economic growth.

The removal of Chen Liangyu from his post as Shanghai's Communist Party secretary marks a push by top leaders in Beijing to assert greater control over a city that has been a showcase for China's economic overhauls and a seat of power for Mr. Hu's rivals.

China's Xinhua news agency said Mr. Chen was fired for corruption discovered in a probe into misuse of Shanghai's $1.2 billion pension fund. Xinhua said he was involved in other "discipline violations," such as "helping further the economic interests of illegal businesspeople," protecting staff who "severely violated laws" and aiding family members "by taking advantage of his official posts."

Mr. Chen's removal sends the message that even Shanghai must fall in line with the central government's agenda. The city of 18 million people accounts for more than 5% of China's economic output and handles a quarter of its national trade, but has become a prime example of economic overheating driven by speculative property investment. The dismissal raised the possibility of a slowdown in approvals for major investments in the city, where more than 120 foreign companies base their China operations. It could also make officials in other cities think twice about granting approval for pet projects.

During Mr. Chen's four-year tenure. Shanghai has seen an explosion in property prices, particularly for luxury developments. The city's pension fund, beginning before Mr. Chen's tenure, helped to fund some of the city's most prominent commercial towers, according to people familiar with the transactions.

"When the central leadership was trying to cool down the economy and the Shanghai real-estate market, the Shanghai authorities were not very obedient," said Joseph Cheng, a professor at City University of Hong Kong.

The pension scandal in Shanghai illustrates a long-running penchant among city officials to bend central-government rules. Shanghai openly flouted Beijing's mandate that social-security funds should hold only ultrasafe investments such as government bonds, and did so in a way that may have helped to inflate local property prices. Shanghai this year also set its own rules for taxing capital gains to ease the pain for home buyers of a central-government directive introduced in an effort to cool the property market.

Shanghai's pension fund entrusted money with a municipal-government-owned bank, Shanghai Pudong Development Bank Co., that established a company in the 1990s, Shanghai Anlian Investment & Development Co., to invest in property, according to people familiar with the matter. Some of Anlian's developments are among the most famous in the city skyline Anlian also gave money to Shui On Land Ltd., a Hong Kong company that redeveloped a historic neighborhood, Xintiandi.

Mr. Chen is one of the most senior leaders to be dismissed for corruption since China began economic reforms nearly three decades ago. Ousting such a senior official, even with allegations of corruption, is extremely delicate in China's consensus-driven political system. The 59-year-old Mr. Chen was one of two dozen members of the party's elite Politburo, and the position he occupied in Shanghai has been a springboard to higher office for officials -- including former President Jiang Zemin.

Political analysts say Mr. Chen's removal marks a major victory in Mr. Hu's efforts to assert authority over Mr. Jiang and his allies ahead of a meeting of party leaders next year at which key personnel appointments, including Mr. Hu's own eventual successor, are to be decided.

There could be further economic repercussions from the pension-fund scandal. The problems in Shanghai's pension system have triggered a nationwide audit, and following Mr. Chen's ouster, shares in a number of Shanghai-based companies declined in trading on the Shanghai Stock Exchange, as investors worried that there could be further fallout from the scandal on local companies and property prices.

But the impact on foreign investment may be muted. For U.S. businesses, "I would suspect that implications would be minimal," said John Frisbie, chairman of the U.S.-China Business Council, a trade group in Washington. "The post he was in is not one that formulates trade and investment policy,"

DOJ_NMG_0069490

Shanghai's 52-year-old mayor, Han Zheng, will temporarily assume the party secretary position held by Mr. Chen. The Communist Party is China's most powerful institution, and party positions are more powerful than their parallel government posts.

Mr. Han was shown on Shanghai TV last night sitting in front of a large party gathering where he vowed to continue development within a framework of macroeconomic controls set by the central government.

The ouster of Mr. Chen is the latest in a series of public crackdowns on corruption that have this year netted a Beijing vice mayor involved in planning for the 2008 Beijing Olympic Games and senior officials from other cities.

Mr. Chen is the first member of the Politburo to be dismissed for corruption since the party secretary of Beijing was forced to resign in 1995. That official, Chen Xitong (no relation to Chen Liangyu), was later sentenced to 16 years in prison. The current case carries other echoes of that earlier affair: Then it was Mr. Jiang, as president, who was seen to be consolidating power by engineering the downfall of an unruly local leader and potential rival.

Investigators began zeroing in on management of Shanghai's pension system, the nation's largest, in July. In August, Zhu Junyi, who ran the system for a decade, was stripped of his job and Communist Party posts. A number of other business and lower-level political officials have also been implicated.

In June, when President Hu made his second visit in two years to Shanghai, he avoided the foreign companies that local officials often point to as proof of the city's development. Instead, the president visited a number of domestic companies, telling Mr. Chen and Mayor Han that he hoped "Shanghai would base itself on current realistic conditions, while having long-term needs in mind."

--Andrew Batson in Beijing contributed to this article.

Shanghai's Party Leader, Mistrusted By Hu, Is Purged (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

BEIJING, Sept. 25 — As the storm clouds of a national anticorruption campaign loomed on the horizon last spring, Chen Liangyu, the Communist Party boss of Shanghai and one of China's most powerful officials, summoned reporters from the main state news agency to his office for a rare interview.

Mr. Chen told the reporters that, as chief of China's wealthy East Coast commercial center, he felt obliged above all "to carry out the orders of the party center," a public pledge of obeisance to President Hu Jintao.

That vow of fidelity came too late to rescue Mr. Chen. As an heir of the influential Shanghai-centered political machine built by Jiang Zemin, China's former top leader, Mr. Chen never won the trust of Mr. Hu, whose own power has grown steadily more formidable, party officials said.

On Sunday, security forces put Mr. Chen, 59, under a form of house arrest. The state news media reported Monday that he had lost his political posts, including his membership in the ruling Politburo, and that he might face criminal charges.

Such purges, common in Mao's time, rarely occur in today's China, which prizes political stability above all and does not generally let factional infighting spill into the public realm. Mr. Chen is the first member of the Politburo to be forced from power since 1995.

The action shows how determined Mr. Hu has become to break up entrenched local fiefs and to replace top officials who rose to prominence under Mr. Jiang with those who answer only to him.

It has also exposed the degree to which Shanghai, China's showcase commercial center, has become a political machine run by a small number of senior officials, who used political power to enrich themselves and their close associates, say people informed about the continuing investigation there.

These people, and all others interviewed for this article, spoke on the condition of anonymity, for fear of official reprisals.

Party investigators have looked into allegations of a diversion of Shanghai pension funds into real estate and infrastructure projects. Mr. Chen is suspected of aiding illegal business activity, shielding corrupt colleagues and abusing his position to benefit relatives, the official New China News Agency said.

"No matter who, no matter how high ranking, if they've violated party rules or the law, the investigation will be earnest and the punishment severe," the agency said in a report later read verbatim on China Central Television's main nightly news program.

Han Zheng, the mayor of Shanghai, was appointed acting party chief, the top position in the Shanghai region. But party officials said Mr. Hu would most likely replace Mr. Chen with an outsider of his choosing in coming weeks.

The instant the actions against Mr. Chen were announced, all traces of the newly disgraced leader disappeared from official Web sites. Some official photos of the Shanghai leadership were airbrushed to remove Mr. Chen.

Mr. Hu is seeking to reshuffle the Politburo and all major government and provincial posts at the 17th Party Congress, to be held next year, party officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0069491

He has sought to sideline opponents before that event, where he also hopes to anoint his own successor, the officials say.

His crackdown on corruption, which has also resulted in the removal of lower-level officials in Beijing, Tianjin, Fujian and Hunan recently, is viewed by observers more as a political maneuver than as a genuine effort to fight graft. Corruption runs so deep in the ruling party that some officials acknowledged that at best it could be managed, not eliminated.

Mr. Chen became Shanghai party chief in 2002, the same year that Mr. Hu became general secretary of the nation's Communist Party.

They were on a collision course from the start, party officials say. Shanghai had been the political base of Mr. Jiang, who rose to prominence as party boss there in the 1980's and promoted many of his associates to top party and government posts when he became China's top leader in 1989.

As the new Shanghai boss, who controls great wealth and enjoys considerable autonomy in many policy matters, Mr. Chen became an important figure in Chinese politics, one who did not owe his rise to Mr. Hu. He joined the 24-man Politburo and, given his relatively young age, was widely viewed as a possible contender for higher positions.

Mr. Chen did not openly oppose Mr. Hu. While some China-watching pundits have speculated that Mr. Jiang's old Shanghai faction challenged the new senior leadership at every turn, it never operated like a cohesive political clique after Mr. Jiang's partial retirement in 2002, party officials say.

For example, officials who were thought loyal to Mr. Jiang were unable to help him much when Mr. Hu forced him to give up his final post, as head of the military, in 2004.

Even within the faction, Mr. Chen had a rocky relationship with Huang Ju, another former Shanghai party boss who is now Mr. Chen's senior as a member of the nine-man Politburo Standing Committee, party officials said.Mr. Huang and Mr. Chen competed to control Shanghai's political appointments in recent years, the officials said, describing the contest as partly over how to divide the spoils of party-backed projects in the city.

Even so, Mr. Chen initially had enough clout to keep Mr. Hu's forces at bay. The city thrived on his watch. He oversaw its winning bid to be the host of the 2010 World Expo and helped attract tens of billions of dollars in foreign investment.

Shanghai now competes with Hong Kong, Tokyo and Singapore for the title of Asia's leading business center.

But it was also beset by scandal. In 2003, Mr. Chen survived a major investigation into the dealings of Zhou Zhengyi, a Shanghai-based property developer, who served a three-year jail term for fraud after he was accused of obtaining lucrative state loans and getting access to government-controlled land under false pretenses.

People informed about the current investigation say that Mr. Chen's younger brother, Chen Liangjun, a close associate of Mr. Zhou, was detained in recent weeks, and that officials reopened the file on that case to explore links to Chen Liangyu.

Last summer, Mr. Hu tried to oust Mr. Chen on the grounds that the Shanghai boss had ignored central government edicts to reduce speculative real estate investment and tamp down economic growth, people familiar with the investigation said.

Mr. Chen and his supporters rebuffed that attempt. But as one party official in Beijing put it at the time, "Sooner or later Chen will fall."

Beginning early this year, Mr. Chen sought to display loyalty to Mr. Hu, accepting interviews with the state news media in which he emphasized his strong support for the leadership's policy initiatives.

But the investigation into his dealings had not ended in 2003, people informed about the matter said. By this summer, investigators had gathered evidence that several of Mr. Chen's closest aides, including his former secretary, Qin Yu, had overseen the diversion of locally controlled pension funds into a number of real estate and infrastructure projects.

Investigators are said to be examining the possibility that the main beneficiaries of those projects were local businessmen with close ties to Mr. Chen. At least half a dozen local officials and a similar number of businessmen have been detained on suspicion of misusing the pension funds.

If the allegations against Mr. Chen are true, the crackdown would appear to have singled out one of China's most corrupt officials. But party officials say Mr. Hu has yet to show that he intends to follow all the leads turned up in the Shanghai investigation.

People informed about the investigation said officials had also gathered ample evidence that Yu Huiwen, the wife of Mr. Huang, the Politburo committee member, and a major power broker in Shanghai in her own right, also had a role in the diversion of funds.

There has been no public action taken against Mr. Huang or his wife. Mr. Huang had surgery for a case of cancer and disappeared from public life for several months earlier this year. He has since made at least a partial recovery and resumed his duties, suggesting that he does not face an immediate political threat.

Demonstrations Become Clashes After Islamists Take Somali City (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

DOJ_NMG_0069492

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Sept. 25 — Kismayo, one of the largest cities in Somalia, fell to Islamic forces without a shot on Monday — but then the trouble started.

After the city's warlords fled and hundreds of Islamist fighters poured in, demonstrators took to the streets and hurled stones at the Islamists.

Islamist troops responded with machine guns, opening fire on the demonstrators and killing at least one teenage boy, witnesses said.

"We don't want the Islamic courts!" the demonstrators yelled, referring to the Council of Islamic Somali Courts, the official name of the Islamic forces.

It was the latest episode of turmoil in a country notorious for it. The Islamist forces took over Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, in June and have been expanding their reach ever since. The people of Mogadishu have by and large supported them, thankful for the stability they brought after 15 years of anarchy.

But apparently many in Kismayo did not feel the same way. Kismayo is a major port city on the southern Somali coast, not far from Kenya. It was ruled by warlords called the Jubba Valley Alliance, which had vowed to resist the Islamists.

On Sunday night, as hundreds of Islamist fighters in heavily armed vehicles encircled the city, the warlords fled and their militias evaporated behind them.

On Monday morning, the troops rolled into the center of town and were initially greeted with cheers.

"Welcome to Islam," announced one of the Islamist commanders, Sheik Hassan Turki.

Witnesses reported that a band of fighters then took down a Somali flag and in its place hoisted a black Islamic one. Demonstrations followed, with young men rushing into the streets to burn tires, set up barricades and throw stones.

By nightfall, the situation was calmer, witnesses said, but still edgy.

Adding to the tension were news reports that hundreds of Ethiopian troops had crossed the border into Somalia in what appeared to be a bid to protect the fragile transitional government in Baidoa, a midsize city north of Kismayo.

Islamist leaders in Mogadishu vehemently object to the presence of foreign troops on Somali soil. One reason why they seized Kismayo, they said, was to establish a base to deter any foreign troops from trying to enter Somalia from Kenya.

Indonesian Christians Await Fate Of Muslims (WT)

By Anton Foek

The Washington Times, September 26, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- Indonesian Christians, deeply troubled by the executions of three Christians last week, say they are watching closely to see whether the government will be equally firm in dealing with three Muslims facing the ultimate sanction for their roles in the 2002 Bali bombings.

Unless Muslims and Christians are treated equally, they say, there could be a fresh outbreak of sectarian violence that claimed more than 1,000 lives on the island of Sulawesi between 1998 and 2002.

All weekend, Christians across the Indonesian archipelago exchanged telephone text messages requesting prayers for the souls of Fabianus Tibo, Domingus da Silva and Marianus Riwu, who were executed by a firing squad before dawn on Friday.

The simmering tensions were punctuated over the weekend by two small bombs in Poso, a small town at the epicenter of the sectarian violence, where the colorful flowers and abundant coconut palms provide an illusion of calm.

The three executed men had participated in a May 2000 attack on a Muslim school that left 191 persons dead, propelling a slumbering conflict between Christians and Muslims on the lush spice island of Sulawesi into open war.

But Christians, who make up about 8 percent of the population, say the courts have been less aggressive in prosecuting Muslims for similar attacks, noting that only a handful have been convicted and none has been sentenced to more than 15 years in prison.

"Another question is why these three farmers were sentenced to death and were executed, while the real culprits responsible are still alive," said Regina Astuti, a lawyer with the Legal Aid and Human Rights Association.

"Mr. Tibo named 16 former military and police officers he considered responsible for killing Muslims. These people were never called to the witness stand."

Christian pressure groups now are focusing their attention on three Muslims -- Amrozi bin Nurhasyim, Mukhlas Samudra and Imam Samudra -- who have been sentenced to death for the Oct. 12, 2002, bombings in Bali, which killed 202 persons.

The last deadline for their execution passed without comment, and a new date is unlikely to be set while a defense request for a new trial is pending.

"The first question is trying to find an answer about the death penalty in Indonesia in general terms, and more broadly, about justice in this country," said Dewi Sularca, a consultant with a European nongovernmental organization.

DOJ_NMG_0069493

Dozens of men were arrested and tried for the Bali bombings, most receiving sentences of up to 30 years. But some received amnesties on the national holiday six weeks ago, causing anger in Australia, home to 88 of the victims.

Canberra was also upset because the pardons and reduced sentences did not extend to Australians and other foreigners in Indonesia's prisons. Four young Australian drug dealers have been sentenced to face a firing squad.

Azyumardi Azra, rector of the Islamic University of Jakarta, argues that the Sulawesi and Bali cases should not be linked.

"In the case of the Christians executed in Sulawesi, religious sentiments were very strong," he said. "That was not and is not the case in the Bali trials. There are no Islamic groups defending the authors of the Bali slaughter."

In a television interview, Vice President Jusuf Kalla also said last week's executions had no religious dimension. "They were the result of our judicial system," he said. "This is the way we work in Indonesia."

Bolton Derides Venezuela Airport Protest (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 26, 2006

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton on Monday derided the Venezuelan foreign minister's protest over being detained at a New York airport as "street theater" and propaganda.

Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro claimed officials tried to frisk and handcuff him at John F. Kennedy International Airport as he left the annual U.N. General Assembly session on Saturday. Screeners grew suspicious when Maduro used cash to purchase a one-way ticket to Miami shortly before the flight was to leave, U.S. officials said.

The incident capped a visit that further exacerbated ill will between the United States and Venezuela. During a speech to the General Assembly, President Hugo Chavez called U.S. President George W. Bush "the devil" and a "spokesman of imperialism."

Chavez said Sunday that it wasn't his intention to cause an uproar with his remarks.

"Now 'the devil' is in style because it occurred to me to talk about the devil in the United States, and that has caused — I don't know — an uproar in the world, which wasn't my intention," Chavez said during a campaign rally in western Venezuela.

"I simply said what I believe. Now the world is stirred up because Chavez called Bush devil," he said. "Since I called him the devil in his own house, the devil is all worked up... They've threatened us with death. I'm in the hands of God. I'm not afraid of death."

The U.S. State Department has apologized for Maduro's treatment, but Bolton was less conciliatory.

"There was no 'incident' at the airport — this was Venezuelan street theater," Bolton said. "He did not request the courtesies we would have extended to get him through the airport. He purchased his ticket at a time and in a manner and with funding such that he was asked to go to secondary screening and he objected to that."

"And the first thing he did was call the press and speak to them in Spanish, so this is propaganda," Bolton said.

Maduro has called the State Department apology insufficient and said Venezuela would seek a legal challenge. Several dozen people in Caracas protested Maduro's detention Sunday.

The U.S. ambassador to Venezuela, William Brownfield, said Chavez's General Assembly speech should not affect diplomatic relations. Despite political tensions with Washington, Venezuela — the world's fifth-largest oil exporter — remains a major supplier of oil to the United States.

"My government's position is that we are going to ignore, we can ignore and we should ignore the words. It's the actions that count," Brownfield told the Venezuelan TV station Globovision. "This bilateral relation is so important for the two countries that we try to ignore the polemical words, the rhetoric."

Europeans Favor Admitting Romania And Bulgaria, Then Retooling (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 25 — Romania and Bulgaria will receive qualified endorsement on Tuesday to join the European Union on Jan. 1, but the bloc will warn that expansion must then halt until the organization makes needed structural changes, the European Commission president said Monday.

José Manuel Barroso, the commission president, said that the admission of the two countries was the last phase of integration in a European Union that has been stretched beyond capacity for now.

“The upcoming enlargement with Bulgaria and Romania will be the last stage of enlargement allowing the reunification of Europe,” he said. “We are not in a position to further integrate Europe without further institutional reform. There are limits to our absorption capacity.”

DOJ_NMG_0069494

He added that the European Union's moribund constitution, which proposed a streamlined voting system to accommodate an expanded membership, would have made further enlargement more manageable. But after its emphatic rejection last year in France and the Netherlands, Mr. Barroso said the group either had to revive the charter or make the needed changes another way.

His warning was echoed Monday by Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin of France, who cautioned that further expansion of the bloc — which currently has 25 member nations — risked making it unworkable.

"We need principles on common rules before we can contemplate further stages of enlargement," he said after meeting in Brussels with Mr. Barroso.

The call to freeze enlargement could affect efforts by Croatia, Serbia, Turkey, Bosnia, Montenegro, Macedonia and Albania to become members. Croatia could be the country most immediately affected. It has been pursuing political and economic changes with the aim of joining the European Union in 2009.

The statements on Monday reflected what had been called "expansion fatigue" since the union's enlargement in May 2004 from 15 countries to 25, with 470 million people. Skepticism about the benefits of expansion contributed to the "no" votes on the constitution last year in France and the Netherlands, where there was particular concern about admitting Turkey, with its largely Muslim population.

Enlargement has become a symbol of the European Union's remoteness from its people, with many Europeans expressing opposition to further expansion.

Some European countries, led by Britain and with the enthusiastic backing of the United States, have supported further expansion because the promise of European Union membership has accelerated steps like Turkey's revamping of its penal code and the arrest of accused war criminals in Croatia. But countries like France fear that further expansion will undermine their influence while making the bloc so unwieldy it will become paralyzed.

The tougher line on expansion will be reflected in the commission report on Tuesday about Romania and Bulgaria, which will warn of harsh penalties if the countries do not complete required steps, including tackling corruption and organized crime.

The report by the European Commission, the European Union's executive body, will serve as a recommendation on whether to admit the countries, but the ultimate decision rests with European Union member countries, which will decide before the end of the year.

The two countries hope that membership will help raise their per capita income, which is one-third the European Union average.

Where Gorillas And The Antelope Play (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

BAYANGA, Central African Republic

The first thing they tell you here is not to play with the gorillas or the elephants.

A young male elephant gored a young Italian woman here when he attempted to play with her. And if you creep too close to the gorillas, a 375-pound silverback will charge you and, if you're lucky, stop inches from you and slap the ground in rage.

But even if you can't play with the animals, you can ogle them — and there are few places in the world as good for that as this remote jungle where the Central African Republic, Cameroon and the Congo Republic come together. And now the three countries have joined forces to preserve this jungle by establishing adjoining national parks that cover an area the size of Rhode Island and Delaware combined.

It's part of a growing trend that deserves strong support from the West: poor countries seeking economic opportunities by protecting nature rather than pillaging it. The grandest and most unlikely of these experiments is this one, for the Central African Republic may be the single most wretched country in the world: life expectancy is 38, and every year it falls by another six months. One-fifth of children die by the age of 5. Outside the capital, government is only a rumor.

Yet while many national parks in Africa exist primarily on paper, this one is real. Game wardens patrol vigorously: they pursue poachers across international borders, and seized 70,000 snares last year alone.

This is the only place in the world to see western lowland gorillas (even more elusive than the mountain gorillas of Rwanda). Casey Parks, the student journalist traveling with me, and I spent two hours with 13 gorillas.

We stayed at least 30 feet away to avoid being charged, but there was one moment when our guide froze and whispered to us that a female was asking the silverback to charge us. Fortunately, the silverback adopted a typical husband's approach in dealing with a demanding wife: he pretended he didn't hear.

The World Wildlife Fund is nurturing this attempt to develop ecotourism. It has a team, including American student volunteers, hanging out with gorillas all day every day, habituating them so that tourists can see them.

DOJ_NMG_0069495

It's a delicate balance, for the tourists could bring diseases that would kill gorillas. It may also be more difficult for a silverback to entice females into his harem if humans are around. Yet if the gorillas can lure rich Westerners here, ecotourism could become a more sustainable economic pillar than slash-and-burn logging. For now, fewer than 1,000 foreigners visit the park each year.

Many Africans resent the parks, partly because they allocate vast resources to saving animals for rich foreigners to enjoy — in regions where humans routinely die for lack of a few dollars.

"That's where conservation got it wrong in the past," said Chloe Cipolletta, an Italian who has lived with the gorillas for the last nine years. It's crucial, she said, that conservation programs benefit people as well as animals, and so the WWF has hired 31 of the local Bayaka Pygmies as trackers and guides, and others earn money by showing tourists how to catch antelope with nets.

The first night I arrived here, crossing a river from Cameroon in a canoe and then jouncing over ruts to get to a Pygmy village, I was led to somebody I thought was a local chief — and then he stepped from the darkness and turned out to be a tall white man who greeted me in very American English. Louis Sarno, originally from New Jersey, explained that he once heard Pygmy music on the radio and was so entranced that he made a visit 20 years ago — and stayed.

Mr. Sarno married a local woman and learned the language. He endures bouts with malaria, goes on weeks-long hunting trips in the jungle with the others, and fits in remarkably well (except that he's a lousy spear hunter).

Now he has become a fierce advocate for the "forest people," as Pygmies often prefer to be called. Mr. Sarno notes that logging has benefited corrupt leaders while doing nothing for the villagers, and so he welcomes the ecotourism experiment as a last best hope for local people.

Africa can be a grim continent, and the news usually focuses on genocide, corruption and disease. But in the audacious dream to preserve this rain forest and the way of life of people in it, you see Africa's glory, fighting to survive.

The Silk Revolution (NYT)

By Ismail Wolff

The New York Times, September 26, 2006

AROUND 8 last Tuesday night, I was sitting in an Irish pub in the heart of Bangkok. Two friends and I were downing pints of Heineken when a familiar topic came up: How likely is a coup?

We almost felt embarrassed to talk about it. It was unlikely, said one friend, a journalist. I doubt it will happen, said the other, a defense analyst based in Jakarta. I concurred. Suddenly my phone beeped. I had a text message: "Coup under way — rumor." Tanks rolling through the streets of metropolitan Bangkok? Surely not.

My friends agreed. Rumors of a military coup against the government of Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, widely accused of corruption and abuse of power, had circulated for months, and none of us were about to be duped by a late-night text message.

Then there were more phone calls.

I asked the bartender to switch over from ESPN to Thailand's Channel 5, the TV station run by the military. It wasn't showing the normal evening programming. Instead, it ran video of the revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej helping farmers to sow rice and performing other benevolent acts, accompanied by crackly marching music and patriotic songs about the people's love for their nation and monarch.

This, I knew from reading about the 17 previous coups here over the past 60 years, was a telltale sign of a military takeover.

Yet I was still skeptical. As everyone had been saying over the past year, the days of coups were over. Thailand had moved on. It had become a lighthouse for democracy in the region, and its political system was now strong enough to deal with widespread social divisions. As others gathered around the television, watching in disbelief, it seemed that the country's past had just caught up with it.

Suddenly, all the public TV stations, by now under the direction of the military, ran a statement from the army and police commanders. They had "taken control of the situation in Bangkok" and politely asked for the public's cooperation.

"We apologize for any inconvenience," it signed off. Typical Thai politeness, I thought. Is this really what a coup feels like?

My shock, however, was not shared by the rest of the country.

As journalists sprang into action, Bangkok shut down. It happened like clockwork, almost as if a director yelled "Cut!" and a whole city of six million packed up the set and went home.

Street vendors casually closed up their food carts and wheeled them off to the shadows. Bustling streets slowly emptied as bars and restaurants shut up shop early under orders from the new junta. No signs of panic anywhere.

DOJ_NMG_0069496

My friends and I heard that tanks had surrounded the Thai Parliament and so hopped in a three-wheeled tuk-tuk, whose driver charged us about 10 times the normal rate.

At the Parliament building, hundreds of people had surrounded the tanks, chatting and taking photos in the spattering rain. No one seemed dismayed to see armored vehicles rolling through the capital. “This is a good day for our country,” I heard repeatedly.

Many people had been drained by the months of a high-stakes political battle between Mr. Thaksin and his opponents, which had been characterized by huge street protests, random bombings and the posturing over who had the endorsement of the king.

Thais were becoming increasingly divided and weary, without a sitting Parliament since an election six months ago that had been boycotted by the opposition and voided by the courts. They just wanted it to end, even if that meant the military ousting their elected leader, imposing martial law and suspending the nine-year-old Constitution.

As the tanks and troops took up positions across Bangkok the next morning, people came out to show their support for the soldiers, giving them flowers and welcoming them to their neighborhoods. The king also gave his blessing to the new military governing council, which has promised to install a civilian prime minister next week.

The message that Thais kept trying to tell me was that Thai democracy should not be compared to any other country’s.

“Our country will be better for this,” a close friend said to me as we sat smoking cigarettes and staring at troops on the corner by his house. “Today is a better day than yesterday. You may not understand, and may never will, but we needed to create a fresh start, and that is what has happened.”

That attitude prevails nearly a week after the coup. Early yesterday evening, I went to a protest at Thammasat University, where 30 years ago, on Oct. 6, 1976, the military and its henchmen massacred dozens of students at a pro-democracy demonstration, burning many alive, hanging others from trees and mutilating their bodies in front of a large crowd.

Yesterday, though, the mood was calm and there were no soldiers to be seen, even as speakers condemned the new junta’s restrictions on civic and political rights, including holding protests like this one.

But many of the students who stopped to listen as they passed by still said that they believed that the coup was the only way out of a political imbroglio. Nearly everyone I spoke to remained “sabaay jai,” or comfortable at heart with the military takeover. At least on the outside.

As I headed home from the protest, I got caught in a torrential monsoon downpour. I sought shelter with some soldiers guarding a bridge that crosses the Chao Phraya River.

“Were you surprised when you were ordered onto the streets of Bangkok last week?” I asked one of the young soldiers.

“No, it’s what we’re here for,” he told me, smiling. “If the people didn’t want us, then they wouldn’t bring us flowers and food,” he said as he pointed to the large pot of khao tom, or rice soup, being served up for dinner.

As the rain battered down from the heavens and I sat under the canvas sharing khao tom and watching television with the smiling soldiers, I wondered whether they really would have shot someone if they were ordered to. I’m sure they would have. After all, that’s what they’re here to do.

DOJ_NMG_0069497

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, September 26, 2006 8:20 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	FW: Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, September 26, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060926.pdf; agnb060926.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Compromise Plan Could Broaden Definition Of Unlawful Combatants 3
Republican Leaders Reach Tentative Deal On Domestic Surveillance Legislation 4
US, EU Close To Agreement On Passenger Data 4
FBI Confirms Legality Of Contributions To Michigan Muslim Charity 4
Pakistani Sentenced To 18 Years In Prison For Al Qaeda Missile Plot 5
EU Panel Expresses Doubts Over US Financial Transaction Monitoring 5
Guantanamo Authorities Strive To Teach Guards About Ramadan 5
Wickham Says Administration Has Double Standard On Extradition 5

Patriot Act:

Internet Consultant Suing DOJ, FBI Over NSL Gag Order 5

Homeland Response:

Administration Awards Nearly $400 Million In Security Grants 6
TSA Will Allow Some Liquid Gels And Aerosols On Airplanes 6
FBI Says 2001 Anthrax Was Not Specially Treated 7
Muslim Scholar Denied Visa To Enter US 7

War News:

Democrats Say Leaked NIE Proves Bush's Iraq Policy Is Flawed 7
Top Al Qaeda Figure Who Escaped From Afghan Prison Killed In Iraq 9
Former Generals Blast Rumsfeld At Democrats' Hearing 10
Townsend Defends Cheney's Assertions On Iraq 11
Pentagon Extends 3,800 Soldiers' Iraq Tours 11
US Soldiers Targeted By Militants From Within Sadr City 13
Kurds Seize Police Station Slated To Be Handed Over To Sunni Commander 13
Saddam Once Again Removed From Court 13
Rice's Use Of Civil Rights Movement As Analogy For Iraq War Derided 14
Marines Accused Of Murdering Iraqi Civilian Will Not Face Death Penalty 14
Karzai Accuses Musharraf Of Tolerating Presence Of Terrorists 14
Afghan Women's Rights Activist Assassinated 14

DOJ:

Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Receives DOJ Service Award 14

Corporate Scandals:

H-P Urged To Overhaul Its Board 15
Sentencing Of Ex-Homestore CEO Delayed 16
Former Hedge Fund Manager Charged With Insider Trading 16
Scrushy Lawyers Say Jurors Discussed Case In E-Mails 16
Ebbers To Report To Federal Prison Today 17
Fastow To Help Prosecutors Pursue Bankers In Enron Case 17
FBI Cracking Down On Options Fraud 17
Fleming Cos. Ordered To Pay $3 Million In Claims, Interest And Attorney Fees 17
Judge Delays Sale Of Segal Estate 18
SEC Database To Undergo $54 Million Upgrade 18
Firms Ousting CEOs At Record Pace 18
WPost Says Amaranth Shows Danger And Safety Of Hedge Funds 18

Criminal Law:

"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Pleads Guilty To Record-Keeping Violations 18
Judge Backs FBI Search Of Coca-Cola Executive's Home 19
World Gaming Officials Resign Amid Widening Online Gambling Probe 19
US Fails To Win Convictions In Pellicano-Related Perjury Trial 19

Gotti's Mother Lashes Out At Prosecutor As Jurors Continue Deliberations 20
Three Arrested In Massachusetts Mob Gambling Investigation 20
Washington State Inmate Charged With Threatening Judges 20
Miller Seeks Criminal Probe Of Reading Program 20
US Indicts Former GUEA Directors With Fraud, Tax Violations 21
Jurors In Katrina Bus Case Will Not Hear About Deadly Blaze 21
Sister Of Connecticut Drug Lord Charged With Lying About 1996 Murder 21
Unfamiliarity With Legal Principles Common In New York's Justice Courts 21
Virginia Police Chief Seeks To Protect Kids From Internet Predators 22

Civil Law:

DOJ Appeals Order To Release NRO Budget Documents ... 22
Judge Rules Suit Over "Light" Cigarettes Can Proceed 22
Insurance Adjuster Seeks To Silence Whistleblowing Sisters 24
AOL Sued Over Release Of Search Data 24

Civil Rights:

FBI Investigating Possible Arizona Hate Crime 24
Veteran ACLU Supporters Seek Ouster Of Group's Leadership 24
Republicans, Democrats At Odds Over Voter ID Laws 24
Spellings Letter Encourages Public School Teachers To Celebrate Christmas 25
Tierney Criticizes "Pre-Ordained Conclusion" Of NAS Report On Discrimination In Sciences 25

Antitrust:

Consumer Groups Urge Limits On Proposed AT&T - BellSouth Merger 25
Legislative Obstacles Remain For Texas Airfield Bill 25
Brokers Lining Up As Partners To Traditional Players 26
IBM To Publish Patent Filings Online 26
United Airlines Retains Bank To Chart Merger Strategy 26
Loudeye Gets Antitrust Nod For Nokia Buy 26
EU Ends Antitrust Immunity For Shippers 26

Environment:

Judge Blocks Sale Of Alaska Oil And Gas Leases 27
Three Maryland E-Coli Cases Not Linked To Bad Spinach .. 27
Government Climatologists Warn Of Continuing Global Warming 27
EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program To Reorganize 27
Doctoral Student Examines Skunks' Effect On Martha's Vineyard's Endangered Birds 28
LATimes Says Bush Must Heed Law On Roadless Forest Policy 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Norte Valle Ring Member Extradited To US 28
Drug Seizures Along US-Mexico Border Reach Record Amounts 28
Federal Anti-Meth Measure To Take Effect 28
US Gives Tajikistan Boats, Equipment To Combat Drug Trafficking 29
NYTimes Blasts House "Gun Decontrol Measure." 29

Immigration:

House, Senate Negotiators Agree On New Funds To Secure Border 29

Congress-Administration:

DOJ Support For 9th Circuit Split Seen As Possible Sea Change 30
WSJournal Defends FREE Judiciary Seminars 30
Roberts, Alito To Stay In Cert Pool This Term 30
Lawmakers Urge Creation Of Food Safety Agency 31
Bloggers To Join Bush For Signing Of Spending Database Law 31
Democrats Hope To Use Majority To Force US Withdrawal From Iraq 31
GOP House Leaders Indecisive On Date For Leadership Elections 32
CMS Names New Acting Director 32
Federal Agencies Hiring Contractors In Times Of Crisis 32
Report Suggests Federal Government Tighten Hiring Procedures 33
Critics Say Capitol Visitor Center Has Become Boondoggle .. 33

Other News:

Data On Home Prices Add To Evidence Of Cooling Real Estate Market 33
Crude Oil Prices Rise Sharply After Dipping Below $60 34
Rice Calls Clinton's Statements On Bush And Bin Laden "Flatly False." 34
Both Parties Seek Edge On Issues In Congress As Midterm Elections Loom 35
Congressional Republicans Not Running From Bush's Fundraising 36
Snow To Raise Funds For GOP Candidates 38
House GOP Leaders, Rove To Press Lobbyists For Funds ... 38

DOJ_NMG_0069500

Control Of House May Not Be Settled In November 38
Landscape Of Battle For Senate Shifting 38
Democrats Hope To Be Competitive In Western States 39
House GOP Boosts Contribution Levy 39
Blue Dogs' PAC Raises $1 Million For First Time 39
Former Allen Acquaintances Say He Used Racist Slurs In 1970s And '80s 39
Green Party Candidate Will Be Removed From Pennsylvania Senate Ballot 40
Lieberman Calls For Expediting US Training Of Iraqi Forces41
Ehrlich Donor A Major Backer Of Controversial Road Project41
Campaigns Rely On "Microtargeting" To Reach Voters 41
Panel Recommends Course To Affordable Healthcare 41
Obama's Household Income Soars In First Year In Senate ... 41
Elizabeth Edwards' Book Focuses On Tragedy Of Son's Death 42
Judge Delays Ruling On Lawsuit Against Clintons 42
Superdome's Return Seen As Symbol Of Hope For New Orleans 42
EU, Iran Said To Be "Close" To Enrichment Suspension Deal 42
Armitage Sees "Even Chance" Of North Korean Nuclear Test This Year 43
Musharraf Memoir Discusses Khan's Activities 43
Olmert, Senior Saudi Official Said To Have Met 43
Hamas, Fatah Call Off Talks On Unity Government 44
Rice Says UNIFIL Has "Robust Mandate" To Act 44
Bush Expected To Sign Darfur Sanctions Bill 45
Abe Will Become Japanese Premier Today 45
Hu Removes Scandal-Tainted Shanghai Leader 45
Pope Meets With Representatives Of Muslim Nations 45
Somali City Turns Violent After Islamist Forces Move In 45
Indonesian Christians Warily Watching For Response To Bali Bombers 46
Bolton Critical Of Venezuelan Foreign Minister's Airport Complaint 46
EC Chief Says Bulgaria, Romania Will Be Last Two New EU Entrants For Now 46
Kristof Examines Massive New African Park Plan 46
Bangkok Writer Recounts Coup 46

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 46

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 47

TERRORISM NEWS:

Compromise Plan Could Broaden Definition Of Unlawful Combatants. The Washington Post (9/26, Smith, 748K) reports on its front page that government sources say GOP lawmakers and the White House "agreed over the weekend to alter new legislation on military commissions to allow the United States to detain and try a wider range of foreign nationals than an earlier version of the bill permitted." Congress "has not yet expressed its view on who is an unlawful combatant, and the Supreme Court has not ruled directly on the matter," and human rights advocates are concerned that the "language in the new provision would be a precedent-setting congressional endorsement for the indefinite detention of anyone who, as the bill states, 'has engaged in hostilities or who has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States' or its military allies." The definition "applies to foreigners living inside or outside" the US, "and does not rule out the possibility of designating a U.S. citizen as an unlawful combatant."

Specter Opposes Stripping Courts Of Jurisdiction. The AP (9/25, Kellman) reports Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter is "leading the charge" against a provision in the compromise plan that would "strip federal courts of jurisdiction over cases in which detainees have not been charged with war crimes." Specter and other opponents say it would "deny terrorism suspects the ability to challenge their detainment, a right afforded defendants in military and criminal courts." USA Today (9/26, 4A, Kiely, Jackson, 2.27M) says Specter's opposition could complicate efforts to win congressional approval for the compromise.

Democrats In "Awkward Position" Due To Intelligence Briefing Secrecy. The Hill (9/26, Tiron) reports some senior congressional Democrats "find themselves in an awkward position" in the debate over detainees, "unable to openly criticize some of the Bush administration's policies" because they were sworn to secrecy after receiving intelligence briefings. House Intelligence ranking Democrat

DOJ_NMG_0069501

Jane Harman says that "makes it difficult to attempt to change the clandestine policies or conduct proper oversight." Harman said, "It is very hard to deal with an incomplete deck of cards."

WPost Calls Court-Stripping "A Terrible Idea." The Washington Post (9/26, A20, 748K) editorializes, "The compromise bill strips the courts of any jurisdiction to hear cases -- including those cases already pending -- concerning detainee treatment. … This is not the first time Congress has sought to limit judicial supervision of detentions in the war on terrorism. After the Supreme Court's assertion of jurisdiction over Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, in 2004 triggered a series of lawsuits, Congress moved to force their dismissal as part of the Detainee Treatment Act. The court found that the act did not apply to pending cases, leaving the lower courts unable to hear new cases but with jurisdiction over those already filed. The new measure would complete the job, removing jurisdiction over the remaining cases. … This is a terrible idea."

Republican Leaders Reach Tentative Deal On Domestic Surveillance Legislation. The New York Times (9/26, Lichtblau) reports, "Republican leaders said Monday that they had reached a tentative agreement to garner political support for legislation on domestic surveillance, in part by sidestepping the question of whether the president has the constitutional authority to order wiretapping without a court order." The Times continues, "There was wide disagreement about the plan's impact. Supporters billed the most recent version as a way of requiring a court order for most domestic wiretaps. But civil rights advocates and even some administration officials suggested that it would maintain the status quo in allowing the continuation of wiretapping without warrants under a program approved by President Bush. … Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who leads the Judiciary Committee, said that in recent negotiations, the White House had agreed to delete language from his bill that critics said would have implicitly acknowledged the president's constitutional authority to order wiretapping without a warrant." The Times adds, "Three Republican senators — Larry E. Craig of Idaho, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska — had raised concerns about this and other aspects of the Specter bill, which would submit the wiretapping program to a secret court to rule on its constitutionality. With the changes, they said they could support the legislation, and Mr. Specter predicted he would have enough Senate votes to gain passage. … The three said the new plan would protect 'the rights afforded to citizens in the Constitution,' in part by requiring that the administration get a court order if it wanted to listen to conversations of an American citizen or others defined as 'U.S. persons." In a statement, they said the new plan would require that "in order to conduct electronic surveillance of a U.S. person, a court-ordered warrant is necessary.' … Some lawmakers and civil rights advocates said they believed that the three senators had mischaracterized or misinterpreted what they had agreed to and that the White House was retaining the right to order wiretaps without a warrant." The Times notes, "The program approved by Mr. Bush 'does allow for the interception without court order of international communications where one end is within the United States, and this agreement would provide this authority and would establish a process for moving to individualized court orders with respect to individuals within the United States,' said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. He declined to elaborate." The Washington Post (9/26, A3, Weisman, 748K) reports the changes "have won the support of three balking Senate Republicans," Larry Craig, Lisa Murkowski, and John Sununu, "improving the chances that a bill expanding the Bush administration's surveillance authority will pass Congress this week." The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Simon, Schmitt, 918K) carries a similar report.

US, EU Close To Agreement On Passenger Data. The Financial Times (9/26, Bounds, Cameron) reports, "The US and European Union are close to a deal for sharing airline passenger information that would avert disruption to the world's busiest air traffic routes. Officials from both sides of the Atlantic have confirmed that a new anti-terrorism agreement is almost certain to be signed on Thursday, two days before the current regime expires." A "US official" said, "This is too big to fail. … We have made a lot of progress over the last few days."

FBI Confirms Legality Of Contributions To Michigan Muslim Charity. The Detroit News (9/26, Krupa) reports, "Contributions to an Islamic charity in Southfield remain legal despite an FBI raid on Sept. 18, according to federal officials. The Life for Relief and Development has not been designated by the federal government as an organization that provides support for terrorists, according to Bob Beeckman, a spokesman for the FBI in Detroit. … 'The search warrant is based on criminal statutes, and I can't go any farther,' Beeckman said. Local Muslim leaders said that the information that donations remain legal will help assuage rampant concerns in their community, at the beginning of the holy month of Ramadan, when Muslims are required to make charitable donations."

DOJ_NMG_0069502

Pakistani Sentenced To 18 Years In Prison For Al Qaeda Missile Plot. The AP (9/26) reports, "A Pakistani man was sentenced Monday to more than 18 years in prison for conspiring with an Indian-born U.S. citizen to obtain and sell Stinger anti-aircraft missiles to the Taliban and al-Qaida." Syed Mustajab Shah "admitted that he tried to sell five tons of hashish and a half-ton of heroin in exchange for cash and four shoulder-fired Stinger missiles, which he and the other defendants intended to sell to members of the Taliban. … Shah knew at the time that the Taliban was the same as al-Qaida, prosecutors said." The AP notes Shah and co-defendants Ilyas Ali and Muhamed Abid Afridi "were arrested…by police in Hong Kong who received a tip from the FBI. The three were secretly videotaped in meetings days earlier with undercover FBI agents at a Hong Kong hotel."

EU Panel Expresses Doubts Over US Financial Transaction Monitoring. The New York Times (9/26, Lichtblau, 1.21M) reports an EU panel "has serious doubts about the legality of a Bush administration program that monitors international financial transactions," according to its German leader. The panel "plans to recommend tighter controls to prevent privacy abuses." The panel "will not call for the program to be stopped," but it is "expected to recommend that additional safeguards be put in place" to check how financial records are shared with US intelligence.

Guantanamo Authorities Strive To Teach Guards About Ramadan. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Connell, Lopez, 918K) reports that with the beginning of Ramadan, Guantanamo Bay authorities "have stepped up efforts to teach guards about the religious observance, amid signs that radical strains of Islam are becoming a potent organizing tool at the facility." Some military officials "say it may have been a tactical mistake to stop providing Muslim chaplains. Many of the detainees are poorly educated and look up to those who can read and cite Quranic verses, according to former troops who worked inside the camps. This has opened the way for radical interpretations by religious leaders on the cellblocks and helped justify such actions as suicides, according to personnel who served at the camp."

Wickham Says Administration Has Double Standard On Extradition. In his USA Today (9/26, 11A, 2.27M) column, DeWayne Wickham contrasts the Bush Administration's sending of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen of Syrian descent, to Syria, where "the Bush administration had good reason to know he would be brutalized," with its refusal to send Luis Posada Carriles back to Venezuela. Wickham says, "The Bush administration has contradictory standards -- one for people who are thought to be enemies of this country, such as Arar, and another for Posada, an accused terrorist, who is the enemy of its enemies."

PATRIOT ACT:

Internet Consultant Suing DOJ, FBI Over NSL Gag Order. The New York Times (9/26, Hartocollis, 1.21M) reports, "Federal District Court in Manhattan has made public an affidavit from a plaintiff whose identity cannot be revealed. In the affidavit, he says he has to lie to those close to him to preserve the secrecy of a national security investigation that he believes is morally questionable. … He describes himself as the former president of an Internet access and consulting business. Some time ago (the government will not allow him to say when), he received a so-called national security letter from the F.B.I., asking him to provide information about one of his clients in connection with 'international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities.' The letter also said he was prohibited from talking with anyone about the investigation." The Times notes, "Mr. Doe said he resisted the government's demand because he did not want to violate the privacy of his clients. In April 2004, represented by the American Civil Liberties Union, he filed a lawsuit against the attorney general, John Ashcroft, and Robert S. Mueller, the director of the F.B.I."

DOJ_NMG_0069503

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Awards Nearly $400 Million In Security Grants. The AP (9/26, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration doled out nearly $400 million Monday to help protect seaports, commuter trains and other transit systems from terrorists, boosting money to high-risk cities that saw funding cuts earlier this year. Major winners included New York City, which won $79.5 million to secure its port, subways, bus and rail systems -- up from $50 million in 2005." The AP adds, "Losing cities that got no money for 2006 after being on the Homeland Security Department funding list last year included Memphis, Tenn., and Tampa, Fla., which lost funds for ports."

USA Today (9/26, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "More than three months after the department caused an uproar by cutting funds by 40% in another grant program to New York City and Washington, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said his department is reworking the way it distributes such grants. 'You're never going to make everybody happy,' he said. 'There's never enough money.'" Chertoff "said the cuts in June came because Congress shrank the amount of grants. He said risk and consequence always would be the main factors the department uses in handing out federal anti-terrorism money." Port security "accounted for $168 million of the money distributed Monday to 51 cities." The Washington Post (9/26, A3, Hsu, 748K) notes American Public Transportation Association spokeswoman Virginia Miller "said the $13 million is helpful, but the industry has identified $6 billion in security needs."

The New York Times/AP (9/26) reports, "Money to protect the perimeters of New York and New Jersey's ports will be increased to $25.7 million, from $6.6 million." Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg "said that he was gratified federal officials 'are recognizing the risks here and giving us more money.'"

TSA Will Allow Some Liquid Gels And Aerosols On Airplanes. ABC World News (9/25, story 5, 0:30, Gibson) reported, "The government…announced new rules for what airline passengers can bring in their carry-on bags and what they can take on planes. A sweeping ban on liquids and gels was put into effect last month. when a terror plot in Britain was uncovered." But "starting tomorrow, the Transportation Security Administration will allow travel-size toiletries on planes that fit in one small, clear plastic bag as well as drinks, if they are bought in the secure area of the airport."

The AP (9/26, Miller) reports Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley said yesterday "the FBI and other laboratories tested a variety of explosives and found that tiny amounts of substances -- so small they fit into a quart-size plastic bag -- can't blow up an airliner, Hawley said at a news conference at Reagan National Airport."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some will say this is more confusion in the air. Some will say it's a victory for common sense." NBC (Costello) added that " while airline security has improved dramatically since 9/11, the TSA still doesn't have the technology in place to screen every bag for liquid explosives. A gaping hole, say security experts, in the nation's security blanket." Rick Haan, former FBI explosives expert: "The technology is not there to detect liquid explosives, these are actually precursor chemicals that would be mixed into an explosive mixture onboard the aircraft." NBC added, "Several companies are working to develop the technology, but in the meantime, the TSA's convinced the amounts liquids and gels it's allowing onboard now are too small to pose a risk."

CBS Evening News (9/25, story 6, 2:50, Orr reported, "Critics…say the Transportation Security Administration is years late in developing high-tech scanners…which can tell the difference between a liquid explosive and a bottle of water." CBS added that "the ban on large volumes of carry-on liquids will likely remain in place through the ends of the year. At least with these tweaks…arriving passengers will no longer have to make their first stop a drugstore."

The New York Times (9/26, Lipton, 1.21M) reports Hawley "said the agency intended to test new equipment, including a machine that can evaluate bottles to see whether a liquid inside is explosive, or a machine similar to a CAT scan that can more reliably evaluate carry-on bags to see whether they might have bombs." The problem, he said, is "ensuring that the equipment will work as promised by the manufacturers, Mr. Hawley said. 'We don't want to be in the position of, out of the urgent need to do this, we essentially waste the taxpayers' money,' he said. 'We want to take our time to do it right.'"

USA Today (9/26, Frank, 2.27M) reports A.J. Castilla, "a screener at Boston's Logan International Airport and spokesman for a screeners union, said the new policy "is more confusing and certainly will add to the lines during the holidays." 'We're just adding another level of screening to a screening process that was simple,' Castilla said."

DOJ_NMG_0069504

The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Neuman, Mohammed, 918K) says "the changes were hailed by passengers and by the airline industry." Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (9/26, Meckler, 2.03M) reports "the US decision was welcomed not only by travelers but by airlines and airports, whose operations were hampered by the stricter rules. Airport vendors lost considerable revenue as customers stopped buying drinks and, at duty-free shops, bottles of perfume and liquor that were banned from the planes. And airlines had to contend with the sharp increase in checked bags."

The Washington Times (9/26, Hudson, 88K) and Washington Post (9/26, A1, Wilber, 748K) run similar reports. USA Today (9/26, Frank, 2.27M) also runs a Q&A section detailing the new policy,

Former DHS IG Opposes Lifting Ban. On USA Today (9/26, 2.27M), Clark Kent Ervin, director of the Aspen Institute's homeland security initiative and former inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security, writes that "it would be one thing if TSA had developed an effective counter-technology in the ensuing weeks, but it has not done so. Instead, it says that it has determined that small quantities of liquids and gels pose no harm, and that drinks purchased in the "sterile" areas of airports past the screening checkpoints are likewise harmless." He adds, "I am skeptical that TSA has definitively determined that small quantities of liquids and gels pose no threat. Given its track record, it is far likelier that TSA has simply determined that small quantities pose minimal threats. The problem with that is I would have said that small things such as box cutters probably could not be used to kill 3,000 people, and yet, that's what the 9/11 hijackers did."

FBI Says 2001 Anthrax Was Not Specially Treated. The New York Times (9/26, Broad, 1.21M) reports, "Seeking to clear up public confusion, an F.B.I. official has reiterated the bureau's judgment that the anthrax in the letter attacks five years ago bore no special coatings to increase its deadliness and no hallmarks of a military weapon." The statement "contradicts an array of assessments over the years," in which a "variety of public and private experts proclaimed the deadly spores to have been specially treated to enhance their ability to float in the air and reach deep into human lungs, where they could germinate and kill their host. … But the bureau official, Douglas J. Beecher, a scientist at the F.B.I. Laboratory in Quantico, Va., disputed such claims as misguided in a recent journal article."

Muslim Scholar Denied Visa To Enter US. The AP (9/25, Neumeister) reported Tariq Ramadan, "a prominent Muslim scholar" and Swiss citizen "was denied a temporary business and tourism visa Thursday 'based solely on his actions, which constituted providing material support to a terrorist organization,' said Janelle Hironimus, a State Department spokeswoman." However, the American Civil Liberties Union, which says Ramadan "was being excluded because he donated $765 to French and Swiss organizations that provide humanitarian aid to Palestinians," argued that the decision "amounts to censorship. 'This case is really about speech,' said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU lawyer. 'The government is using the immigration laws as a means of silencing and stigmatizing a prominent cleric.'"

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Say Leaked NIE Proves Bush's Iraq Policy Is Flawed. NBC Nightly News (9/25, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It is a report from the very top of US intelligence and it is meant for the boss -- the President and the very top of our government. The report, called the National Intelligence Estimate, or the NIE, has been leaked to the press. That is bad news for the Bush Administration because of the report's conclusion -- that the war in Iraq has created a new generation of Islamic radicals and the overall terrorist threat is now worse because this war has amounted to a huge recruiting tool for those who would do us harm." NBC added, "For weeks the President has successfully kept public attention on terrorism rather than the war in Iraq. Today, Democrats tried to change that by seizing on intelligence findings that the Iraq war has made the terror threat worse. Mr. Bush got the blame."

ABC World News (9/25, story 3, 1:55, Gibson) reported, "There was no question that this report would cause a political firestorm because it really goes right to the heart of the debate in this country. The President has been arguing for months that fighting terrorists in Iraq has made Americans safer at home. … But the National Intelligence Estimate says the war has created a rallying cry for terrorists, a point Democrats seized on today."

DOJ_NMG_0069505

NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "These conclusions are not a surprise. This is what we've been hearing from the CIA Director and from the Director of National Intelligence, John Negroponte and in their recent speeches. … Some of the other conclusions are interesting. The Internet has helped spread Jihadist ideology. Cyberspace is now a haven for these operatives and they spread beyond their original bases in places like Afghanistan and they're not centrally controlled by Osama bin Laden but they're self-generating cells who are inspired by bin Laden. We've known some of these things but when it comes to Iraq, they don't pull their punches. In the short term the war has become a breeding ground and has made things worse, not better."

The Washington Post (9/26, A3, Abramowitz, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Democratic lawmakers yesterday seized on elements of a new classified intelligence assessment as validation of their long-standing position that the Iraq war has been a distraction from the broader war against terrorists, seeing the new study as an opportunity to undermine President Bush's determined offensive to turn terrorism to political advantage in the midterm elections. … After weeks in which White House officials believed they had partly succeeded in reframing the elections around terrorism, rather than Iraq, the new report threatened to reverse those gains."

The Washington Times (9/26, Fagan, 88K) reports Democrats "said their long-standing criticisms of the administration are validated by a leaked intelligence assessment that reportedly found the Iraq war has helped spur more Islamic radicals. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said April's National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), as described Sunday by the New York Times and The Washington Post, states 'what many of us have been saying for months' about U.S. efforts in Iraq. … Democrats said the administration should make the report public but Carl Kropf, a spokesman for Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, said in an e-mail message that 'there is no indication that this NIE will be declassified.'"

Bartlett Says Leaked Portion Of NIE Does Not Provide A Full Picture. CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Malveaux) reported, "I talked to the counselor to the President, Dan Bartlett, earlier today who made a couple of important points. First of all, he says that this leaked portion of the NIE portion is just. It's a leaked portion. It does not give the full picture and does not give the full story. … So I asked him, of course, why not just declassify this NIE document? It has been done in the past when the lead up to the Iraq war and making the case for Iraq, weapons of mass destruction, most recently the president talking about his secret CIA detainee program and Bartlett said he did not believe that this rises to the occasion of declassifying that material."

Roberts Seeks Declassification Of NIE. The New York Times (9/26, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports Senators Pat Roberts and Jay Rockefeller, the top Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, "called on Monday for the White House to declassify the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism that was produced in April. … 'I think the administration should declassify this document so the American people can see the material for themselves and come to their own conclusions,' Mr. Roberts said in a statement. Mr. Roberts and Mr. Rockefeller said the estimate should be stripped of sensitive material before being released." However, the Times adds that White House officials "said making the information public would only help terrorists gain a better understanding of how much the United States knows of their operations. 'What we don't want to do is tell them what we know so they know how to operate around that,' Frances Townsend, the White House domestic security adviser, said in an interview on CNN." Counselor to the president, Dan Bartlett, "told CNN on Monday that releasing the report would have a chilling effect on the intelligence analysts 'who are trying to give very candid advice or very candid estimates.'"

The AP (9/26, Shrader) reports Roberts "said the public discussion has given the 'false impression' that the National Intelligence Estimate focuses exclusively on Iraq and terrorism. 'That is not true,' Roberts said, noting that the committee has had the report since April. 'This NIE examines global terrorism in its totality.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Blitzer) reported that "some Democrats are finding aid and comfort in the classified intelligence estimate of the terror threat to the United States. Intelligence and counter-terrorism officials say the report concludes the war in Iraq is giving fuel to Islamic extremism and al Qaeda wannabes. Now some Democrats and Republicans are feuding over the leaked part of the report, and whether it distorts the truth or proves the Iraq war was a failure. And it's all playing out only six weeks before Election Day."

Townsend Makes Case For Keeping NIE Classified. President Bush's Homeland Security Adviser Fran Townsend was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/25) why the

DOJ_NMG_0069506

Administration will not declassify the NIE "so the American public will be able to read it in terms of its full context." Townsend said, "Because the problem…is, as usual, with classified documents, the reason they're classified is so we don't share what our understanding is and what our beliefs are about their motives and their capability. What we don't want to do is tell them what we know so they know how to operate around that. And so the leaking of classified documents is always very dangerous and it's particularly dangerous in this case." Townsend added that "having gone through this document, it's a difficult thing to do when you're talking about an assessment of global trends and the development of the enemy."

Townsend made the same case on MSNBC's Hardball (9/25), saying that "you've got a paragraph that's been leaked out of a nine-page summary and a more-than-35-page report that looks at global trends in terrorism. It talks about the jihad in Iraq as being one of the propaganda tools of the jihadists as a method of recruiting, as a method of raising money – that's -- but it's one. There's many historical grievances that they use, and this is one piece." Townsend added, "I don't think there's any question that it's been selectively leaked."

Townsend was also the guest at Monday's Christian Science Monitor (9/26, Cook, 58K) "Monitor Breakfast." The "self-described worrier…quipped, 'If we were going to go through the long list of things that bother me and that I worry about, we would be here for lunch.'" The Monitor says the "youthful and outgoing Townsend is a rarity in Washington -- someone who worked in the top reaches of both the Clinton and the Bush administrations. President George Bush has entrusted her with a crucial portfolio. During Bill Clinton's presidency, Townsend rose through a series of increasingly influential Justice Department positions." Discussing the leaked NIE that said the Iraq war has increased the problem of terrorism, Townsend said, "It is not clear to me that the headline we saw…that America is less safe, is actually contained in the NIE. The statements that were leaked, once again it was classified information, and that is always damaging. And secondly, what I would say…is most damaging, frankly, as the director of national intelligence said yesterday, [is that] it is taken out of context."

Hunter Says NIE Offers An Opinion, Not Evidence. Rep. Duncan Hunter said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/25), "What you're getting from the NIE is not evidence. What you're getting is an opinion. And I disagree with the opinion and I'll tell you why. When we got hit on 9/11, the last two American military operations, major operations had been to save Muslim nations. That was Kuwait and of course Bosnia. So we went in and we saved Muslim nations. And the reward was we got struck on 9/11. So the idea that we've somehow created the enemy, that but for our aggressiveness, guys like al-Zarqawi would not be targeting the United States, that doesn't make any sense."

Talabani Disagrees With NIE's Conclusions. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/25) for his opinions on the NIE. Talabani said, "I don't agree with this. I don't agree at all. I think the liberation of Iraq reduced the danger of terrorism on the United States of America because all terrorist groups are now concentrating on Iraq, focusing in Iraq, sending their troops to Iraq, busy with Iraq; otherwise they're concentrating their efforts against the United States of America."

NIE's Conclusions Questioned. In his monthly column for the Washington Post (9/26, A21, 748K) Robert Kagan writes, "It's too bad we won't get to see the full National Intelligence Estimate on 'Trends in Global Terrorism' selectively leaked to The Post and the New York Times last week. The Times headline read 'Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat.' But there were no quotations from the NIE itself, so all we have are journalists' characterizations of anonymous comments by government officials, whose motives and reliability we can't judge, about intelligence assessments whose logic and argument, as well as factual basis, we have no way of knowing or gauging. Based on the press coverage alone, the NIE's judgment seems both impressionistic and imprecise."

WSJournal Urges Bush To Declassify NIE. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes, "It's impossible to know how true this report is, of course, since the NIE itself hasn't been leaked. The reports are based on what sources claim the NIE says, but we don't know who those sources are and what motivations they might have. Since their spin coincides rather conveniently with the argument made by Democratic critics of the war, and since this leak has also conveniently sprung in high campaign season, wise readers will be skeptical. … So here's our suggestion for President Bush: Declassify the entire NIE."

Top Al Qaeda Figure Who Escaped From Afghan Prison Killed In Iraq. CBS Evening News (9/25, story 4, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "British troops killed a top al Qaeda terrorist who was living in Basra in southern Iraq. … He was once thought to head up al Qaeda's operations in southeast Asia." The New York Times (9/26, Tavernise, 1.21M) says Omar al-Faruq was an Iraqi "senior operative of Al Qaeda who engineered a brazen escape from a high-security American prison in Afghanistan last year." He "was killed Monday in a predawn raid by British soldiers in a quiet, wealthy neighborhood in southern Iraq, an American official and an official in Basra said. About 250 soldiers wearing night-vision goggles and carrying specially equipped rifles stormed a house in the Junainah neighborhood of Basra, intending to capture the operative. … They were fired upon as they entered, and shot back, killing Mr. Faruq." A British military spokesman "declined to say whether he was the same man who had escaped from the American military detention center in Bagram, Afghanistan, in July 2005. An American official in Washington and an official in Basra, neither of whom was authorized to speak publicly on the subject, said Mr. Faruq was the same man." The Times notes, "At the time of his arrest, in Jakarta, Indonesia, in June 2002, Mr. Faruq was described as one of the most important Qaeda figures ever captured by the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0069507

The AP (9/26, Quinn) reports Farouq "and three other al-Qaida suspects escaped from Bagram, in central Afghanistan, in July 2005, but the Pentagon waited until November to confirm his escape. The delay upset Indonesia, which had arrested al-Farouq in 2002 and turned him over to the United States. …. Al-Farouq and the three other escapees boasted about their breakout from Bagram on a video broadcast in October 2005 on Al-Arabiya television."

Former Generals Blast Rumsfeld At Democrats' Hearing. ABC World News (9/25, story 2, 0:50, Gibson) reported, "a retired Army General made a stunning declaration. Major General John Batiste said the way the war has been conducted has inflamed Islamic fundamentalism, created more enemies for the US and, in a charge you don't expect to hear from an Army commander said the war needlessly destroyed American lives and he placed the blame on the Defense Secretary." Batiste: "Secretary Rumsfeld's dismal strategic decisions resulted in the unnecessary deaths of American servicemen and women and our allies and good people of Iraq. He was responsible for American or allies going to war with the wrong plan and a strategy that did not address the realities of fighting an insurgency."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "today at a hearing organized by Democrats, retired military officers accused Defense Secretary Rumsfeld of fueling terrorism by mismanaging the war." Batiste was shown saying, "Iraq didn't have to be the way it was. We created this insurgency. We let it grow, we let it develop, we let it blossom."

The AP (9/26, Espo) reports the retired officers "bluntly accused" Rumsfeld "of bungling the war in Iraq, saying U.S. troops were sent to fight without the best equipment and that critical facts were hidden from the public." The Democratic Policy Committee's panel heard testimony from Batiste, retired Army Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton and retired Marine Col. Thomas Hammes, all of whom support Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's ouster. Batiste testified that Rumsfeld "and others in the administration did not tell the American people the truth for fear of losing support for the war in Iraq." Batiste also "said Rumsfeld at one point threatened to fire the next person who mentioned the need for a postwar plan in Iraq." Eaton "assessed Rumsfeld as 'incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically.'" Sen. John Cornyn "dismissed the Democratic-sponsored event as 'an election-year smoke screen aimed at obscuring the Democrats' dismal record on national security.'

The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Levey, 918K) reports, "Adding to criticism of the Bush administration's prosecution of the war in Iraq," Batiste "said Monday that requests by commanders for more soldiers were repeatedly turned down." Batiste said, "Many of us routinely asked for more troops." The Times reports that Batiste was "contradicting statements by President Bush and his senior aides that the administration had given the military all the resources it had asked for." Eaton, "who oversaw efforts to train and equip Iraqi security forces in 2003 and 2004, also said he was not given enough U.S. troops to do the job."

Generals Prescribe "More Troops, More Money And More Time In Iraq." The Washington Post's Dana Milbank (9/26, A2) writes Batiste, "who retired in protest rather than accept a three-star promotion, was a persuasive witness -- and Democrats were joyous. 'Your statement, I believe, defines the word "courage,"' Sen. Byron Dorgan gushed." Sen. Charles Schumer "pumped his fist and gave Batiste and his colleagues pats on the biceps." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "proclaimed, giddily: 'This hearing today could change our country.' Perhaps. But Democrats, while celebrating Batiste's criticism of the administration, exercised some selective listening at the hearing when Batiste and his colleagues offered their solution: more troops, more money and more time in Iraq." Milbank notes Eaton said, "We are, conservatively, 60,000 soldiers short."

DOJ_NMG_0069508

The Washington Times (9/26, Fagan, 88K) reports, "all three of the retired leaders, however, backed up the administration assertion that pulling out of Iraq now would be disastrous and cause a dangerous regional instability."

McConnell Calls Hearing "Another Partisan Media Event." McClatchy Newspapers (9/26, Talev) report the testimony came during "the first of what Senate Democrats say will be a series of oversight hearings they're holding on the Iraq war. They say Republicans haven't exercised enough oversight since the March 2003 invasion. But Democrats also are trying to focus public attention back on Iraq because polls show Republicans are vulnerable on it and congressional elections will be held in six weeks." Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell "denounced the two-hour hearing, packed with anti-war activists and reporters, as 'simply another partisan media event. And while it may rile up their liberal base, it won't kill a single terrorist or prevent a single attack.'"

Lott Threatens Democrats Over Unofficial Hearings On Iraq. The Hill (9/26, Allen) reports Sen. Trent Lott "is threatening to punish Democrats for using an Appropriations Committee room for an unofficial hearing on Iraq oversight if it happens again." Lott is quoted as saying, "They better stop this. … This will be the last one or there will be retribution." However, The Hill notes that "if he is looking for a culprit in abetting the Democratic Policy Committee's (DPC) hearing yesterday, he need look no further than fellow Mississippi Republican Thad Cochran, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who controls the Dirksen Building room that Democrats used yesterday and have used for past hearings." According to The Hill, Lott and other Republicans "are upset that Democrats have gone outside the committee process to highlight the Iraq war before the November election."

Jones Attends Democrats' Hearing. The Hill (9/26, Allen) also reports that "the mostly Democratic panel was not without Republican representation." Rep. Walter B. Jones "made a nearly five-hour drive to the Capitol to participate in the hearing. Jones, who represents Camp Lejeune, voted to authorize the Iraq war but has criticized its execution. 'To me this is not politics, this is policy issues,' he said. 'The party that demands the truth is the party that the public respects.' In his opening statement, Jones quoted Rudyard Kipling: 'If any question why we died, tell them, because our fathers lied.'"

Townsend Defends Cheney's Assertions On Iraq. President Bush's Homeland Security Adviser Fran Townsend was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/25) about the fact that Vice President Dick Cheney is "on the record as having said that Saddam Hussein was somehow involved in the attack on us on 9/11," but now says that "there was no connection between Saddam Hussein and 9/11." Townsend said, "What I would say to you, when you say that, is Republicans and Democrats -- both administrations -- believed that Iraq was a threat, believed the intelligence on Iraq. The intelligence turned out to be wrong."

Harman Says Cheney Should Correct The Record On Iraq. Rep. Jane Harman said on MSNBC's Hardball (9/25) that Vice President Dick Cheney "refuses even now to correct the record. He was on Meet The Press two weeks ago and he said, We don't know there was this connection between Iraq and al Qaeda before 9/11. There was not. Let me say it definitively, there was not, and he should correct the record."

Matthews Says Cheney Is "Always Wrong." On MSNBC's Hardball (9/25) Chris Matthews commented on Vice President Cheney's claim that the insurgency is in its last throes and that the US would be greeted as liberators in Iraq, saying, "He's been dead wrong, month after month after month. Yet he receives respect of the media. I don't get it." Matthews later added, "Everything he ever said about this war has been wrong, and yet he comes on Sunday television like the prophet himself and everybody stands back and says, oh, he's a wise man. He's very prescient about things. He's always wrong."

Pentagon Extends 3,800 Soldiers' Iraq Tours. CBS Evening News (9/25, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Remember when US military officials said they were hoping some of the 140,000 troops in Iraq could start coming home by the end of this year? Those hopes were dashed last week when the top commander on the ground said that with the current violence there, it's not going to happen. And today nearly 4,000 soldiers who were due to come home the first of next year were told they're staying a few more weeks. And some other troops will be sent back ahead of schedule. All of this is a tremendous strain on both the military and military families. … The Army is scrambling to maintain the number of troops at 140,000 and today a former division commander in Iraq who already is on record as calling for Secretary Rumsfeld's resignation, told members of Congress even that is not enough." Major General John Batiste (ret): "It's a shell game that we play in Iraq and we've been doing it since day one and we're still doing it today. There's simply not enough troops there to accomplish the task."

DOJ_NMG_0069509

USA Today (9/26, Welch, 2.27M) reports, "The Pentagon said Thursday that 3,800 U.S. soldiers will be staying in Iraq about six weeks beyond their one-year combat tours as coalition forces grapple with violence in and around Baghdad. … Although the Pentagon did not say why the extension was needed, the top commander in the region, Army Gen. John Abizaid, said last week that more troops would be needed to deal with increased sectarian violence around Baghdad.

McClatchy (9/26, Brown) reports Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "said the changes were in order to maintain 15 combat brigades in Iraq. … 'What these decisions reflect is the flexibility that the United States military has to adjust to a changing environment and a changing situation,' Whitman said. A congressional staffer briefed on the development on Monday said that the Army was moving up the deployment of the 1st Cavalry Division troops by a month so that the 172nd Stryker Brigade's deployment wouldn't be extended again. But an Army spokesman, Lt. Col. Carl Ey, said the two developments weren't necessarily connected."

The Washington Post (9/26, A16, Tyson, 748K) reports the extension "demonstrates the increasingly tough trade-offs U.S. commanders face between the imperatives of war fighting and the need to retrain and recuperate the taxed Army and Marine Corps. In this case, commanders had to choose between extending thousands of U.S. troops serving in one of Iraq's deadliest cities -- the 1st Armored Division brigade in Ramadi -- or requiring another combat-hardened unit that has already served two tours in Iraq, a brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, to return to the desert after less than a year at home. They opted for the former. 'The chief of staff of the Army refuses to compromise on the one-year dwell time,' said an Army official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record. The chief of staff is Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, and 'dwell time' refers to the amount of time troops have at home between deployments to retrain, repair equipment and reconnect with their families."

Army Said To Need An Additional 60,000 Troops. ABC World News (9/25, lead story, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "ABC News has learned that top generals in the Army have come consensus, that to meet its responsibilities the Army has to be larger, more troops are needed, tens of thousands more. It's not a request yesterday or recommendation but senior Army officials have discussed this for weeks and are now in agreement that the army to meet current and future obligations has to have more men and women. Our national security correspondent Jonathan Karl is here." ABC added, "The top Army leadership is saying that the only long term solution is to increase the size of army by about 60,000 troops. That would be a difficult, controversial and costly proposition that could cost $7 billion a year. … Increasing the size of the Army would take time and money. To deal with the strain in the short run, officials are also considering another costly and unpopular idea using more National Guard troops in Iraq. Even without increasing the overall size of the Army these challenges are about to hit taxpayers hard. The Army is pushing for an increase of $20 billion in the next budget."

US Expected To Maintain Troop Levels In Iraq At More Than 140,000. The Financial Times (9/26, Luce) reports US officials "said on Monday that American troop levels in Iraq were likely to remain well above 140,000 for the next few months. … The overall US troop presence in Iraq has risen from 127,000 in July to 142,000 this week."

Army Described As "Stretched Thin" And "Struggling." CBS Evening News (9/25, lead story, 2:40, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "just keeping the current level is stretching the Army to its limit. Its goal is two years at home for every one year in Iraq. The reality has been 18 months, now that's slipped to just 14 months. … The Army is also running short of money. Over the next several years, it will need $66 billion just to repair or replace equipment torn up in Iraq."

The AP (9/26, Burns) reports the Army "is stretched so thin by the war in Iraq that it is again extending the combat tours of thousands of soldiers beyond the promised 12 months — the second such move since August. Soldiers of the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division had been expecting to return to their home base in Germany in mid-January. Instead, they will stay an extra 46 days in Iraq, until late February, the Pentagon announced Monday. The soldiers are operating in western Anbar province, one of the most violent parts of Iraq. The Pentagon also announced that the 4th Brigade, 1st Cavalry Division will deploy to Iraq 30 days earlier than scheduled, starting in late October. … 'The Army is coming to the end of its rope in Iraq,' said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a private research group. 'It simply does not have enough active-duty military personnel to sustain the current level of effort.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069510

The Washington Times (9/26, Scarborough, 88K) reports the Army "already is struggling to meet worldwide commitments and dealing with low-combat readiness among non-deployed units who lack adequate equipment at their home bases. The Army is wearing out weapons systems so fast in Iraq's harsh environment that it needs more than $40 billion in the next three years to buy replacements."

Use Of Individual Ready Reservists Called "Back-Door Draft." CBS Evening News (9/25, story 2, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "As wrenching as the sudden changes are for active duty troops, they can be down right crushing for some soldiers and Marines who have already put their uniforms in mothballs. CBS added, "The last time we saw US Army Captain Todd McGowan in uniform two years ago he and his wife Tracy thought it was the last time he'd ever need it. … Todd is what the Army calls an IRR, Individual Ready Reservist. Unlike Reservists, they're semi-retired soldiers who thought they were done with the military until this reactivation letter came in the mail. … Reactivated for 545 days, Todd's bound for Iraq, 35 pounds heavier, he hasn't fired a gun in two years." According to CBS, McGowan "and others call it a back-door draft." McGowan's wife was shown saying, "For them to call him back seven months shy of resigning his commission is despicable."

Two Top Army Generals In Iraq Reassigned. The AP (9/26, Burns) reports, "Two of the Army's top commanders in Iraq have been selected for new assignments. The second-in-command in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, will become a special assistant to the commander of Central Command with responsibility for developing the military capabilities of nations in the Middle East and Central Asia. Chiarelli is due to be replaced in Iraq by Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno when Odierno becomes commander of Multi-National Corps-Iraq early next year. Chiarelli had previously commanded the 1st Cavalry Division in Iraq. Also moving on from Iraq will be Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, the 4th Infantry Division commander, who has been chosen for promotion to the rank of lieutenant general and assignment as commander of 5th Corps, the Army's top organization in Europe. Thurman currently is commanding all forces in the Baghdad area."

US Soldiers Targeted By Militants From Within Sadr City. The AP (9/26, Castaneda) reports, "U.S. soldiers trying to calm Baghdad say the sprawling Sadr City slum has once again become a haven for anti-American militants — and the source of most of the gunfire and mortars directed at them. In the last two weeks, U.S. forces have suffered several casualties from dozens of shootings, mortar attacks and roadside bombings that American troops believe originated from Sadr City. Yet the Americans have been restrained in their response, as U.S. and Iraqi leaders strive to avoid a third confrontation in two years with firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army — the biggest and most dangerous Shiite militia in Iraq." The AP notes, "Al-Sadr's followers hold 30 of the 275 seats in the national parliament and five posts in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Cabinet and are a major pillar of the prime minister's political support. In August, al-Maliki, a Shiite, publicly berated the Americans for a raid on Sadr City."

Kurds Seize Police Station Slated To Be Handed Over To Sunni Commander. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Murphy, 918K) reports, "Kurdish militiamen seized a police station in northern Iraq on Monday to prevent its transfer to a new Sunni Arab commander, igniting a daylong standoff that echoed the parliament's continuing unease over territory-sharing in the final administrative map of Iraq. The clash in the town of Jalawla underscored the potential for violence as parliament prepared to study the contentious issue of creating autonomous regions in this multiethnic and heavily armed nation. Though most of the biggest political disputes are likely to center on the oilfields in the south, in largely Shiite Muslim areas, and the northern city of Kirkuk, another oil-rich area claimed by the Kurds, the clash in Jalawla marked an early warning of what many fear could be a turbulent battle for the frontiers of a future Kurdish zone."

Saddam Once Again Removed From Court. The Washington Post (9/26, A16, Paley, 748K) reports on "another tumultuous day in the genocide trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein, culminating in his expulsion from the courtroom for the second time in as many sessions. The proceedings began with Hussein and his six co-defendants…vigorously protesting the absence of their attorneys. Last week, the entire defense team boycotted the trial to protest the Iraqi government's dismissal of the chief judge for saying that Hussein was 'not a dictator.' The eight new court-appointed defense attorneys appeared to struggle Monday during simple cross-examinations of witnesses." The new chief judge, Mohammed al-Uraibiy "instructed [Hussein] to remain silent and respect the court. 'I'd respect the session if it was a respected court,' Hussein retorted. Then he held up a folded piece of yellow paper that he said was a request not to attend the trial as long as Uraibiy remained the presiding judge. … The judge angrily ordered Hussein to be removed from the courtroom and refused to accept his petition."

DOJ_NMG_0069511

Rice's Use Of Civil Rights Movement As Analogy For Iraq War Derided. The Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (9/26, A21) writes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice argues that "critics of the administration's Middle East policies are like the racists who contended that black Americans were not ready to participate in democracy because they were 'kind of childlike' and couldn't handle the vote. But that's a bizarre analogy. … She makes it sound as if those who disagree with the administration are standing in the schoolhouse door. But no one wants to deny Iraqis or anyone else the chance to practice democracy. The question is whether democracy should, or can, be imposed at the point of a gun. If Rice really believes what she says, then why does she shun the democratically elected Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority? Are the Palestinians childlike and not ready for the vote?"

Marines Accused Of Murdering Iraqi Civilian Will Not Face Death Penalty. CBS Evening News (9/25, story 3, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Three US Marines accused of dishonoring the nation top our CBS News briefing tonight. They're accused of kidnapping and killing an Iraqi civilian in April west of Baghdad. And today it was decided they will be charged with murder. But the commanding general in the case said he will not seek the death penalty."

Karzai Accuses Musharraf Of Tolerating Presence Of Terrorists. The Washington Times (9/26, Behn, 88K) reports, "The political divide between Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf became increasingly acerbic yesterday, with the Afghan leader accusing his counterpart of pursuing policies that foster terrorism. The outburst came on the eve of a critical meeting in which the two men will join President Bush in the Oval Office to discuss ways to improve their cooperation in fighting a revitalized Taliban insurgency. In a reference to Pakistan, Mr. Karzai said in an address at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars yesterday that there will be no peace in the region until nations stopped using religious extremism as a means of promoting policy. 'For all of us in the world to be safer, we must remove the need for groups, organizations or state entities -- and here I am beginning to be very careful in my remarks -- of reliance on religious radicalism as instruments of policy,' he said."

Afghan Women's Rights Activist Assassinated. The New York Times (9/26, Gall, 1.21M) reports, "A senior Afghan official specializing in women's rights was gunned down here on her way to work on Monday morning by suspected Taliban gunmen. It was the highest-level assassination of a woman in Afghanistan in the five years since the Taliban were ousted from power. Safia Amajan, 65, had served as chief of the women's affairs department in Kandahar Province for five years, working for women's rights and education and vocational training. A former teacher and high school principal, she was well known and much liked in Kandahar.

DOJ:

Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Receives DOJ Service Award. The Worcester (MA) Telegram (9/26, Hammel) reports, "David H. Hennessy, acting chief of the U.S. Attorney's Worcester branch , has been given the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, the Justice Department's highest award." The Telegram continues, "Mr. Hennessy, an assistant U.S. attorney since 1995, was among two Massachusetts assistant U.S. attorneys and a former assistant U.S. attorney from Massachusetts to be given awards Sept. 12 at DAR Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. Mr. Hennessy was given the award for his service on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, which investigated and prosecuted individuals considered most responsible for fraud in the energy company." The Telegram adds, "Mr. Hennessy served on the task force, which had about 40 prosecutors and FBI agents, from August 2003 through June 2004. The task force had offices in Washington and Houston, Enron's base. During part of that time he continued with some of his duties in the federal courthouse in Worcester, but for much of it he left Worcester early each Monday not to return from Houston until Thursday or Friday. … Mr. Hennessy served on the team that prosecuted Lea Fastow and the so-called Barge case defendants. Ms. Fastow, a former Enron assistant treasurer and wife of Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, was sentenced to a year in prison on a misdemeanor tax charge. … Referring to the Enron prosecutions, the Justice Department said, 'This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069512

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P Urged To Overhaul Its Board. Corporate governance experts say Hewlett-Packard CO. should overhaul its board in the wake of the recent leak investigation scandal. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Clark, Lublin) reports that "four public pension funds are proposing a way for shareholders to help do that. The four funds -- representing public workers in Connecticut, New York, North Carolina and Washington, D.C. -- said they filed a proposal asking H-P to change its bylaws to allow any shareholder group holding 3% of the company's stock for at least a year to nominate one or more board candidates. Backers of the proposal are the New York State Common Retirement Fund, the Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds, the North Carolina Retirement Systems and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Pension Funds. Their proposal relies partly on a recent appeals court ruling that sided with AFSCME." The Journal adds, "Separately, a House committee studying the H-P imbroglio said it issued subpoenas to two H-P executives and a private investigator it had invited to testify at a hearing Thursday. Several other senior H-P executives -- including Chief Executive Mark Hurd and former Chairman Patricia Dunn -- are expected to appear."

House Panel Subpoenas Two Hewlett-Packard Officials, Contractor. The Washington Post (9/26, D12, Nakashima, Noguchi) reports, "Congressional investigators have subpoenaed two Hewlett-Packard Co. employees and one contractor to testify before a House investigative subcommittee Thursday as part of the panel's probe of an HP spying scandal that has spawned two criminal investigations. … The subpoenas, the first issued by the panel in this case, went out over the weekend to HP senior counsel and ethics director Kevin Hunsaker; former HP global security director Anthony Gentilucci; and Ronald R. DeLia, owner of Security Outsourcing Solutions, a Boston investigative firm HP hired to help identify the sources of media leaks." The Post notes, "Congress is questioning HP executives and its investigators as part of a broader examination into companies that sell or obtain unauthorized access to phone records. Hunsaker and Gentilucci were both involved in HP's leak probe, which the company has said involved obtaining private phone records by impersonating directors and journalists. … Thursday, the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee will question HP chief executive Mark V. Hurd, former chairman Patricia C. Dunn and others." The AP (9/26, Gordon) reports, "The subpoenas are the first issued by the panel in its investigation. They were served over the weekend, according to a congressional aide who asked not to be identified because the investigation is continuing. .. . Until now, the invitations to testify at Thursday's hearing had been voluntary and other witnesses had accepted them."

Gentilucci Resigns After Receiving Subpoena. USA Today (9/26, Kessler) reports that Anthony Gentilucci, a global security manager for H-P, submitted his resignation yesterday after he and two others were subpoenaed by federal officials. Gentilucci "was part of a team assigned to find out who inside HP was leaking confidential information to the press. The team, which included HP staffers and outside detectives, used unsavory tactics to obtain confidential phone records, physically tracked board members and reporters, and tried to plant electronic tracking software on a reporter's computer."

Lawyer Praises Dunn's Decision To Step Aside. Viet Dinh, a Georgetown law professor and principal of Bancroft Associates PLLC, and the attorney for Tom Perkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/26), "Justice Felix Frankfurter once wrote, 'Wisdom too often never comes, and so one ought not to reject it merely because it comes late.' So it is with Hewlett-Packard's decision on Friday to come clean with the available facts about Chairman Patricia Dunn's ill-advised investigation into board members and journalists, as well as to replace her with CEO Mark Hurd and appoint respected prosecutor Bart Schwartz to mop up the mess. Belated but welcome, these actions show that Mr. Hurd's steady hand will guide H-P out of the scandal and back to its rightful place as the icon of Silicon Valley." Dinh adds, "By stepping aside, Ms. Dunn proved her personal commitment to H-P and its shareholders. It is never easy to let go under pressure, and her decision speaks volumes about her courage, her grace and, in Mr. Hurd's words, 'her ability to put the interests of H-P before her personal interests.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069513

Sonsini Hires Former Bush Attorney. Bloomberg (9/26, Rosenblatt) reports, "Lawrence W. Sonsini, a legal adviser to Hewlett-Packard Co., hired President Bush's former election counsel Michael Madigan to help him as he faces a Congressional investigation of the company's probe of boardroom leaks." Bloomberg continues, "Sonsini, 65, chairman of the Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati law firm, hired a team that includes Madigan and former Congressman Bill Paxon, both of the Washington, D.C., office of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld. Madigan was chief litigation counsel for Bush's campaign in the Florida recount during the 2000 election." Bloomberg adds, "Sonsini and officials at Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard are scheduled to appear Thursday before a subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is investigating whether company tactics used to determine the source of news leaks to its board were illegal. … Wilson Sonsini 'is working with Akin Gump, under the leadership of former Congressman Bill Paxon and Mike Madigan to help understand the congressional process,' firm spokeswoman Courtney Dorman said in an e-mail."

Sentencing Of Ex-Homestore CEO Delayed. Inman News (9/26) reports, "Sentencing for Stuart Wolff, the former CEO of Homestore Inc. who was convicted in June on charges ranging from conspiracy to fraudulent insider trading, has been delayed until at least Oct. 10." Inman continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said today, 'At the defense's request, the hearing has been postponed' and could be delayed until Oct. 10 or Oct. 16." Inman adds, "Wolff, 43, reportedly faces a maximum statutory sentence of 175 years in federal prison for the crimes at Homestore, now known as Move Inc. The company operates popular home-search Web site Realtor.com. … Wolff served as CEO and chairman of the board at Homestore from 1997-2002, when he resigned during an internal investigation. A jury found Wolff guilty of conspiracy, filing false statements with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, lying to accountants, fraudulent insider trading, and falsification of corporate books and records. … He had originally been scheduled for sentencing Sept. 11."

Former Hedge Fund Manager Charged With Insider Trading. The Washington Post (9/26, D4, Masters) reports, "A former hedge fund manager has been charged with criminal insider trading for allegedly profiting from confidential information she had received from Arlington investment firm Friedman Billings Ramsey Group Inc. Hilary L. Shane, 39, was indicted earlier this month on five counts of securities fraud, and she was arraigned on Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. She pleaded not guilty." Shane "has already paid $1.45 million to settle a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and been banned from the industry by the NASD. Her lawyer, Robert Gold, declined to comment outside of the courtroom."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (9/26) reports that Shane "pleaded not guilty yesterday to illegally short selling shares of CompuDyne hours before the company announced a private share offering." Bloomberg continues, "An indictment said that Hilary L. Shane, 39, bought shares for herself and her clients, agreeing to keep the offering secret until it was announced. Hours before the announcement in 2001, Ms. Shane sold 122,900 CompuDyne shares short for about $14.59 apiece, according to the indictment, which was dated Sept. 12 and unsealed Thursday." Bloomberg adds, "Weeks later, Ms. Shane used shares she had bought in the private offering for $12 each to return the borrowed shares, making a profit of $315,216 for herself and her clients, prosecutors said. Ms. Shane, of Jupiter, Fla., made her plea before Magistrate Judge Henry Pittman of Federal District Court in Manhattan. She was released without bail, and her next court date is Oct. 10, a Justice Department spokeswoman said. A call to CompuDyne, a security system company based in Annapolis, Md., was not returned. … In May 2005, Ms. Shane paid more than $1 million in fines and restitution to settle a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit arising from the same transactions, without admitting or denying the accusations, the S.E.C. said."

Scrushy Lawyers Say Jurors Discussed Case In E-Mails. In a motion seeking a new trial for HealthSouth Corp. founder and former chief executive Richard Scrushy say some of the jurors in his corruption trial discussed the case in e-mails before convicting him. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, McKay, Bauerlein) reports, "The motion, filed yesterday in U.S. District Court in Montgomery, Ala., by lawyers for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Donald Siegelman, included copies of four emails that the attorneys said were sent to them anonymously, as well as an affidavit from an unidentified juror alleging that some jurors had introduced information about the case to other jurors that they had gotten off the Internet." US District Judge Mark Fuller "admonished jurors repeatedly throughout the trial not to discuss the case among themselves outside of formal deliberations. On May 29, a month before Mr. Scrushy's conviction, one juror, using a Google g-mail account, wrote to another that 'some of the kounts r confusing 2 our friends' and that two other jurors were 'still off trac.' On June 25, an email from the same Google g-mail account said that 'penalty 2 severe ... still unclear on couple of counts against pastor & gov.' The term 'pastor' appears to refer to Mr. Scrushy, who has a religious cable TV show."

DOJ_NMG_0069514

Ebbers To Report To Federal Prison Today. WorldCom founder and former CEO Bernie Ebbers will report to federal prison today to being serving a 25-year sentence for accounting fraud. USA Today (9/26, O'Donnell) reports, "It could be a life sentence for Ebbers, who is 65. It's the harshest sentence in the recent wave of white-collar convictions and is being contested by Ebbers' defense lawyer, Reid Weingarten. But Ebbers was ordered to report to prison anyway." USA adds, "Bureau of Prisons officials on Monday would not say where Ebbers will be sent. But because of the sentence length, Ebbers won't be going to a prison camp. Minimum-security prison camps have a more campuslike atmosphere, and inmates are allowed to move somewhat freely on the grounds."

Fastow To Help Prosecutors Pursue Bankers In Enron Case. The Washington Post (9/26, D1, Johnson) reports that Former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow "has agreed to assist lawyers representing shareholders who lost billions of dollars when the energy trader filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2001, according to documents reviewed by The Washington Post." Fastow "is pointing to several investment banks that have rebuffed efforts to settle a class-action shareholder lawsuit. The banks, all of which have denied wrongdoing in court filings, include Merrill Lynch & Co., the Credit Suisse Group, and the Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC." Fastow "has consented to sit for an extensive deposition with plaintiff lawyers to tell them what he knows and to point them to documents that flesh out the bankers' role in helping Enron in exchange for hundreds of millions of dollars in fees, the documents indicate."

FBI Cracking Down On Options Fraud. Bloomberg (9/26, Schmidt) reports, "The FBI is conducting probes of 52 companies that may have illegally backdated stock options and more cases are on the way, its new criminal investigative chief said." Bloomberg continues, "The number of criminal cases has increased 16 percent in less than two months, said Chip Burrus, an assistant director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. 'We're going to knock that pretty good,' he said in an interview. 'We're going to go after those.'" Bloomberg adds, "Burrus signaled the Justice Department will oppose efforts to water down the corporate-governance overhaul adopted in the wake of the scandals involving Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and others. In the interview, he praised the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley accounting law, which has been under attack from business groups and Wall Street, and said the FBI is paying close attention to fraud in the $1.2 trillion hedge-fund industry. … The FBI is investigating 486 corporate fraud cases this fiscal year, up from 423 in 2005, according to the agency. It has also opened 1,160 securities fraud probes, compared with 1,139 last year. Twenty of the bureau's corporate-fraud cases allegedly involve more than $1 billion. … The bureau works closely with the Securities and Exchange Commission, U.S. attorneys' offices, the Justice Department's fraud section and other agencies. … Burrus's comments echo those of Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who said in a June 29 interview that corporate fraud remains a priority for the Justice Department."

Fleming Cos. Ordered To Pay $3 Million In Claims, Interest And Attorney Fees. The Washington Post (9/26, D1, Skrzycki) reports in its "The Regulators" column that the estate of Fleming Cos. Has "balked at claims, totaling some $1.6 million, of H.J. Heinz Co., J.R. Simplot Co. and Cavendish Farms on the grounds that their product -- frozen french fries -- shouldn't be covered by an arcane U.S. Department of Agriculture regulation that falls under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act. The law lets agribusiness suppliers collect first in such cases as long as they provided fresh vegetables. That can mean the difference between getting paid in full or standing with the unsecured creditors and getting pennies on the dollar. The fries folks had lost claims in earlier bankruptcy cases, so they succeeded in getting 'batter and coating' added to the list of processes allowed in the rule governing what constitutes 'fresh' vegetables. A Sept. 14 ruling by a federal judge in Delaware, following earlier court precedents in Texas, handed victory to the frozen spuds industry. It ordered Fleming to pay the three companies some $3 million in claims, interest and attorney fees."

DOJ_NMG_0069515

Judge Delays Sale Of Segal Estate. The Chicago Tribune (9/26, Flynn) reports, "A federal judge on Monday gave prosecutors more time to accept offers for the Highland Park estate of convicted insurance executive Michael Segal after an attorney for a developer who won an auction to buy the property expressed concerns about a potential federal historic review process. … US District Judge Ruben Castillo gave prosecutors, who are seeking to recoup part of the $30 million Segal was ordered to forfeit after his 2004 conviction on racketeering, fraud, embezzlement and other charges, until Oct. 3 to consider other offers. Castillo has not ruled on whether proceedings for historic properties would apply to the Segal property."

SEC Database To Undergo $54 Million Upgrade. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Burns, Scannell) reports, "Securities regulators are planning a $54 million upgrade of the computer database on corporate financial reports that officials say will revolutionize the public-disclosure system. The Securities and Exchange Commission's Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis and Retrieval system, known as Edgar, will be transformed and likely will be renamed, said SEC chief Christopher Cox. … For more than a year, Mr. Cox has been pushing interactive data as a way to change how companies communicate information to investors. Mr. Cox hopes to see some changes in six months, with the entire financial-reporting system overhauled within 18 months."

Firms Ousting CEOs At Record Pace. Bloomberg (9/26, Kelly) reports, "Chief executive officers are falling faster than ever this year. In just the first 12 days of September, leaders at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Ford Motor Co. and Viacom Inc. were deposed -- fueling the breakneck pace in which one CEO departs every six hours." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. companies are on track to fire or lose a record 1,400 chiefs in 2006, up from 1,322 last year and 663 in 2004, says executive recruiting firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas Inc. in Chicago. From Sun Microsystems Inc. and Pfizer Inc. to Kraft Foods Inc. and RadioShack Corp., most types of firms have felt the rash of CEO departures." Bloomberg adds, "Chiefs are being pushed out the door as directors abandon their laissez faire approach to governance following the prosecutions at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other companies. About 96 percent of companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index now have independent lead or presiding directors, up from 36 percent in 2003, says a survey by Spencer Stuart Inc., an executive search firm in Chicago. … 'Boards are under a lot more pressure, and they're being hypervigilant,' says Donald Hambrick, a management professor at Pennsylvania State University's Smeal College of Business in University Park. 'They are cleansing.' … For a price. The average severance package for a departing CEO totaled about $16 million in the past three years, according to the Corporate Library, a governance watchdog group in Portland, Maine."

WPost Says Amaranth Shows Danger And Safety Of Hedge Funds. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/26, A20) says the "spectacular trouble at Amaranth Advisors LLC, a medium-size hedge fund that specialized in energy trading, did not roil the financial markets or destabilize the banking system. … Amaranth's story illustrates both the danger and the safety of hedge funds. … Because they can invest in anything and can bet on declines in prices as well as increases, hedge funds scour the world for illogically priced assets, and their buying or selling moves prices to a rational level. Hedge funds that believe markets are overvalued can slow the inflation of a dangerous bubble. Hedge funds that believe markets are undervalued can push prices up, reducing the cost of capital to firms. Mutual funds, which don't bet against the market and which mainly aim for average performance, contribute far less to this process of price discovery, which allocates the world's savings to the countries, companies and individuals who are likely to use it best."

CRIMINAL LAW:

"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Pleads Guilty To Record-Keeping Violations. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Hoffman) reports, "Joe Francis, the founder and chief executive of the 'Girls Gone Wild' empire, pleaded guilty

DOJ_NMG_0069516

Monday to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws by failing to document the ages of young women in his racy videos." The Times continues, "The pleas in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles were the result of an agreement announced this month between Francis and the Justice Department after an investigation into whether his Santa Monica companies filmed minors." The Times adds, "Francis agreed to personally pay a $500,000 fine to settle charges that he failed to keep records of the ages and identities of the women who appeared in his soft-core sex videos. Francis earlier this month acknowledged that footage of minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct appeared in at least two DVDs he released. … Francis' Mantra Films Inc. pleaded guilty this month in Panama City, Fla., to 10 felony counts stemming from the same violations and agreed to pay $1.6 million in fines. … MRA Holdings Inc., another company owned by Francis, entered into a so-called deferred prosecution agreement under which the government would dismiss all charges if MRA abided by the accord for three years and hired an outside monitoring company."

The AP (9/26) reports, "Outside court, Francis told reporters he thought the chances are 'pretty slim' that the judge would reject the deal. … 'We are thrilled to have this stuff behind us,' Francis said." The AP adds, "Francis' attorney, Aaron Dyer, said underage girls who had appeared in the videos had lied about their age to the company. … Francis' Santa Monica-based company, Mantra Films Inc., pleaded guilty earlier this month in U.S. District Court in Florida on similar charges. According to court papers, Mantra Films admitted to violating record keeping and labeling laws while producing and distributing the videos during all of 2002 and part of 2003. … Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines. It must also hire an outside company to monitor its records and production facilities to ensure compliance with federal law."

Judge Backs FBI Search Of Coca-Cola Executive's Home. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/26, Weber) reports, "A federal magistrate judge has recommended that a former Coca-Cola employee's request to throw out evidence seized from her in a trade secrets theft case be denied. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn Brill said in a report dated Thursday but not entered until Monday that investigators had sufficient probable cause to search Joya Williams' home, and therefore, evidence seized should not be suppressed. The recommendation to deny Williams' motion goes to a federal district judge for a final decision." The AP notes, "Williams' lawyer, Janice Singer, had filed a motion asking a judge to suppress evidence seized from her client's…home, alleging that FBI agents provided insufficient probable cause in obtaining a warrant to search the home." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/26, 399K) also reports on the ruling in "Daily Briefing."

World Gaming Officials Resign Amid Widening Online Gambling Probe. The Financial Times (9/26, Blitz) reports, "A retired lawyer in the US who served under former US President George H.W. Bush resigned yesterday as chairman and director of an online gambling company, highlighting fears among executives in the sector that they face arrest by travelling to the US or other countries taking a tough line against gambling." The Times continues, "World Gaming, an Aim-listed company whose operations are almost entirely US-facing, announced the resignation of James Grossman, along with that of Clare Roberts, a fellow non-executive director, after a board meeting of the company, which has offices in Antigua, London and Vancouver." The Times adds, "Mr Grossman, 66, a former practising attorney, was a special representative for the United Nations Development Programme and was appointed by former President Bush in 1992 to the US Foreign Claims Settlement Commission. … The resignations come at a critical time for the gaming industry, hit in the past two months by the arrest in the US and France of four senior executives and non-executives on various anti-gambling charges. … Senators are engaged in a struggle over a bill to tighten US laws against gambling."

US Fails To Win Convictions In Pellicano-Related Perjury Trial. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "In a setback for government prosecutors, a federal jury in Los Angeles on Monday acquitted a former SBC employee on four felony counts of lying about her contacts with a central figure in the wiretapping case against onetime Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano." The jury "also told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that it was deadlocked on a fifth perjury count against Joann Wiggan of Burbank, who was fired in March after 34 years with…AT&T." Wiggan's lawyer, David R. Reed, "celebrated outside the courtroom as a speechless federal prosecutor and several FBI agents looked on. He compared Wiggan's acquittal after seven hours of deliberation 'to David beating Goliath.'" The Times notes that the US attorney's office "sought to distance Monday's courtroom loss from the larger Pellicano case," but "with the same judge, prosecutors and agents involved in the pending Pellicano racketeering case, several legal observers saw the verdict Monday as a clear setback for the government."

DOJ_NMG_0069517

Gotti's Mother Lashes Out At Prosecutor As Jurors Continue Deliberations. Newsday (9/26, DeStefano) reports, "The fur flew at the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti when his mother had sharp words for a woman prosecutor as the jury continued its deliberations. As assistant U.S. attorney Miriam Rocah was exiting the well of the courtroom yesterday, Victoria Gotti…stunned the quiet courtroom with a remark to the prosecutor. 'Who the hell do you think you are talking to?' said Victoria Gotti. … Outside the courtroom, the elder Victoria Gotti explained that Rocah gave her a disrespectful remark in court that shocked her." Newsday adds, "After lunch yesterday, the jury sent out a note asking for clarification on two legal points. In one question the jury wanted to know the standard by which the government had to prove Gotti was part of the charged racketeering conspiracy. The jury also questioned whether Gotti had to prove that he left the Gambino crime family by July 21, 1999 or just the specific conspiracy charged in the indictment."

Three Arrested In Massachusetts Mob Gambling Investigation. The Boston Herald (9/20, Sweet, 203K) reported, "Reputed mob boss Arthur Gianelli's bride and two alleged members of his crew were arrested…in connection with a 520-count federal indictment charging their alleged criminal enterprise with illegal gambling, extortion and arson. Mary Ann Gianelli, 49, an MIT nurse and the sister-in-law of convicted ex-FBI Agent John Connolly Jr., turned herself in to state and federal authorities after reputed loan shark Philip Puopolo was busted at the Revere Businessmen's Association by the state police Organized Crime Unit." The Herald noted Puopolo allegedly "operated a sports betting office for Arthur Gianelli, 49, of Lynnfield and threatened witnesses to lie to a grand jury. Gianelli's gang reportedly pays 'rent' to the New England Mafia in order to stay in business."

The AP (9/20) reported, "Gianelli and three other men allegedly plotted to burn down a sports bar in an attempt to intimidate the owner into selling them another bar, federal prosecutors said. … A total of 13 people are charged in the gambling case. The new indictment dropped three defendants who have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing."

Washington State Inmate Charged With Threatening Judges. The AP (9/26) reports, "A man about to be released from state prison after serving several years for harassing a judge has been charged with sending a threatening letter to federal judges in Tacoma." Charles Gary Felts "was charged with mailing threatening communications to U.S. Magistrate Judge J. Kelley Arnold and U.S. District Judge Ronald B. Leighton, in which he said 'the people need to delcare marshal (sic) law ... and shoot any and all of you filth on sight or stench.' The letter was sent in June as part of a civil rights claim Felts is pursuing in federal court in Tacoma, aspects of which have come before the judges." The AP notes, "In charging papers made public Monday, FBI Special Agent Ryan Bruett said Felts admitted sending the letter," but he "signed a statement saying he did not mean to threaten anyone, Bruett said. The letter was a 'metaphor' designed to 'wake them up and make them think,' Felts wrote."

Miller Seeks Criminal Probe Of Reading Program. Bloomberg (9/26, Basken) reports, "A Democratic congressman called for a criminal investigation after an audit found that a $1 billion federal program to improve reading among grade-school children was run by staff who steered contracts to favored publishers." Bloomberg continues, "The Education Department's inspector-general last week recommended an overhaul of the 'Reading First' program, part of the 'No Child Left Behind' law, including removing directors and reviewing the propriety of their contract awards. … 'The inspector-general's report raises serious questions about whether Education Department officials violated criminal law, and those questions must be pursued by the Justice Department,' said Representative George Miller of California, the top-ranking Democrat on the House Education Committee." Bloomberg adds, "Miller, in his statement, called the audit part of pattern in which the Education Department under President George W. Bush 'has repeatedly run afoul of ethical standards.' … Miller's office also cited an independent analysis published last year by the Washington-based American Institutes for Research that found the program favored by Reading First directors, a product of the McGraw-Hill Companies Inc., was one of only two programs to receive AIR's highest rating."

DOJ_NMG_0069518

US Indicts Former GUEA Directors With Fraud, Tax Violations. The AP (9/26) reports, "A federal grand jury (in Gary, IN) indicted two former directors of the Gary Urban Enterprise Association and issued new tax charges against the group's previously indicted former executive director and former fiscal manager, federal prosecutors said Monday." The AP continues, "Former directors Johnnie Wright, 76, and Derrick Earls, 51, both of Gary, have been charged with 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of conspiracy and one count of federal program theft, the Justice Department said in a news release. … Former Director Jojuana Meeks and the group's former fiscal manager, Charmaine Pratchett, were indicted on identical charges in June, accused of embezzling more than $800,000 to pay for cars, trips and funeral expenses." The AP adds, "Wright and Earls were expected to surrender Tuesday, when they are due to have their initial hearings on the charges, said Mary Hatton, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Joseph Van Bokkelen. … The two served as directors from 1999 to 2004 for the group, which was created to attract new investment to the Gary area. … A superseding indictment in the case also charged Meeks with four counts of tax evasion for not filing tax returns for the years 2000 to 2004. It charged Pratchett with four counts of filing false tax returns for the same years."

Jurors In Katrina Bus Case Will Not Hear About Deadly Blaze. The Houston Chronicle (9/26, Pinkerton) reports, "Jurors today (in McAllen, TX) will hear about maintenance and safety practices of charter bus company Global Limo Inc. but not about the bus fire that killed 23 nursing home residents evacuated from Houston last year as Hurricane Rita bore down." The Chronicle continues, "U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa granted a defense motion to limit testimony to alleged mismanagement that occurred during a four-month period before last year's accident. … James H. Maples, president and director of Pharr-based Global, faces charges he falsified driver time records and failed to adequately inspect and maintain his fleet of buses. The company was shut down for safety violations two weeks after the September 2005 accident." The Chronicle adds, "Lawyers for Maples, a 67-year-old retired NFL player, have said that he looks forward to clearing his name. … An eight-woman, four-man jury was selected late Monday after two hours of questioning." The Chronicle notes, "During jury selection, Justice Department prosecutors informed the court they plan to call Juan Robles Gutierrez, an undocumented immigrant from Monterrey who was driving the bus when the fire erupted near Dallas. His family has said Robles did all he could to stop the fire, but oxygen bottles needed by many elderly nursing home residents exploded as the fire spread from a rear wheel well. … Based on the judge's statements Monday, it appears testimony from Robles will be limited to his experiences with the company before the accident. … Robles was arrested on an immigration charge — unlawful entry to the U.S. — shortly after the accident, but he has been allowed to remain in Texas to testify."

Sister Of Connecticut Drug Lord Charged With Lying About 1996 Murder. The Connecticut Post (9/26, Mayko) reports, "The sister of admitted drug lord Frankie Estrada is under arrest and indictment for lying to the federal grand jury investigating the 1996 murder of a local prostitute." The Post continues, "Frances Estrada, 44, was arrested recently in Greenville, N.C., where she now lives. Federal marshals on Monday brought her into U.S. Magistrate Judge William I. Garfinkel's courtroom, where she pleaded not guilty to four perjury charges — each carrying a maximum five-year prison term. … At the request of Assistant U.S. Attorney Karen Peck, Garfinkel ordered Estrada detained without bond pending a hearing Wednesday." The Post adds, "The indictment lleges that Estrada committed perjury while appearing before a federal grand jury in New Haven on May 10, 2005. At the time, the grand jury was investigating the Jan. 30, 1996, murder of Aida Escalara. .. . The indictment accuses Frances Estrada of lying to the grand jury when she denied knowing Escalara or seeing her on the night of the murder. … It further alleges she lied while denying knowing Eddie Mercado and Billie 'The Kid' Gomez, Escalara's convicted murderers. … Finally, the indictment accuses Frances Estrada of lying by telling the grand jury that her daughter, Star, was not living with her at the time of the murder."

Unfamiliarity With Legal Principles Common In New York's Justice Courts. The New York Times (9/26, Glaberson) reports, "An unfamiliarity with basic legal principles is remarkably common in what are known as the justice courts, legacies of the Colonial era that survive in more than 1,000 New York towns and villages. For generations, justices have hailed them as 'poor man's courts,' where ordinary people can get simple justice with little formality or expense. But there are few more vivid spots to view their shortcomings than here in one of New York's poorest corners: Franklin County, a place of rugged beauty on the Canadian border where only one of the 32 local justices is a lawyer. The county's justices have repeatedly drawn the attention of state judicial conduct officials, with 15 publicly disciplined since the late 1970's, some twice."

DOJ_NMG_0069519

Virginia Police Chief Seeks To Protect Kids From Internet Predators. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/26, A1, Markon) reports on Chief Calvin Johnson of the Dumfries, Virginia police. Around town, Johnson, "is known by his first name. His 14 officers handle the usual traffic crashes, fights and domestic violence calls, but anything more serious -- homicides, robberies -- is sent to Prince William police. County police also investigate all sex crimes. Chapman vowed to change that. … So, with support from the chief, he attended a one-week training course run by the Northern Virginia/Washington, D.C. Internet Crimes Against Children task force, which helps local police fight Internet predators. When he returned in July, he told the chief he'd work part time and come in on his days off. All he needed was a laptop. Chapman was issued a blue Toshiba laptop, and he set up shop on his desk in the corner of the squad room, known as 'the bullpen.' In July, he went online, posing first as a 14-year-old girl. He was inundated with propositions from older men."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Appeals Order To Release NRO Budget Documents. The Federal Times (9/26, Friedman) reports, "The Justice Department is appealing a federal court order requiring the National Reconnaissance Office to release unclassified budget documents." The Times continues, "The Federation of American Scientists filed a Freedom of Information Act request last year for parts of the fiscal 2006 budget justification sent to Congress by NRO, which builds and operates intelligence satellites. NRO rejected the request, claiming that the relevant documents are "operational files," which document scientific and technical means for collecting information. Intelligence agencies can exempt operational files from FOIA. .. . But a federal judge ruled in July that the exemption did not apply to the NRO budget documents. According to Steven Aftergood, director of the FAS Project on Government Secrecy, NRO initially said it would comply with the decision." The Times adds, "On Sept. 20, however, the Justice Department filed a notice of appeal in U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. … Justice spokesman Charles Miller confirmed the notice of appeal was filed, but declined to comment on its substance or on FOIA policy."

Judge Rules Suit Over "Light" Cigarettes Can Proceed. ABC World News (9/25, story 9, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "A Federal Judge today dealt a huge blow to big tobacco in a lawsuit over light cigarettes. The judge is allowing the case to go ahead as a class action lawsuit brought by smokers who claim tobacco companies duped them into thinking they were safer."

The Financial Times (9/26, Foster) reports, "A US federal judge on Monday dealt a blow to the tobacco industry when he ruled a case involving the big cigarette makers and tens of millions of smokers of 'light' cigarettes could proceed to trial as a national class action. The Schwab claim – filed in 2004 under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organisations Act (Rico) – alleges cigarette companies defrauded smokers into believing "light" cigarettes were safer than regular ones. The class includes anyone in the US who bought cigarettes that were labelled 'light' or 'lights' between 1971 and 2006. Lawyers are seeking as much as $200bn (£105bn) in damages, which would automatically be tripled under Rico."

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, O'Connell) reports, "U.S. District Judge Jack B. Weinstein in Brooklyn, N.Y., made the pretrial ruling yesterday in a 2004 lawsuit alleging that Philip Morris USA, Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco unit, among others, falsely marketed 'light' and 'low-tar' cigarettes as a lower-risk alternative to conventional higher-tar smokes."

USA Today (9/26, Smith) reports, "At issue, Weinstein said, 'is not whether a fraud case can be proven, but whether damages can be' calculated for smokers who allegedly were unaware of a fact the tobacco companies have known since the late 1960s: Consumers of low-tar cigarettes smoke more intensively to compensate for their nicotine addictions, putting them at elevated health risks. Plaintiffs' attorney Michael

DOJ_NMG_0069520

Hausfeld, who built the smokers' legal claims around a federal racketeering statute, said he will prove damages of $26 billion to $200 billion through statistical models that estimate how much Americans allegedly were overcharged for 'light' cigarettes and how much faster they would have quit smoking had not 'light' cigarettes been marketed so effectively since the early 1970s."

The New York Times (9/26, Johnston, Warner) calls the decision a "legal blow to the tobacco industry." The Times adds, "The decision, coming at a time when the tobacco industry felt it was on a legal winning streak, raises the possibility that so-called lights cases will become a major threat to the companies and expose them to potentially significant damages."

The Washington Post/AP (9/26, D2, Hays) reports, "Shares of tobacco firms fell on Wall Street as the ruling, granting class-action status to the case, clouded what had appeared to be an improving legal environment for the industry. Altria Group Inc., the parent of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris USA Inc., said the ruling will delay its long-awaited restructuring plan, which includes a divestiture of its controlling stake in Kraft Foods Inc."

The New York Law Journal (9/26, Perrotta) reports, "In his ruling Monday, the judge stressed that while the suit was far from perfect, the evidence warranted that it proceed. … 'While evidence of fraud on the class appears to be quite strong -- and defendants have been less than candid in insisting that there was no fraud -- evidence of the percentage of the class which was defrauded and the amount of economic damages it suffered appears to be quite weak -- and plaintiffs have been less than candid in failing to acknowledge that deficiency in their proof,' the judge wrote." The Journal adds, "He said the jury system -- which he described as the 'ultimate focus group of the law' -- was well equipped to sort out the particulars in accordance with Amendment VII of the U.S. Constitution. … 'The jury's power and capacity to deal with complex facts and come to a reasonable resolution of a dispute should not be underestimated,' Weinstein said."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, 4:50 p.m.) reported, "It's been called a big blow to tobacco. A federal judge in New York is allowing millions of light cigarette smokers to join in a class action lawsuit. The suit claims nine tobacco companies duped smokers into believing light cigarettes were safer than regular cigarettes. An attorney says the judge's ruling makes this the largest class action lawsuit in U.S. History. The defendants RJ Reynolds tobacco and Phillip Morris plan to appeal."

The decision by a New York federal judge to allow millions of light cigarette smokers to sue cigarette makers received moderate coverage by local newscasts. Overall, the ruling was seen as a big blow to tobacco industry, which said it is going to appeal the judge's decision. Some examples: NC8-TV Washington, DC, (9/25, 10:47 a.m.) reported, "Smokers of light cigarettes, won't be taken lightly in federal court. Today a Brooklyn judge granted class action status to tens of millions of smokers, in a potential 200-billion- dollar suit against tobacco heavyweights Philip Morris and RJ Reynolds, among others. The lawsuit says the defending companies have been duping smokers since the early 70s into believing 'light' brands were safer. The tobacco industry argued unsuccessfully that it's impossible to know individual smokers' motives."

KDFW-TV Dallas, (9/25, 10:19 a.m.) reported, "A federal judge has ruled tobacco companies can be sued by a large group of smokers who satisfied their habit with light cigarettes. The group could personally include tens of millions of the class action lawsuit worth up to 200 billion dollars. Tobacco companies are allegedly duping smokers into believing the brand labeled light was safer."

WWBT-TV Richmond, (9/25, 4:17 p.m.) reported, "The decision was based on a 2004 law lawsuit alleging that Phillip Morris and others fooled consumers and responded to the mounting health concerns with a campaign of lies designed to save money. Phillip Morris says they will appeal. Until that is decided anyone that purchased cigarettes labeled 'Light' after they were put on the market in the early 70s can be part of the lawsuit if it goes forward."

WGN-TV Chicago, (9/25, 8:44 a.m.) reported, "That decision has the potential of costing tobacco companies $200 billion. The suit alleges that cigarette companies mislead smokers into thinking that light cigarettes are safer than regular cigarettes."

KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/25, 5:26 p.m.) reported, "The suit says smokers were duped by light cigarettes as a low risk alternative even though documents showed they knew the risks were the same. Companies say they plan to appeal."

WGHP-TV Greensboro, (9/25, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Lawyers for the tobacco companies say it's impossible to determine smokers motives for buying light cigarettes, unless each person was interviewed separately."

DOJ_NMG_0069521

Insurance Adjuster Seeks To Silence Whistleblowing Sisters. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (9/26, Lee) reports, "An insurance adjusting firm wants two whistleblowers to stop talking about claims they handled for State Farm insurance, pay damages for economic harm and return records they turned over to federal and state investigators." The Herald continues, "The company, Alabama-based E.A. Renfroe, said sisters Cori and Kerri Rigsby also gave copies of the records to attorney Richard 'Dickie' Scruggs, whose Scruggs Katrina Group intends to profit from lawsuits filed against State Farm." The Herald adds, "Renfroe is suing the Rigsbys, insurance adjusters who claim State Farm manipulated engineering firms to minimize or deny policyholder claims. Renfroe said the Rigsbys breached their employment contract and violated the Alabama Trade Secrets Act by turning over confidential records to federal and state investigators and to Scruggs, for whom they are now working. … Renfroe wants a federal judge in Alabama to stop the Rigsbys' disclosures, award Renfroe damages for breach of contract, allow Renfroe to recover any profits the Rigsbys or Scruggs receive from the records, and award extra damages against the Rigsbys." The Herald notes, "The Rigsbys worked from the late 1990s until the spring of 2006 for Renfroe, which State Farm hired to help adjust its claims. Renfroe assigned the Rigsbys, who are from Ocean Springs, to work for State Farm. … The sisters said they left their adjusting jobs because of the wrongdoing they discovered and documented from State Farm claims files. They have accused State Farm of manipulating engineering firms to supply reports attributing hurricane damage to water, covered by national flood insurance, rather than wind, covered under State Farm policies."

AOL Sued Over Release Of Search Data. The AP (9/26, Jesdanun) reports, "Three AOL subscribers who suddenly found records of their Internet searches widely distributed online are suing the company under privacy laws and are seeking an end to its retention of search-related data." The AP continues, "The lawsuit is believed to be the first in the wake of AOL's intentional release of some 19 million search requests made over a three-month period by more than 650,000 subscribers, including the three plaintiffs - two unnamed Californians and Kasadore Ramkissoon of Richmond County, New York." The AP adds, "Filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Oakland, California, the lawsuit seeks class-action status. It does not specify the amount of damages being sought. … AOL already has apologized for the release, which it blamed on a researcher who had failed to gain proper clearances. The researcher and another AOL employee have been fired, and the company's chief technology officer has resigned. AOL also pledged to name its first chief privacy officer."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Investigating Possible Arizona Hate Crime. The Arizona Republic (9/26, Arnold) reports, "FBI agents have joined a Gilbert police investigation into a possible hate crime in which a Black Barbie doll was found hanging by its neck in the car of an African-American woman. The 24-year-old woman found the doll July 8 after leaving the vehicle unlocked overnight at her apartment complex in the 1300 block of West Juniper Avenue, according to police. The act potentially specifically targeted the victim, which could warrant federal charges should investigators determine it was motivated by the victim's race, said Special Agent Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman. Federal agents learned of the investigation through news media and have been assisting police for several weeks to determine whether federal charges are warranted, McCarley said."

Veteran ACLU Supporters Seek Ouster Of Group's Leadership. The New York Times (9/26, Strom, 1.21M) reports, "More than 30 longtime supporters of the American Civil Liberties Union are calling for the ouster of the organization's leadership, saying it has failed to adhere to the principles it demands of others and thus jeopardized the organization's effectiveness." The statement "does not name individual officials that the group wants to see removed, but in the past, criticism has been focused" on Executive Director Anthony Romero, Board of Directors President Nadine Strossen, and members of the executive committee.

Republicans, Democrats At Odds Over Voter ID Laws. The New York Times (9/26, Purnick, 1.21M) reports on the "spreading partisan brawl over new and proposed voting requirements around the country. Republicans say the laws are needed to combat fraud, especially among illegal immigrants. Democrats say there is minimal fraud, if any, and accuse Republicans of suppressing the votes of those least likely to have the required documentation — minorities, the poor and the elderly — who tend to vote for Democrats." Democrats say that in "tight races…the loss of votes could matter in November." In Maricopa County, Arizona's "largest in population, election officials said that 35 percent of new registrations were rejected for insufficient proof of citizenship last year and that 17 percent had been rejected so far this year. It is not known how many of the rejected registrants were not citizens or were unable to prove their citizenship because they had lost or could not locate birth certificates and other documents."

DOJ_NMG_0069522

Spellings Letter Encourages Public School Teachers To Celebrate Christmas. The Washington Times (9/26, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Say you teach in a public school and you want to celebrate Christmas in your classroom with like-minded students, what's a teacher to do? Go right ahead, says Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. We've come across a letter sent to the secretary by a teacher named Karen in Salt Lake City. She writes: 'I'm so frustrated with the U.S. trying to get "Christmas" out of our vocabulary. In a Fox News poll, 96 percent of Americans, people of all faiths, celebrate Christmas. So, my question is: What are we allowed to teach and say in school?'" Spellings replied: Christmas is one of the great joys of the year for many Americans of all ages. In fact, Congress recognized Dec. 25 as a public holiday in 1870. Schools and teachers traditionally have celebrated the secular aspects of Christmas and are free to do so today."

Tierney Criticizes "Pre-Ordained Conclusion" Of NAS Report On Discrimination In Sciences. In his New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) column, John Tierney writes, "I've slogged through enough reports from the National Academy of Sciences to know they're often not shining examples of the scientific method. But -- call me naïve -- I never thought the academy was cynical enough to publish a political tract like 'Beyond Bias and Barriers,' the new report on discrimination against female scientists and engineers." Tierney says the report had a "pre-ordained conclusion: academia must stop favoring male scientists and engineers." The report "says that women are discouraged from going into science because of social pressure and 'unintentional' and 'unconscious' biases -- which may well exist." But the committee that wrote the report "is so determined to blame everything on discrimination that it dismisses other factors without giving them a fair hearing."

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Groups Urge Limits On Proposed AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/26, Geewax) reports, "Consumer advocates and civil libertarians demanded Monday that regulators refrain from approving AT&T's purchase of BellSouth unless the phone companies accept tough restrictions on their $67 billion deal." The AJC continues, "Last week, Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin recommended that the merger be approved, perhaps as soon as the FCC's regular meeting Oct. 12, according to published reports based on unidentified agency sources. Such approval would be unusual, because the Justice Department has not completed its review of the proposed merger's impact on consumers and competition. … While the two phone companies want the FCC to move quickly, consumer groups say regulators should not rush to sign off on a combination that could affect consumers for decades. … 'This merger will haunt the consumer,' Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumers Federation of America, said in a conference call with reporters. When the combined companies strengthen their grip on the marketplace, he said, 'they will use it against the public.'" The AJC notes, "The merger would allow Texas-based AT&T to extend its reach across the South to control nearly half the nation's phone lines, spreading over 22 states. It also would gain full control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest wireless service provider. .. . Consumer groups belonging to the Competition Coalition called on regulators to impose restrictions on the new telecom giant."

Legislative Obstacles Remain For Texas Airfield Bill. The Dallas Morning News (9/26, Reddy) reports, "With four days to go before a congressional recess, Texas lawmakers were still hammering out strategies late Monday to get their Wright amendment legislation past detractors in each chamber." The News continues, "A packed congressional schedule is complicating plans for a quick resolution, despite a breakthrough last week, when Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison won the support of a key senator who had objected to parts of the bill. … The House and the Senate could still pass bills this week that would lift federal flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, though lawmakers said they were unsure exactly how the procedures would play out." The News adds, "Congress is expected to return for a lame-duck session after the November elections, but passing legislation then would face even more hurdles. … The Wright legislation would clear quickly this week – under a procedure that wouldn't even require a formal recorded vote – if its supporters could overcome the objections of Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee. … Ms. Hutchison, R-Texas, won over the chairman of the committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., by agreeing to remove a phrase exempting the deal from antitrust laws and replacing it with other protective language. … But Mr. Leahy has not signed off. The rules of the Senate allow a single member to stand in the way of legislation, forcing the sponsor to line up votes to maneuver around the opposition."

DOJ_NMG_0069523

Brokers Lining Up As Partners To Traditional Players. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Lucchetti, Macdonald) reports, "With NYSE Group Inc. working to finalize its deal with Euronext NV and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. considering whether to buy the 75% of London Stock Exchange PLC it doesn't already own, exchanges look ready to embark on another new chapter, with exchange-like brokers such as Icap PLC and eSpeed Inc. now lining up as possible partners of bigger, more traditional players. These firms are lesser-known than the NYSE and the LSE but are key players in the trading of bonds, currencies and derivatives that are increasingly popular among hedge funds, which control a big slice of the trading on Wall Street."

IBM To Publish Patent Filings Online. The New York Times (9/26, Lohr) reports that IBM "will publish its patent filings on the Web for public review as part of a new policy that the company hopes will be a model for others. If widely adopted, the policy could help to curb the rising wave of patent disputes and patent litigation." IBM's new policy "includes standards like clearly identifying the corporate ownership of patents, to avoid filings that cloak authorship under the name of an individual or dummy company. It also asserts that so-called business methods alone — broad descriptions of ideas, without technical specifics — should not be patentable."

United Airlines Retains Bank To Chart Merger Strategy. The AP (9/26, Carpenter) reports, "Speculation that United Airlines may be destined for an eventual merger with another U.S. carrier intensified Monday with its reported hiring of Goldman Sachs & Co. to explore strategic options." The AP continues, "United, a unit of UAL Corp., has been advocating more industry consolidation for years under CEO Glenn Tilton and is in better position since leaving bankruptcy in February to take part in it." The AP adds, "The report Monday by Crain's Chicago Business that United had hired an investment banker appeared to add credence to widespread industry talk that it could merge with a carrier such as Continental Airlines or Delta Air Lines. … 'It seems to show that United is serious about looking further into it -- it's not just remarks by the CEO,' said Standard and Poor's Corp. analyst Philip Baggaley. … Most observers and airlines think industry consolidation is likely at some point, but it's been hard to predict when and with whom." The AP notes, "Tilton has been increasingly signaling the possible involvement of United, the nation's second-largest carrier, in industry consolidation. He said in Chicago last week that the company is on solid footing to participate in the merger and acquisition market following three years of restructuring in bankruptcy, which ended in February."

Loudeye Gets Antitrust Nod For Nokia Buy. The AP (9/26) reports, "Loudeye Corp., a digital music distributor, on Monday said U.S. regulators approved its acquisition by Finnish cell-phone maker Nokia Inc." The AP continues, "Loudeye said it received early termination of the waiting period from the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department." The AP adds, "In early August, Nokia said it would buy Loudeye for about $60 million, as a way to expand its mobile digital music offerings. … The deal is expected to close in the fourth quarter, and is still pending shareholder approval and other conditions."

EU Ends Antitrust Immunity For Shippers. The AP (9/26) reports, "European Union governments agreed Monday to open up shipping routes to competition from October 2008, ending a 20-year antitrust immunity law for liner conferences -- groups of shipping companies that strike special trade deals." The AP continues, These scheduled sea freight transport carriers -- grouped in cartels -- have been fixing prices since the 1870s, enjoying immunity from antitrust laws across the world." The AP adds, "The European Commission said the EU economy as whole stood to benefit from lower transport prices and more competitive exports that should result from liberalizing the market. It expects the cost of sea containers to drop after price-fixing falls away. … It will in the future be able to apply antitrust rules to shipping routes -- both scheduled and unscheduled -- to and from Europe and within the same country." The AP notes, "The EU executive said last year that the cartel exemption should be scrapped because shipping had changed considerably over the past 20 years and it no longer needed special treatment. … It said it realized that liner conferences still receive antitrust immunity in other parts of the world and would urge other governments to liberalize the sector. … Antitrust regulations are usually decided by EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, but the former Dutch transport minister -- a member of P&O Nedlloyd's supervisory board for 13 years -- bowed out to avoid conflict-of-interest concerns. She resigned from the board when she became commissioner."

DOJ_NMG_0069524

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Blocks Sale Of Alaska Oil And Gas Leases. The New York Times (9/26, Barringer, 1.21M) reports, "The Interior Department's plan to sell oil and natural gas leases within 389,000 acres of shallow lakes and wildlife-rich tundra in northern Alaska was blocked Monday by a federal judge in Anchorage who ruled that the department had failed to do a sufficiently broad analysis of the plan's environmental impact." The Times says, "The ruling was the most recent in a string of legal setbacks for the Bush administration's public-lands policies. In each case, federal judges said the government had failed to adhere to environmental requirements." The Time reports, "Environmental groups had sued to block former Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton's decision in January to lease parts of the Teshekpuk Lake area that had been placed off limits by earlier interior secretaries, from James Watt in the Reagan administration to Bruce Babbitt in the Clinton administration."

Three Maryland E-Coli Cases Not Linked To Bad Spinach. The Washington Post (9/26, B2, Morse) reports, "Maryland public health officials said yesterday that three of the state's four pending cases of E. coli O157 illness are not linked to a nationwide outbreak caused by bad spinach. Officials continue to investigate the death of an 86-year-old Hagerstown woman and hope to receive test results within a week. But those results might prove inconclusive, because of problems associated with a sample. All told, only three of the state's 10 cases have conclusively been linked to the bad bagged spinach from California." On Friday state officials announced "that they had studied 10 recent cases of E. coli O157. As of yesterday, six of the cases were not connected to the spinach; three were connected; and one was inconclusive, officials said. The three positive cases are all children, all of whom are recovering."

Government Climatologists Warn Of Continuing Global Warming. ABC World News (9/25, story 8, 2:35, Gibson) reported on "a grim prediction today from top scientists whose study global warming. They say global warming has gathered so much momentum there is no way to stop earth's average temperature from rising another two degrees by the year 2050, and that will take it to a level hotter than at any time in a million years. The warning came from one of the government's top climatologists and from the National Academy of Sciences."

CBS Evening News (9/25, story 13, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "NASA climate experts reported today that the temperature of the earth has risen so much in the past three decades it's now just two degrees short of its highest temperature in a million years." CBS (Philips) then profiled how the increased temperatures are boosting the British winemaking industry.

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A2, Naik, 2.03M) says the study "finds that, while the world warmed slowly during the century to 1975, it has warmed at a more rapid rate of about 0.2 degrees Celsius (0.36 degrees Fahrenheit) per decade thereafter. The researchers say the global mean temperature is now within one degree Celsius (1.8 degrees Fahrenheit) of the maximum mean temperature of the past million years."

EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program To Reorganize. The Washington Post (9/26, B1, Fahrenthold) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency program charged with cleaning the Chesapeake Bay has decided to reorganize itself, a spokesman said yesterday, conceding that crucial goals for restoring the bay's health by 2010 are unlikely to be met without far-reaching changes. Mike Burke, a spokesman for the 23-year-old Chesapeake Bay Program, said leaders want a greater emphasis on 'implementation' -- carrying out plans to solve the bay's problems. Environmentalists have long called for that, saying the program spends too much time studying pollution and too little trying to stop it. Burke said EPA officials were concerned about their ability to meet promises made amid great fanfare in 2000: a bay with far less pollution and far more crabs, oysters and underwater grass."

DOJ_NMG_0069525

Doctoral Student Examines Skunks' Effect On Martha's Vineyard's Endangered Birds. The New York Times (9/26, Dean) reports on Luanne Johnson, who has been trapping skunks on Martha's Vineyard for three years. By next year, Johnson hopes, "the data she has collected will turn into a dissertation for Antioch University New England, where Ms. Johnson is a doctoral student in environmental studies. She jokes that she will title her project 'Skunks on the Beach.' Among other things, she hopes to help settle an argument that erupts here every summer — nesting season for piping plovers and other endangered shorebirds, when stretches of beach are closed to four-wheel-drive vehicles. Opponents of the closing say the threat to the birds is not vehicles, but predators like skunks."

LATimes Says Bush Must Heed Law On Roadless Forest Policy. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, 918K) editorializes, "Decisions to build new roads in pristine forests should be made only after careful study and deliberation. That was the policy adopted in the Clinton administration, which, after three years of study and public input, in 2001 banned road-building in 58 million acres of forest. But the Bush administration, in a decision marked by neither study nor deliberation, suspended the so-called roadless rule later that year. … Just as President Clinton had the power to institute the roadless policy, President Bush has the authority to change it -- even to change it for the worse. But he does not have the right to change it without the analysis required by federal law."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Norte Valle Ring Member Extradited To US. The Washington Times (9/26, Seper) reports that a federal fugitive "considered by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as one of the most violent and dangerous members of Colombia's Norte Valle cocaine-smuggling ring has been extradited to the United States to stand trial. Jhon Eidelber Cano-Correa, 42, arrived in New York on Friday night, where he was formally placed under arrest by ICE agents. … In October, the Colombian National Police's 'Jungla' unit, working with agents from ICE and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) in Bogota captured Cano-Correa after a brief firefight that left one Colombian official wounded." Cano-Correa "is charged in a July 2004 indictment in New York with drug and money-laundering violations in connection with the Norte Valle Cartel."

Drug Seizures Along US-Mexico Border Reach Record Amounts. According to the Dallas Morning News (9/25, Mclemore), officers at border crossings, Border Patrol agents and state troopers "are finding record amounts of cocaine and marijuana. … With greater enforcement and higher demand, drug trafficking organizations are saturating the border in hopes of getting at least some of their loads across, officials say." The DEA "estimates 65 percent of all narcotics smuggled into the U.S. enters from Mexico. Three of the four major distribution pipelines used by Mexican drug cartels pass through Texas. But for every strategic advance by drug agents, Mexican traffickers try out new ways to bypass law enforcement's attention." The Morning News notes that in June, Karen Tandy "told a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee that about 80 percent of the meth used in the U.S. is distributed by Mexican trafficking organizations and comes from large 'super labs' built on the Mexican side of the border."

Federal Anti-Meth Measure To Take Effect. The Burlington (VT) Free Press (9/25) reports, "Beginning Saturday, when the federal Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act goes into effect, every retailer in the nation that sells certain cold medicines will have to follow the same restrictions. … By restricting the sale of many standard cold medicines, Vermont is ahead of the curve in a region where meth has not become widespread. The new laws are a pre-emptive effort -- or, as State Police Detective Trooper Mike Smith puts it, 'a substantial preventative measure to keep the meth problem at bay.'"

In the Washington Post (9/26, HE1), Francesca Lunzer Kritz writes, "The active ingredient in Sudafed and other oral decongestants, pseudoephedrine will be subject to new federal sales restrictions starting Saturday. Officials hope the limits…will curb illegal production of crystal methamphetamine." Kritz adds, "Although only a small percentage of crystal methamphetamine is made with pseudoephedrine pirated from over-the-counter drugs, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration, use of the illegal drug is far lower in states that restrict pseudoephedrine sales to drugstores only than elsewhere."

DOJ_NMG_0069526

US Gives Tajikistan Boats, Equipment To Combat Drug Trafficking. The AP (9/25) reports the U.S. on Monday "donated patrol boats and electronic equipment to help Tajikistan guard its borders and stem the flow of heroin from neighboring Afghanistan." The U.S. "gave the Tajik Border Protection Committee five patrol boats to be used along the Pyandj River border, as well as more than 100 computers and 60 power generators to be used at desolate checkpoints."

Drug Production Called One Of Afghanistan's Most Dangerous Problems. Bloomberg (9/26) reports Tajikistan and Uzbekistan "appealed for international support to help them fight drug trafficking from neighboring Afghanistan. 'An up-to-date, efficient and capable Afghan border service' is needed to combat drug traffickers, Tajikistan's Foreign Minister Talbak Nazarov told the United nations General Assembly yesterday. Drug production is one of the most dangerous problems facing Afghanistan and poses a threat to regional security, Vladimir Norov, Uzbekistan foreign minister, told the assembly."

NYTimes Blasts House "Gun Decontrol Measure." The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) editorializes, "House sycophants of the National Rifle Association are aiming this week to hobble the federal government's power to revoke the licenses of rogue gun dealers who arm the underworld. A shameless proposal would replace existing law with wrist-slapping penalties and an impossible definition of 'willful intent' that would hamstring efforts to close lawless marketeers." The House proposal "would have stopped federal agents from ever revoking the license of Lou's Loans, the Pennsylvania dealer that sold battlefield weapons to one of the co-conspirators in the 1993 assault on the World Trade Center. What makes this gun decontrol measure truly brazen is recent data from the Justice Department, which reported a startling jump of nearly 50 percent last year in gun crime victims, to 477,000."

IMMIGRATION:

House, Senate Negotiators Agree On New Funds To Secure Border. The New York Times (9/26, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "House and Senate negotiators agreed Monday evening to spend $1.2 billion to install hundreds of miles of fence and vehicle barriers along the Mexican border as part of a $34.8 billion spending plan for the Department of Homeland Security for the coming year." The border security spending "is just one of several major policy initiatives that Congressional leaders decided to insert into the annual appropriations bill. Others include a mandate for antiterrorism steps at high-risk chemical plants nationwide and the reorganization of the Federal Emergency Management Agency." Democrats at the conference committee meeting "Monday evening also tried to add about $1 billion in spending for areas including mass transit security, aviation explosives detection research and port security grants." But "with the Republicans holding a majority, each of the measures that Democrats proposed were defeated, one after the other, in party-line votes."

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Rogers, 2.03M) reports, "The political centerpiece for Republicans -- just weeks before the midterm elections -- is an estimated $1.19 billion to help pay for fencing, vehicle barriers and new technology to police the U.S. border with Mexico. Hundreds of millions would also be added to equip the Coast Guard and increase the air and marine capabilities of customs and border patrols."

CQ (9/26, Sandler) reports that "with little time left and little agreement on how to use it, it appears possible that the House GOP's tactic of pushing through narrowly focused border security bills to put political pressure on Democrats might fail to yield either legislative or political results. By Monday night, the fiscal 2007 Homeland Security spending bill (HR 5441) was ruled out as a vehicle for any of the provisions. " House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "was working to include in the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill (HR 5122) language that would make it easier to deport or deny entry to immigrant gang members, his spokesman said." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "appeared confident that his chamber would clear another bill (HR 6061), which would authorize 700 miles of fencing along the southwestern border with Mexico. He filed a cloture petition, setting up a vote to end debate on the measure for Wednesday." But "even that was not without complications. Frist, working with a tight clock, took procedural steps to attach military tribunal legislation (S 3930) to the fence bill if an agreement cannot be reached on how to consider that measure separately." And "no one is yet ready to say the leadership has the 60 votes necessary to invoke cloture on the fence bill."

NYTimes Blasts Bush, GOP Bills. The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) editorializes that "the Republican-controlled House" is "passing a pre-election lineup of narrow enforcement measures packaged to give voters a false impression of resolve." President Bush "has even given up talking a good game on immigration: he says he will sign the Republican legislation as a 'first step' toward the real reform he has said he wants but has done depressingly little to achieve." The Times adds, "The House's election hunt for border-security sound bites shows how susceptible to demagoguery the debate can be. Anti-immigrant fervor is a flame that spreads easily. But leadership can help people look beyond resentment and fear. Once upon a time, Mr. Bush was a sense-talking governor from a border state who understood this. Now he has joined the leaders of his party in calling on the nation to cower behind electric fences, searchlights and squad cars. It's painful to see what he has turned into, and frustrating, in these days of immigration panic, to keep waiting for a real leader to emerge."

DOJ_NMG_0069527

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

DOJ Support For 9th Circuit Split Seen As Possible Sea Change. The ABA Journal (9/26, McDonough) reports, "After nearly 35 years of debate over dividing the nation's largest federal appellate court, the Justice Department has reversed its previous stance and is now weighing in on the side of a split." The Journal continues, "Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Sept. 20, Rachel Brand, assistant attorney general in the DOJ's Office of Legal Policy, stated the time is right to split the overburdened, oversized 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is based in San Francisco." The Journal adds, "Brand was one of 12 witnesses—six in favor of a split, six opposed—who testified about the legislation, which has been introduced by Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Ensign, R-Nev. Their bill would leave California and Hawaii in the 9th Circuit and create a 12th Circuit to cover Alaska, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Nevada and Arizona. It also would add seven more judges, likely to remain in the 9th Circuit. … Legislation to split the circuit passed the House last year, but never reached a vote in the Senate." The Journal notes, "The Justice Department's new position and a growing interest in Congress in splitting the circuit—seven circuit restructuring bills have been introduced this Congress alone—may indicate a sea change. … The Justice Department is one of the most frequent litigants in the federal courts. In 1998, the last time the department weighed in on the issue, it opposed the split. But Brand said the DOJ has since come to the conclusion that, while the 9th Circuit has responded to its rapidly growing caseload by being 'innovative and creative,' it has done so in large part by delegating certain functions to nonjudges. That will only work for so long, she said."

WSJournal Defends FREE Judiciary Seminars. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "The conflict-of-interest fetish continues to interfere with normal human relations, so it's a relief when someone sounds rational on the subject. That now includes the Judicial Conference of the U.S., which last week adopted new disclosure rules for federal judges who attend privately funded education seminars." The Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment (FREE) and Montana State University "have for 15 years co-sponsored seminars in Bozeman, where federal judges learn more about the effects and trade-offs of environmental public policy. Such events are common -- typically hosted by universities, public policy institutes or legal groups like the American Bar Association -- and useful in promoting a better-informed judiciary." But a group called the Community Rights Counsel has "been on a mission to stop federal judges from attending FREE seminars. … Democrats should leave FREE alone. And if they really care about legal conflicts of interest, how about going after the trial lawyers who are double dipping on asbestos and silicosis lawsuits? There's a real scandal."

Roberts, Alito To Stay In Cert Pool This Term. The Legal Times (9/26, Mauro) reports, "As they enter their second term, the Supreme Court's two newest justices have decided, at least temporarily, to stick with the Court's clerk-pooling arrangement, despite concerns that it gives law clerks too much power." The Times continues, "In brief interviews in recent weeks, both Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. said they will stay in the "cert pool," as it is called, for the current term. … Roberts said he will participate on a 'year-to-year basis,' and Alito said the same; both indicated they are still weighing the issues that have been raised. But Alito said that during his first term it was apparent to him that certiorari petitions need to be read closely to determine if they are worth granting -- suggesting some need for pooling the workload." The Times adds, "The arrangement, devised in 1972, radically changed what happens when a petition for review or certiorari comes in to the Court. Instead of being reviewed separately by nine clerks and/or nine justices, it is scrutinized for the pool, presumably in greater depth, by one clerk, who then writes a memo for all the justices in the pool. .. . The pool drew little criticism when only four or five justices participated. But ever since the late Thurgood Marshall left the Court, in 1991, Justice John Paul Stevens has been the only justice outside the pool, preferring to have his clerks take a separate look at petitions, partly as a backstop for the pool."

DOJ_NMG_0069528

Lawmakers Urge Creation Of Food Safety Agency. USA Today (9/26, Davis, Bleimes, 2.27M) reports, "While the search continues for the origin of an E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach, lawmakers are renewing calls for the creation of a single government agency responsible for the safety of the nation's food supply." Last year, "the Safe Food Act of 2005 was introduced in the Senate by Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., and in the House by Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn. The bill proposed the creation of a Food Safety Administration to assume all responsibility for food safety and oversight." USA Today adds, "Proponents say such an agency would streamline the process of preventing, tracking and containing outbreaks, which is currently handled by 12 federal agencies and subagencies." But "the legislation has remained in congressional committees since its introduction." DeLauro "has requested a hearing before the House Energy and Commerce Committee before the current session of Congress adjourns on Oct. 6." Durbin "has also requested a hearing in the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee."

Bloggers To Join Bush For Signing Of Spending Database Law. The Washington Times (9/26, Dinan, 88K) reports President Bush "has invited bloggers to join him today as he signs into law a bill creating a database of federal spending -- a recognition of their role in forcing the bill through Congress over the objections of senior senators and an indication of how much bloggers are changing the political process." A spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn, the driving force behind the bill, said, "The bloggers mobilized Congress. … It really does represent a revival of basic democratic values: that active citizens using tools of technology really can steer the political process. And what happened was profoundly subversive to the established political order."

WSJournal Gives GOP A "D" For Fiscal Conservatism. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "As Republicans lurch toward November, they're trying to reclaim their birthright as fiscal conservatives. So far they're moved up to a D from an F, with a chance to still grab a gentleman's C." The House "passed an 'earmark' reform to bring more transparency to the runaway process of sticking pork into appropriations bills," but it "won't apply to the 10 spending bills the House has already passed this year. Meanwhile, the Senate has yet to act, and the new House rule expires at the end of this Congress. … In a better sign of progress, President Bush will today sign the 'Federal Transparency Act,' which will create a searchable public database of some $1 trillion worth of federal grants, contracts and loans."

Democrats Hope To Use Majority To Force US Withdrawal From Iraq. The Hill (9/26, Cusack) reports Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) "will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win control of the House next year, but his main goal in 2007 does not fall within his panel's jurisdiction." Rangel said, "I can't stop this war." But when "pressed on how he could stop the war even if Democrats control the House during the last years of President Bush's second term, Rangel paused before saying, 'You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?'" The Hill adds Rangel's "views on funding the war are shared by many of his colleagues – especially within the 73-member Out of Iraq Caucus." Some Democratic legislators "want to halt funding for the war immediately, while others say they would allocate money for activities such as reconstruction, setting up international security forces, and the ultimate withdrawal of U.S. troops." Rep. Lynne Woolsey "is among the Democrats in Congress who are hoping to control the power of the purse in 2007 to force an end to the war. Woolsey and some of her colleagues note that Congress helped force the end of Vietnam War by refusing to pay for it." But "having lost the last two elections in part because of national security issues, Democratic leaders have been reluctant to spell out their exact Iraq war funding strategy." Rep. Woolsey said, "I don't think the Democratic leadership should put that out at the moment."

Democrats Say White House Rhetoric Distorts War On Terror. In the New York Times' "White House Memo" column (9/26), Jim Rutenberg says that as the White House "intensifies a campaign to paint its opponents as wobbly in the war on terrorism, Democrats say it is engaging in a rhetorical device that subtly distorts their positions to make them seem extreme or misguided, raising phantom positions and implying they belong to Democrats before knocking them down as dangerous." Current and former administration officials "say some cases cited by the Democrats are legitimate interpretations of Democratic positions through a deductive, if Republican, lens. Other times, they say, Democrats were seeing things that were not there." Both sides agree "that the White House is seeking to draw as sharp a distinction between Republicans and Democrats on terrorism as possible, something it has done skillfully in the past two election cycles. And so far this year it has lived up to its reputation of being particularly adept at using carefully chosen language to cast its opponents as unflatteringly as possible — and to define their positions for voters before they can define them themselves." President Bush, "not known for particularly smooth oratory, could well be remembered for his perceived use of rhetorical sleight of hand that consistently ensnares and enrages his rivals. It is a skill at which even Democrats marvel." White House press secretary Tony Snow "accused Democrats of engaging in 'exegetical work' in seeking evidence of something that was not there and 'protesting too much' in the face of accusations that Mr. Bush was not, in fact, hurling." Snow said, "I don't think the president's ever said the Democrats want to negotiate with these people. He's trying to make a dramatic point you can't reason with them. I just don't understand it when you express umbrage at a statement that wasn't aimed at you." Snow added, "I defy you to find a directly personal insult from the president that would compare with, or that is as bald or direct as, calling him a loser or a liar."

DOJ_NMG_0069529

GOP House Leaders Indecisive On Date For Leadership Elections. The Hill (9/26, O'Connor) reports House GOP leaders "cannot decide whether to hold leadership elections the week after the midterm elections. Their uncertainty is a sign of Republican unease and suggests that officeholders may postpone the contests for their jobs if the party suffers heavy losses." The caucus elects its leadership "during an organizing conference traditionally held the first week after the election, but this year, leaders appear torn on when to hold that conference." The House Administration Committee "has scheduled a conference meeting for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week after the midterm, when new lawmakers come to Washington for orientation. But Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said last week that leaders had not yet decided whether to hold elections that day."

CMS Names New Acting Director. The AP (9/25, Freking) reports, "A lawyer who has served in two Bush administrations has been named the acting chief of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, federal officials said Monday. Leslie Norwalk, 40, has served on the senior leadership team at the agency for the past five years, currently as the deputy administrator. She will succeed Mark McClellan, who recently announced that he is stepping down." As the acting director, Norwalk "will oversee the government health care programs for the elderly and the poor. The agency is responsible for $1 out of every $3 spent on health care in the United States."

Congress' Medicare Policy Said To Defy Laws Of Economics. Dr. Lawrence A. Hunter, former staff director of the Joint Economic Committee, wrote in The Hill (9/25), "In an attempt to help stop spiraling inflation during 1970's, Congress thought it would try placing price controls on the fees doctors could charge under Medicare." The price controls "failed completely to keep Medicare costs down." This happened because "Medicare is not a free market; it is a gigantic welfare program in which the taxes people pay as workers to support the program are completely disconnected from the benefits they receive as Medicare recipients." Yet "despite this confirmation of the laws of economics, Congress persists in its hubris to eclipse the economic laws of nature and continues to impose price controls on doctors' fees."

Federal Agencies Hiring Contractors In Times Of Crisis. The Washington Post (9/26, A19, Lee, 748K) reports, "Increasingly, federal agencies are outsourcing toll-free lines in times of crisis -- both to ensure that every call from a citizen is answered and to free agency staff members to deal with the crisis itself, federal officials said. Federal contractors routinely field calls from Americans worried about friends or relatives when a hurricane hits, when terrorist bombs go off in places such as Bali, Madrid and London and, most recently, when war broke out in Lebanon." As an example, the Post notes, "When a Department of Veterans Affairs laptop computer was stolen in May, putting the sensitive personal information of millions of veterans at risk, VA officials sought to quell concerns by providing a toll-free number to call. … The people answering the phone, though, were not federal civil servants at the department's D.C. headquarters but contract workers in commercial call centers in far-flung places such as North Hollywood, Calif., Lock Haven, Pa., and Sergeant Bluff, Iowa."

DOJ_NMG_0069530

Report Suggests Federal Government Tighten Hiring Procedures. The Washington Post (9/26, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that in response to complaints about the federal hiring process, the government has tried to speed things up. According to the Post, "Agencies are increasingly using computers to decrease processing time. The Office of Personnel Management has developed a 45-day hiring model. Still, hiring takes time, in part because many jobs require medical and security clearances (and some background checks can take a year or longer)." The Post adds, "The larger question, however, is whether the government is identifying and selecting the best applicants. Public opinion surveys suggest relatively few college graduates see the government as a first choice when job-hunting, and a new study by the Merit Systems Protection Board suggests that the government needs to do a better job of selling itself. … To address these challenges, the report recommends that the government tighten hiring procedures to emphasize quality and not just speed."

Critics Say Capitol Visitor Center Has Become Boondoggle. NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 8, 2:40, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "Critics call it the 'Pig Dig.' A massive construction project they say is pigging out on Federal tax dollars right in Congress' front yard. The Capitol visitor center, now 85% complete, three stories, all underground, state-of-the-art theaters, a great hall, even a 450-seat auditorium. The goal tighter security and an improved learning experience for millions of tourists. The problems, critics say…." Steve Ellis, Government Spending Analyst: "We've created this Taj Mahal on the Capitol grounds, a boondoggle." Reid: "In 1995 it was projected to cost $100 million and to be ready in 1999. But the digging didn't begin until 2002. By then the cost had ballooned to $265 million and kept growing and growing and growing. The latest estimate nearly $600 million. And it won't be ready until late next year at the earliest. Just last week, some members of Congress gave the project their Golden Drain award -- the qualifications?" Rep. Dave Obey: "Pitiful oversight, exploding costs and embarrassing results." Reid: "Supporters of the project say its scope changed after 9/11, necessitating expensive security upgrades."

OTHER NEWS:

Data On Home Prices Add To Evidence Of Cooling Real Estate Market. ABC World News (9/25, story 10, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "New numbers on housing market today highlight on real estate is cooling. The nation's group of realtors says a key measure has fallen for the first time in a decade. Median price sold last month was $225,000, down almost 2% from the same period a year before."

The New York Times (9/26, Peters, 1.21M) reports that "while the market slide is almost certainly not over, the report suggested that it might be beginning to ease. Existing-home sales have been falling steadily in recent months, but the month-to-month decline in August was the smallest since March." Sales "dropped 0.5 percent from July to August, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.3 million units, the Realtors association said. That compares with a decline from June to July of 4.1 percent. … If the sales trends are leveling off, however, prices still appear set to fall further."

CBS Evening News (9/25, story 9, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) said that "if you've got a house to sell, the numbers are not exactly going in the right direction. Home prices are down for the first time in more than a decade."

On NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 6, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M), David Lereah, National Association of Realtors chief economist, was shown saying,, "The sellers market has turned into a buyers market. That's why prices have come down over the last 12 months. And that is why they will continue to come down over the next six months." NBC (Thompson) added, "The biggest drop came in the Northeast, a 3.9% decline from August 2005 to this August. Followed by the South and Midwest. Only in the West did prices go up."

The Washington Post (9/26, D1, Tse, 748K) quotes Lereah characterizing 2007 as "the year of modest recovery." He added, "Prices got too high. … Buyers are not going to buy unless prices come down. That's the only way the bleeding will stop on the sale side."

USA Today (9/26, Knox, 2.27M) says home prices "are projected to fall for the rest of the year." The median-priced "US single-family detached home -- half cost more, half less -- fell 1.7% in August to $225,700, compared with a year ago. The decline is no doubt jarring to sellers." The price drop "was also sharp, the second-steepest in 38 years." The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Petruno, 918K) runs a similar report under the headline "Homes Data Cause Jitters," while the Washington Times (9/26, Hill, 88K) titles its story "Median Home Price Takes A Sharp Drop."

DOJ_NMG_0069531

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today the Dow was up more than 67 points [to close at 11,574.81]. The NASDAQ was up more than 30 points [to close at 2,249.07] on today's trading." USA Today (9/26, Shell, 2.27M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500 "gained 11.59 points, or 0.9%, to 1326.37, topping its May 5 high of 1325.76. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001. It is up 6.3% in 2006." The Financial Times (9/26, O'Doherty) reports "investors took heart from comments by a Federal Reserve official that slowing economic growth would probably temper inflation." The Wall Street Journal (9/26, McKay, 2.03M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock prices.

Slower Economy Boosting Bonds. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A1, Hudson, 2.03M) reports, "In one of the bigger surprises in financial markets this year, a growing sense that the economy is slowing and inflation receding is fueling a rally in the nation's bond markets, pushing Treasury-bond yields to their lowest levels in months." The rally "may help to shape the outlook for both the economy and for investments in coming months. Some doubt the rally will last," but "if it does, lower interest rates could help buoy stock prices, make it easier for investors to make potentially risky bets with borrowed money, and ultimately help soften the blow from a weaker economy and a cooling housing market."

Crude Oil Prices Rise Sharply After Dipping Below $60. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, C3, Farivar, 2.03M) reports, "Crude-oil futures ended sharply higher after another drop below $60 failed to stick and comments by OPEC's president offered support. Prices dipped below $60 a barrel for the second time in recent months but quickly rebounded above that psychologically important level as traders were forced to buy back previously sold positions. The November crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled 90 cents higher at $61.45 a barrel after hitting an intraday low of $59.52, the lowest level for a front-month crude contract since early March." The Journal says, "prices dipped early in the day on an announcement made by BP PLC late Friday that it would increase oil flows from its Prudhoe Bay field in Alaska." However, many traders took "recent comments by OPEC officials to suggest that the cartel will cut production to prevent prices from falling significantly below $60 a barrel.

The Financial Times (9/26, Morrison, Blas) reports, "Oil exporting countries may consider a cut in output after crude prices fell below $60 a barrel on Monday for the first time in six months." OPEC ministers "are understood to be concerned about the drop in oil prices, which are down almost a quarter from their recent peaks. They have discussed the prospect of trimming production ahead of the oil cartel's next ministerial meeting in Nigeria in December, according to Opec officials." The Times says, "The oil price fall over the past month has been accompanied by investor selling in oil and other commodity markets, mainly on concerns that economic growth in the US is slowing."

The New York Times (9/26 , 1.21M) reports, "Whether oil prices will drift back up or continue their general slide is a matter of fierce debate." The Times says, "Noncommercial buyers, which are generally pension, mutual and hedge funds, poured money into oil and other commodities in recent years, in part because they thought that the growing emerging-market economies had created a so-called supercycle that guaranteed price increases. In recent weeks, they have exited the market rapidly as prices started to fall ... ."

Rice Calls Clinton's Statements On Bush And Bin Laden "Flatly False." The New York Post's cover story this morning (9/26, Bishop), titled "Rice Boils Over At Bubba: Rips 'Flatly False' Claim On Bush's Bid To Get Bin Laden," reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "accused Bill Clinton of making 'flatly false' claims that the Bush administration didn't lift a finger to stop terrorism before the 9/11 attacks. Rice hammered Clinton, who leveled his charges in a contentious weekend interview with Chris Wallace of Fox News Channel, for his claims that the Bush administration 'did not try' to kill Osama bin Laden in the eight months they controlled the White House before the Sept. 11 attacks. 'The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false - and I think the 9/11 commission understood that,' Rice said during a wide-ranging meeting with Post editors and reporters. 'What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years,' Rice added." According to the Post, "Her strong rebuttal was the Bush administration's first response to Clinton's headline-grabbing interview on Fox on Sunday."

DOJ_NMG_0069532

The White House Bulletin/US News (9/25) reported, "Already irked at former President Clinton's comments on Fox News Sunday about the Bush administration's handling of the war on Iraq, a senior aide today said she was irked by the ex-president's charge that the Bush team wasn't looking for Osama bin Laden hard enough." Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend said, "I take offense at that. I think it's unfair to suggest, for whatever the agreements or disagreements are between the two administrations in terms of their approach, to suggest than anybody just doesn't take this very seriously, doesn't want to stop the next attack -- that's what I say offends me. It offends me, the notion that anybody wants to see that happen again or isn't doing everything they believe that legitimately is in their power to do it." The Bulletin adds Townsend "described the President and administration as deeply involved in the hunt for bin Laden. But she didn't sound angry with Clinton. In fact, she was quite diplomatic in addressing his outburst to Fox host Chris Wallace when he asked if Clinton had done enough to get bin Laden." Townsend said, "It appeared to me that in the heat of the moment the president was angry, he felt attacked and he reacted."

Clinton's Fox "Outburst" May Have Been A Signal To Democrats. ABC and NBC both ran detailed stories on President Clinton's Fox News Sunday interview. ABC World News (9/25, story 4, 2:20, Gibson) said the "issue of terrorism helped provoke an extraordinary outburst" from Clinton. But "was he really mad or using anger to make a larger point?" ABC (Harris) added, "Bill Clinton was visibly irate, leaning forward in his chair…interrupting…even taunting the interviewer, who asked whether he'd done enough as President to get Osama bin Laden." Clinton's advisers "say he was doing more than defending his legacy. He was sending a message to fellow Democrats, they say." Clinton spokesman Jay Carson: "We cannot continue to allow Republicans to use their tactic of smear and fear to win in this next election. President Clinton's not going to allow that to happen. And he thinks Democrats shouldn't, either." Harris: "Unlike Michael Dukakis, Al Gore and John Kerry, who many believe failed to effectively combat efforts to distort their image, the Clintons believe the Democrats have to push back hard."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 3, 3:20, Williams, 9.87M) said Clinton "ended up in a combative exchange" with host Chris Wallace. NBC ran a significant clip of the Fox interview, then spoke with David Gergen, who said, "He came off a terrific week as ex-President and raised more than $7 billion for worthy causes and walked into an interview with Wallace which he thought was going to be about the initiative. And he got sandbagged by this question. The question from Chris's point of view was legitimate but from Clinton's point of view was, you're trying to sandbag me with a question that echoes conservative critics that…tried to set me up as the guy who failed to get bin Laden and therefore I'm responsible for 9/11. The President completely rejects that."

Morris Says "Real" Clinton Emerged In Interview. In his column in The Hill (9/26), Dick Morris writes, "From behind the benign façade and the tranquilizing smile, the real Bill Clinton emerged" during the interview. "There he was on live television, the man those who have worked for him have come to know – the angry, sarcastic, snarling, self-righteous, bombastic bully, roused to a fever pitch. The truer the accusation, the greater the feigned indignation. … The ex-president is fully justified in laying eight months of the blame for the failure to kill or catch bin Laden at the doorstep of George W. Bush. But he should candidly acknowledge that eight years of blame fall on him."

Author Says Clinton Does Not Understand Meaning Of Truth. In a Los Angeles Times (9/26, 918K) op-ed, novelist Andrew Klavan says Clinton "has never understood what the meaning of 'is' is, the fact that some things happened and others didn't, that some things are true and others simply are not. He believes that his legacy will be created in the spin cycle of history rather than in the fitful but persistent human search for history's truth. Of course he panics and rages like a child when the spin goes the wrong way, when he is given his portion of the blame for encouraging Bin Laden through his military retreat from Somalia or for allowing the terrorist to escape by refusing to put a kill order on him. He thinks reality itself is being wrestled away from him, that he can wrestle it back and mold it into the shape he wants it to have. But he's wrong. That's just 'is' being is. That's just 'truth' bearing away the victory."

Both Parties Seek Edge On Issues In Congress As Midterm Elections Loom. The New York Times (9/26, Zernike, Hulse, 1.21M) reports Republicans and Democrats "scrambled Monday to gain the advantage in their final week before breaking to campaign for crucial midterm elections, with Republicans trying to push through bills on national security and Democrats trying to keep the focus on the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq." Though Republicans had "resolved a major party disagreement over the treatment and trials for terrorism suspects, a new dispute emerged," as Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "said he thought a crucial provision of the legislation was unconstitutional and would doom the bill before the Supreme Court." Meanwhile, Democrats "convened a session with three former high-ranking military officers who harshly criticized Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and said the Bush administration's failure to adjust its strategy as the conflict unfolded was immoral." The Democrats "also seized on the newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate concluding that the war had fueled the threat from terrorists to argue that the war had made the country less safe." Republicans had "hoped to use the month before the campaign break to emphasize their national security initiatives, but they have repeatedly run into trouble."

DOJ_NMG_0069533

The New York Times (9/26, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "There is little evidence that Republicans are having success in altering the political climate in the most competitive House and Senate races. Polls this past weekend showed Republicans trailing in Senate races in Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania. In Indiana, Representative John Hostettler, a Republican, is trailing his Democratic opponent by double digits, according to a new poll."

GOP Insiders Now Rate Chances Of Holding House At 50-50. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/25) reported, "Many GOP candidates in tough races are being urged by party leaders to end their campaigns this fall on two issues -- economic security and national security. Specifically, they are being encouraged to use the following talking points: President Bush and the Republican majority in Congress will keep America safer in the war on terrorism than the Democrats would, and the Republicans would be better stewards on the economy. A final point that the GOP elders want their candidates to emphasize in the windup of the campaign: Democrats would raise taxes, and Republicans wouldn't." Democratic strategists say "their game plan includes the argument that the war in Iraq has proven that the President and the GOP have stumbled into a dangerous foreign-policy swamp. Attempting to capitalize on today's news reports on the controversial National Intelligence Estimate, the Democrats will argue that the war in Iraq is actually hindering the overall war on terror by diverting resources, over-stretching the military, and stirring up Islamic radicals." Meanwhile, a senior Republican adviser "with strong ties to the White House tells U.S. News and the Bulletin that GOP insiders now rate the prospect of Republicans holding their majority in the House at 50-50. A few weeks, ago, the internal estimate was only 30-70."

The Washington Times (9/26, Hallow, 88K) reports there has been "a palpable shift in the mood in Washington in recent weeks. No longer are insiders in both parties sharing predictions of a Democratic rout of Republicans." Some observers "on both sides had expected an election debacle for the Republicans, driven by the Iraq war, high gas prices and the perception that a Republican-led Washington can neither shoot nor spend straight. Now those perceptions have changed." A "58 percent majority of Democratic insiders polled by National Journal, as well as an overwhelming 94 percent of Republican insiders, say the Republican National Committee is doing a better job for November than the Democratic National Committee."

House Republicans Said To Be Relying On Negative Ads. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Hook, 918K) reports while President Bush "and national GOP leaders are attacking Democrats on such big issues as national security and America's role in the world, individual Republicans are hitting their opponents hard — below the belt, some critics say — on personal and local issues." Mudslinging is "crucial to the Republican plan for this year's midterm elections, because the party's hold on power will probably hinge on shifting attention from the unpopular war in Iraq and other national issues that cut against them." Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee chief of staff, said, "When people are looking at national issues that are not breaking our way, what you want to do is focus on your opponent. You've got to play the field's conditions. They demand very tough tactics." Cole "spelled out that approach in a recent strategy memo to House Republicans: 'Define your opponent immediately and unrelentingly.... Do not let up — keep the tough ads running right up to election day. Don't make the mistake of pulling your ads in favor of a positive rotation the last weekend.'" The Times adds Republican incumbents "this year began running attack ads earlier than ever. But the hardest-hitting are yet to come." Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said, "You haven't seen the majority of the negative ads yet."

Congressional Republicans Not Running From Bush's Fundraising. The New York Times (9/26, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports Republicans "do not expect to

DOJ_NMG_0069534

be riding President Bush's record to re-election this fall. But they are trying to ride his gravy train — as quietly as possible." Bush "scooped up $1.7 million for Republicans in Connecticut and Ohio on Monday, at fund-raisers that, like so many of his events this campaign season, took place in private homes behind closed doors. He lunched in Greenwich, at a home overlooking the Long Island Sound, raising $700,000 for the Connecticut Republican Party before dashing off to Ohio to help Senator Mike DeWine." Three House Republicans "from Connecticut — Representatives Nancy Johnson, Rob Simmons and Christopher Shays — face tight re-election races, but only one, Mr. Shays, whose district includes Greenwich, showed up for the afternoon affair at the home of the investment banker L. Scott Frantz." Shays said, "He is helping us to raise money and get out the vote and that is very helpful. You know and I know that my opponent is running as if President Bush is up for re-election, and he obviously isn't." The Times adds such "private events — five are planned for this week alone — give Mr. Bush a chance to mingle with donors out of the earshot of reporters, and far from photographers who might capture him with candidates leery of being viewed as too close to the White House." As of Monday, the Republican National Committee said, "Mr. Bush had raised nearly $176 million for Republican candidates this election cycle. By week's end, that figure will rise; Mr. Bush's schedule includes an 'Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin Victory 2006' reception on Tuesday (closed); an event on Wednesday for Bob Corker, the Republican Senate candidate in Tennessee (closed); a reception in Birmingham on Thursday for Alabama's governor, Bob Riley (open); and another Ohio fundraiser on Thursday, for Representative Deborah Pryce (closed)."

The AP (9/26, Lester) reports President Bush "combined two fundraising trips for threatened GOP incumbents Monday with a tour of a family-run manufacturing business he pointed to as proof that his tax cuts are helping the economy. But the most powerful economic news could be found at the gas stations all over Cincinnati, where gas could be bought for a little more than $2 a gallon." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said that 'everyone notices gas prices.' He scoffed at suggestions the administration is pushing prices down just before elections, saying people are crediting Bush 'with the kind of magisterial power unknown to any other human being.'" The AP adds Bush "advocated making his tax cuts permanent, a frequent theme at stops around the country. He said such a move would help small businesses like Meyer Tool. During his tour of the plant, Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio was close by his side. DeWine was criticized when he did not appear with Bush on some earlier visits." Bush "raised almost $1 million for DeWine, who is in a close re-election contest with Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown."

The Cincinnati Enquirer (9/26, Wilkinson, 212K) reports President Bush came to Cincinnati "to help DeWine tap once again into Indian Hill's almost bottomless well of Republican campaign money." Bush traveled "to the Indian Hill home of John Barrett, CEO of Western & Southern Financial Group, for a DeWine fundraising event that was expected to raise at least $1 million for DeWine's tough re-election campaign against Democrat Sherrod Brown."

The Washington Post (9/26, A4, Fletcher, 748K) reports the Connecticut and Ohio events "underscored both his continued ability to attract donations and his continued unpopularity with much of the public." Bush "has been featured in the ads of Democratic congressional candidates across the country who are trying to tie the unpopular president to GOP candidates. At the same time, many Republican candidates have chosen to stay out of public view when with the president, even while seeking his help to raise money. The president's two events yesterday were among five closed fundraisers that he is scheduled to take part in this week."

CNN Poll Finds Bush's Approval Rating At 42%. CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Blitzer) reported, "In the lead up to the battle for Congress, President Bush's approval rating is holding relatively steady in our brand new poll. Forty-two percent of those surveyed now say they approve of the way Mr. Bush is doing his job. A majority, 55 percent, still disapprove. The President's approval rating has been in the low 40s in our poll since mid-August, increasing from 37 percent back in June."

Bush Said To Lack Backing Of A "Silent Majority." In his Washington Post column (9/26, A21), E.J. Dionne says, "What could prove to be the most important factor in the 2006 elections is overlooked because it is unseen: The Republicans cannot try to curry favor with a 'silent majority' that favors the Iraq war because a majority of Americans, both vocal and quiet, have come to see the war as a mistake. President Bush's defenders have cast opponents of the war as weak on terrorism. Yesterday, Vice President Cheney accused Democrats of 'resignation and defeatism.' But the charges have not taken hold, because most Americans don't agree with the premise linking the war on terror with the war in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0069535

Snow To Raise Funds For GOP Candidates. The AP (9/26, Pickler) reports White House press secretary Tony Snow is "taking his gift of gab across the country in the coming weeks to raise money for Republican candidates, an unusual task for the president's top spokesman." But the "former Fox News commentator is in-demand on the GOP circuit. He said he decided to help maintain the party's majority in Congress after some consideration of his proper role — and that doesn't include a lot of red meat rhetoric like some speakers offer at partisan events." Snow said, "They asked, and I thought about it a lot and we went back and forth. It's one of those things where I certainly want to help the president. But you have to make sure it's a fine line, and that's why I don't want to get into opponent bashing."

House GOP Leaders, Rove To Press Lobbyists For Funds. Roll Call (9/26, Ackley, Ben Pershing) reports with "only a few days left before they leave town for the campaign trail, House Republican leaders — with an assist from White House strategist Karl Rove — will mount one final push this week for the financial support of GOP lobbyists." On Thursday afternoon "at the Capitol Hill Club, Rove will join the top six House GOP leaders to address as many as 200 lobbyists, the first large-scale meeting between lobbyists and leaders in recent months." A GOP leadership aide said, "This is a straight-out appeal to [lobbyists] to contribute to Republicans — to remind them what Republicans do not only for their specific industries but for the whole business community." The aide "added that the leaders would emphasize that 'reports of the Republican majority's demise have been greatly exaggerated, and we're coming back.'" Roll Call adds several GOP sources "said the leadership also would reiterate a warning against giving to Democrats that was conveyed by National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) earlier this month to a smaller group of lobbyists and political action committee directors." One said that "part of Thursday's message will be, 'if you're hedging your bets you're making the wrong decision.'"

Control Of House May Not Be Settled In November. The AP (9/26, Espo) reports that it is possible for neither party to emerge from the November 8 election with a House majority: "The outcome will be decided by run-off elections in Louisiana and Texas, recounts in a half-dozen races that are too close to call and perhaps a party switch or two. Unprecedented? Yes. Impossible? Absolutely not, given an era of polarization that has produced a presidential election so close the Supreme Court had to settle it, and a 50-50 tie in the Senate." Steve Elmendorf, who was chief of staff to former House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, said, "It means that all of your focus and energy will be on trying to get to 218 in two ways. One, in recounts and trying to make sure you're throwing every legal strategy and lawyer you can find into try and win the recounts. Secondly, you're going to be looking for every potential person on the other side who can switch." The AP adds Speaker Dennis Hastert, when "asked about Democrats who might be approached to become a Republican," said, "I have no one in particular in mind." Hastert said "he doubted any of his rank-and-file would defect."

Both Parties Preparing For Possibly Contested Elections. The AP (9/26, Welsh-Huggins) reports Democrats are "openly lining up election-day teams of lawyers around the country to fight what they allege could be GOP efforts to suppress votes." Republicans "quietly say they have their own strategies for potential problems Nov. 7 but won't give specifics. They say Democrats' concerns are overblown." The parties' "efforts come in the wake of the 2000 recount in Florida and irregularities in Ohio's elections two years ago. Those problems included long lines, a shortage of voting machines and some electronic machines that malfunctioned or miscounted votes. Ohio gave President Bush the White House in 2004."

Landscape Of Battle For Senate Shifting. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A4, Calmes, 2.03M) reports that in Washington state, "disgruntled Democrats have fallen in behind" Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell "after concluding that their protest would only throw the seat to Republicans. Now, her bridge-building and the mistakes of her Republican rival, Mike McGavick, have Democratic leaders in the East resting easier about a seat that topped their endangered list for much of the year." The Washington state race "illustrates the fluidity of the fall finale for Senate control as voters tune in. Republicans are struggling in a hostile climate to protect a 55-45 majority on Election Day. Democrats have to seize nearly every Republican target while losing none of their own." Republicans have "given up on early targets among Democrats from states that backed President Bush's re-election, and are now struggling to keep some of their own red-state seats. Democrats, safe in red states, are campaigning hardest in blue ones, especially New Jersey." Five Republican incumbents "trail in polls. In Tennessee's open-seat contest to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford yesterday released a poll showing he had overtaken Republican Bob Corker. Two other Republican incumbents -- Virginia's George Allen and Arizona's John Kyl -- have seen their once-formidable leads erode to single digits." Meanwhile, Democrats "have grown less worried about three of their seats. Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Amy Klobuchar, seeking Minnesota's open spot, showed wide leads in polls released last week. Yesterday in Maryland, a Baltimore Sun poll showed Rep. Ben Cardin up by 11 points over Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. That leaves New Jersey as Democrats' biggest worry."

DOJ_NMG_0069536

Democrats Hope To Be Competitive In Western States. USA Today (9/26, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports Democrat Gary Trauner's campaign to unseat Republican Barbara Cubin in Wyoming "may not be entirely quixotic. National publications that track elections such as The Cook Political Report and Congressional Quarterly have started paying attention to what once was regarded as a Republican shoo-in." Trauner's chances "could also be affected by broader changes in the Rocky Mountain West, such as strong population growth. Democrats could build on gains they made in the region in 2002 and 2004." Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz "predicted the GOP is 'going to continue to be successful in the Rocky Mountain West because ideologically we stand with voters, while Democrats have taken positions contrary to the views of a majority of voters.'" USA adds that still, in 2004, "at least below the president on the ballot, more splotches of blue appeared in the largely red region, as moderate Democrats with strong local ties won key races."

House GOP Boosts Contribution Levy. The Hill (9/26, Bolton) reports the "most endangered House Republican lawmakers have been asked by their leaders to give $75,000 to party coffers, significantly more than was asked of rank-and-file members two years ago, a sign of how desperate party leaders are to raise money when their individual donor receipts are down and lobbyists are increasing their contributions to Democrats." Rank-and-file Republicans "are being asked to give $75,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC): $25,000 or 50 percent more than they were supposed to give in the last election cycle." Committee chairmen have "been asked to give $200,000, or $50,000 (33 percent) more than last cycle, according to one chairman." Even lawmakers "who are fighting for their political lives, such as GOP Reps. Jim Gerlach (Pa.) and John Sweeney (N.Y.), have been asked to contribute $75,000 to party coffers." The increase "of individual giving targets is surprising because the overall fundraising goal for the program is the same as in 2004: around $18 million, according to a Republican who helped organize the effort last cycle."

Blue Dogs' PAC Raises $1 Million For First Time. The Hill (9/26, Hearn) reports, "Looking to shore up their influence in a more evenly divided House next year, conservative Blue Dog Democrats reached a fundraising milestone in August, raising more than $1 million for their PAC for the first time." The 37-member Blue Dog Coalition "has raised nearly $1.1 million for its PAC so far this election cycle and has doled out $600,000 in contributions, dwarfing the fundraising totals of other PACs associated with groups of lawmakers, according to figures recently filed with the Federal Election Commission." The 43-member New Democrat Coalition, "in contrast, raised only $490,000 in the same period." The Blue Dogs' "cohesion and visibility among House Democrats has contributed to their fundraising prowess. Most of the group's members are white, conservative Democrats and hail from red states. All share a desire to balance the budget." The group has "added cachet. With Democrats predicted to gain seats in November, many corporate PACs are looking to curry favor with Democrats, especially those who have been sympathetic to business interests."

Former Allen Acquaintances Say He Used Racist Slurs In 1970s And '80s. Sen. George Allen's campaign faces a new controversy over his alleged use of racial epithets while an undergraduate at the University of Virginia. The story was initially reported by Salon.com, but relied on only one named source, Dr. Ken Shelton. A subsequent New York Times report also named a second source. Salon.com (9/24, Scherer) reported, "Three former college football teammates of Sen. George Allen say that the Virginia Republican repeatedly used an inflammatory racial epithet and demonstrated racist attitudes toward blacks during the early 1970s." Dr. Ken Shelton, "a white radiologist in North Carolina who played tight end for the University of Virginia football team when Allen was quarterback," said, "Allen said he came to Virginia because he wanted to play football in a place where 'blacks knew their place.'" Salon continues to report that two other white teammates claimed Allen used a racial slur to describe African Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0069537

The New York Times (9/26, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports, "Two former acquaintances of Senator George Allen said Monday that he used racist slurs in the 1970's and 1980's, a development that compounded accusations of racial insensitivity that have dogged his re-election campaign in Virginia." Christopher Taylor, who is white, "now an anthropology professor at the Birmingham campus of the University of Alabama, said he heard Mr. Allen use an epithet to describe African-Americans in the early 1980's." Separately, "Dr. Ken Shelton, who was a football teammate of the senator at the University of Virginia and who is also white, said that while in college in the early 1970's Mr. Allen often used the same racially charged term."

The AP (9/26, Lewis) reports Sen. Allen "denounced as 'ludicrously false' allegations from a former college football teammate that he frequently used a racial slur to refer to blacks in the early 1970s and that he once stuffed a severed deer head into a black household's mailbox." Allen's campaign "also released statements from four other ex-teammates defending the senator and rejecting Dr. Ken Shelton's claims." Meanwhile, Larry J. Sabato, "one of Virginia's most-quoted political science professors and a classmate of Allen's in the early 1970s, said in a televised interview Monday that Allen used the epithet." On MSNBC's Hardball, Sabato said, "I'm simply going to stay with what I know is the case and the fact is he did use the n-word, whether he's denying it or not." Sabato "would not say whether he had heard Allen say the word, and did not know whether it was true that Allen used the word frequently in college."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (9/26, Stallsmith) reports Allen "forcefully denied allegations that he used the n-word to describe black people while a football player at the University of Virginia more than 30 years ago." Speaking at a "news conference yesterday morning with mostly black pastors in support of the proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage in Virginia," Allen "denounced as 'completely false'" the Salon.com report."

The Washington Post (9/26, B1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports Shelton "said Allen frequently used the 'N-word' to describe blacks and nicknamed him 'Wizard' because of the similarity of his name to that of Robert Shelton, a former imperial wizard of the Alabama Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. He also recounted an event from 1973 or 1974 in which he, Allen and a third friend were hunting deer. After the deer was killed, Shelton said, Allen cut off the doe's head, asked for directions to the home of the nearest black person and shoved the head into that person's mailbox." But Allen adviser Chris LaCivita "said that Taylor is lying and that 'this guy is not credible, period.' LaCivita said Taylor is a liberal activist." The Post adds Stuart Rothenberg, "an independent analyst who edits the Rothenberg Political Report, said the senator is caught in a media frenzy that threatens his campaign and his consideration of a possible run for president in 2008."

Panel Changes Hearing Date From Yom Kippur. Roll Call (9/26, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that it "looks as though" Sen. Allen "might be embracing his Jewish roots after all. The Senator long ago had scheduled a field hearing of the Senate Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee for Monday, Oct. 2, which is Yom Kippur. Last week, Allen moved the date to Oct. 3 to avoid conflict with the high holiday, according to the interest group involved in the hearing." Brynn Slate, spokeswoman for the National Association of Women Business Owners, said, "He's Jewish and Monday is Yom Kippur." Roll Call adds Allen spokesman David Snepp "said the date of the hearing, which will explore women-owned businesses vying for federal contracts, was changed at the request of the association. And technically, that's true."

Green Party Candidate Will Be Removed From Pennsylvania Senate Ballot. The Washington Post/AP (9/26, A10, Raffaele) reports Commonwealth Court Judge James R. Kelley "said Monday that he will remove the Green Party candidate for U.S. Senate from the November ballot because the party did not have enough valid signatures in its nominating petitions." Carl Romanelli's candidacy "had been challenged by state Democrats. Romanelli's bid was backed by Sen. Rick Santorum (R), who hoped that Romanelli could siphon votes from his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Robert P. Casey Jr." Judge Kelley "ruled that Romanelli, a railroad industry consultant from Wilkes-Barre, was 8,931 signatures shy of the 67,070 he needed to qualify as a minor-party candidate."

DOJ_NMG_0069538

Lieberman Calls For Expediting US Training Of Iraqi Forces. The New York Times (9/26, Medina, 1.21M) reports that in his "first major speech on Iraq since his loss in the primary election," Sen. Joseph Lieberman "called on Monday for the number of United States troops embedded with Iraqi forces to be doubled or tripled, to speed up the training of the Iraqis and help hasten the withdrawal of the Americans." In "a 40-minute speech at a Veterans of Foreign Wars post" in East Hampton, Lieberman, "who has been under attack for his support of the war, said that those troops could be added through redeployments, rather than by committing additional troops in the region." At the "same time, he called for increasing the overall size of the United States Army and Marine Corps, to better prepare for looming conflicts." Lieberman "attacked" Democratic nominee Ned Lamont, "portraying his rival's position on the withdrawal of American troops as 'giving up on Iraq.'"

Ehrlich Donor A Major Backer Of Controversial Road Project. The Washington Post (9/26, A1, Mosk, 748K) reports in a front page story that the "$4,000 checks started arriving in Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s reelection campaign treasury Jan. 2 from such obscure corporations as Freestate Owner LLC, Muirkirk, Chase Limited and President Street Associates." By Jan. 3, "there were seven of the checks, each from a company directly linked to developer Kingdon Gould III, a descendant of railroad barons who is one of Maryland's most prolific political donors and a vigorous booster for the intercounty connector. That same day, Ehrlich's transportation secretary signed off on a final study of the controversial highway, an 18-mile ribbon of asphalt that would extend east from Rockville to the gravel pits where Gould plans a massive commercial and residential development called Konterra." State officials said "they had no idea the checks were coming in as they were sending out the long-expected report. Ehrlich (R) said the contributions, and numerous others from Gould and his companies, were based on friendship and a shared belief that the road connecting Interstates 270 and 95 should be built and that Konterra should flourish."

Campaigns Rely On "Microtargeting" To Reach Voters. The Washington Post (9/26, A1, Cillizza, VandeHei, 748K) reports in a front page story that there is "no sexier topic in politics these days than 'microtargeting.' That's the new science (some say dark art) by which candidates use the latest data-mining technology to vacuum every last scrap of information about voters, then churn out custom-tailored messages designed to herd their supporters to the polls." In Ohio's 1st CD, Rep. Steve Chabot "and his Democratic challenger, Cincinnati City Council member John Cranley, have placed large bets that it will prove effective. Both candidates have spent months combing through voter lists to find 'drop-off' voters -- those who turn out in presidential election years but rarely in midterm contests. In a district as evenly divided as this one -- President Bush won it by just 3,000 votes in 2004 -- the party best equipped to find and persuade these individuals to turn out on Nov. 7 will probably end up on top." In the "past several elections, especially in Ohio, Republicans have won the ground game, building a vast and constantly growing network of potential voters identified less by their formal party affiliation than their church membership or magazine subscriptions."

Panel Recommends Course To Affordable Healthcare. The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) reports a federal advisory panel, the Citizens' Health Care Working Group, "said Monday that Congress should take immediate steps to guarantee that all Americans have access to affordable health care by 2012. As a first step, the 14-member panel, appointed by the comptroller general of the United States, said, 'A national public or private program must be established to ensure protection against very high out-of-pocket medical costs for everyone.'" The panel "said Congress should create an independent "public-private entity" to define a basic set of health care benefits and services for all Americans."

Obama's Household Income Soars In First Year In Senate. The Chicago Tribune (9/26, Dorning, 623K) reports Democratic Sen. Barak Obama's "first year in the Senate turned out to be prosperous not only for the newly elected senator but also his wife, according to information Obama released Monday from their joint 2005 tax return." Shortly after Obama "took office, his wife, Michelle, received a promotion from her employer, the not-for-profit University of Chicago Hospitals, nearly tripling her earnings to $316,962 from $121,910 the previous year." Sen. Obama "also reached a three-book deal worth $1.9 million with Random House shortly after his 2004 election, with the senator receiving $1.2 million in payments last year." Including Obama's "$154,047 Senate salary, the family earned $1.67 million last year, more than the family's combined income for the prior seven years, according to information provided by the senator's office."

DOJ_NMG_0069539

Elizabeth Edwards' Book Focuses On Tragedy Of Son's Death. USA Today (9/26, Page, 2.27M) reports Elizabeth Edwards' discovery of "a lump in her breast during the campaign's final push" and her diagnosis "with cancer the day after the election — brought 65,000 e-mails from strangers and the promise of a book about how she coped with a national political campaign and a devastating personal diagnosis." But that is "not the book" Mrs. Edwards, the wife of 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards, "has written. Instead, the heart of Saving Graces is the story of surviving the central tragedy of her life: the death of her son, Wade, in 1996. At 16, he was killed on his way to the family's beach house when the wind flipped over his car." In "the aftermath of that, her account of undergoing chemotherapy, a lumpectomy and radiation — her prognosis is now good, she says — seems almost perfunctory. With Wade's death, she writes, 'we had all been through the worst life could deal us' already."

Judge Delays Ruling On Lawsuit Against Clintons. The Washington Times (9/26, Seper, 88K) reports California Superior Court Judge Aurelio Munoz "said he could not rule on a complaint filed by a Hollywood producer in a lawsuit accusing President Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of reneging on a multimillion-dollar Internet deal until a pending appeal in the case is settled." In April, Sen. Clinton "invoked a California law that protects candidates from being silenced by frivolous lawsuits during their election campaigns."

Superdome's Return Seen As Symbol Of Hope For New Orleans. ABC World News (9/25, story 7, 2:15, Gibson) reported the return of NFL football to the Louisiana Superdome as "a milestone for New Orleans." ESPN's Jeremy Shaap added, "Tonight, for a city that's been through so much, winning is neither everything nor the only thing. Tonight, clearly, is about healing." NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 10, 3:00, Savidge, 9.87M) reported, "No longer a symbol of the past, the Superdome has become a beacon for the future." On CBS Evening News (9/25, story 11, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M), Gov. Kathleen Blanco was shown saying the Superdome is "the symbol of rebirth and recovery."

EU, Iran Said To Be "Close" To Enrichment Suspension Deal. The Washington Times (9/26, Gertz, 88K) reports Iran "is close to an agreement that would include a suspension of uranium enrichment but wants the deal to include a provision that the temporary halt be kept secret." EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "has been working with Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani on the enrichment-suspension deal that could be completed this week." The enrichment suspension would last 90 days "so additional talks could be held with several European nations." The Times says Administration "officials are opposing the agreement as a further concession to Iran," but "some in the State Department are supporting the deal, which they view as a step toward achieving a complete halt to uranium enrichment." Other "officials said that keeping any suspension secret would be difficult and that it would drag the United States into further negotiations with Iran. … Also, any suspension of enrichment would require International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspections to verify that work has stopped at Iranian facilities. The inspections would likely be disclosed, exposing any secret arrangement with Iran on suspension." While Iranian leaders want to keep any suspension secret as "a face-saving measure," Administration "officials said President Bush is not happy with the secrecy demand" but "continues to support the use of diplomacy to solve the problem."

The AP (9/26, Lederer, Faramarzi) notes that, in its interview of Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, he said "that talks between top Iranian and European negotiators on his country's disputed nuclear program are 'on track' and could pave the way for a negotiated solution to the standoff." He cautioned "that Iran still believes there should be no conditions on the resumption of negotiations, implicitly rejecting demands that Tehran first suspend uranium enrichment." Mottaki "said Solana and Larijani will hold their third meeting 'very soon,' probably in Europe, though he did not have an exact date or location."

End To Iran Nuclear Impasse Said To Be "Squarely In Washington's Court." In a Wall Street Journal (9/26, A14, 2.03M) op-ed, American Foreign Policy Council Vice President for Policy Ilan Berman writes, "By now, it has become all too clear that when it comes to the Iranian nuclear crisis, the ball is squarely in Washington's court. Aug. 31 has come and gone, and with it the international deadline for Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment. Iran's ayatollahs, however, have shown no signs of curbing their atomic ambitions. … Sadly, international diplomacy so far has played directly into Iran's hands. In the best case, serious U.N. Security Council action will still take weeks or months to materialize, buying Iran's ayatollahs valuable time to forge ahead with their nuclear program. What's more, if and when they do eventually emerge, U.N. sanctions are guaranteed to be limited in scope, so as not to offend two of Iran's chief strategic partners, Russia and China. As such, they are not likely to offend Iran's ayatollahs much either."

DOJ_NMG_0069540

Armitage Sees "Even Chance" Of North Korean Nuclear Test This Year. The Financial Times (9/26, Fifield) reports remarks by former Deputy Secretary Armitage in Seoul that Pyongyang "will probably test a nuclear weapon, with an even chance of doing so this year, as Kim Jong-il's regime tries to assert its defiance in the face of increasing international pressure." Armitage "is urging Washington to talk directly to Pyongyang to try and resolve the nuclear stand-off," and yesterday "estimated there was a 50 per cent chance of a test by the end of the year." The Times notes, "South Korean newspapers have for weeks been reporting rumours of preparations for a test."

AFP (9/26) adds Armitage "said that North Korea may test a nuclear weapon by the end of this year, sparking 'huge international ramifications.'" He is quoted saying, "I think in their logic it's the next rational escalation point." He later said "he would expect" President Bush and Secretary Rice "to consult other countries involved in six-nation talks on North Korea, and simultaneously to take the issue to the United Nations."

Musharraf Memoir Discusses Khan's Activities. The New York Times (9/26, Sanger, 1.21M) reports, "President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan wrote in a memoir published Monday that he now believes that the equipment sent to North Korea several years ago by Pakistan's nuclear chief included some of Pakistan's most technologically advanced nuclear centrifuges. The assertion deepened the mystery about how much progress North Korea has made in what is often called its second, and very secret, nuclear program." Musharraf "has been promoting the new book, 'In the Line of Fire' (Free Press), everywhere from the East Room of the White House to appearances on the morning talk shows." In it, "he says for the first time that his suspicions about the activities of Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer who build an illicit nuclear network that also supplied Iran and Libya, dated from 1999. … The timing is significant, because it was not until more than three years later, in 2002, that the United States gathered solid evidence that North Korea was trying to enrich uranium."

The Washington Times (9/26, Sands, 88K) says the book "earned a unique televised endorsement from President Bush at his joint press conference with the general last week and generated a pre-release buzz that a publicist for a rival publishing house called 'priceless.'" Bush "made his semi-serious endorsement at a press briefing in which Gen. Musharraf deflected reporters' questions by saying he was pledged to New York publisher Simon & Schuster not to reveal details of the manuscript before yesterday's official release date."

Musharraf Will Promote Book On "The Daily Show." The New York Times (9/26, Kornblut, 1.21M) notes that tonight, Musharraf "is to go where no sitting leader of any nation -- certainly not Mr. Bush -- has gone before. He is to plug his new memoir, 'In the Line of Fire,' tonight on 'The Daily Show' on Comedy Central."

Olmert, Senior Saudi Official Said To Have Met. The New York Times (9/26, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "An Israeli newspaper reported Monday that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert held a secret meeting about 10 days ago with a senior Saudi Arabian official to discuss issues that included Iran's nuclear program and prospects for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. In response to the reports, Mr. Olmert and his aides said he did not meet with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. However, they declined to answer directly when asked if he met with any other senior Saudi leader." The Times adds, "If a meeting did take place, it would indicate a significant development for two countries that have never had diplomatic ties. Officials from Israel and Saudi Arabia have quietly shared intelligence information, but have never met publicly, said David Kimche, chief of the Israel Council on Foreign Relations."

The Washington Times/AP (9/26, Plushnick-Masti) says the Yediot report "described other officials as hinting that the talks were with a senior official close to the king. The Israeli daily Ha'aretz later reported that the meeting took place on Sept. 13, and Israel's Army Radio said the talks were held in the royal palace in Riyadh."

DOJ_NMG_0069541

Hamas, Fatah Call Off Talks On Unity Government. The AP (9/26, Lavie) reports, "Rivals Hamas and Fatah called off top-level talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government that might ease crippling international sanctions, the latest indication of difficulties in bridging their ideological differences." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, the head of Fatah, "postponed his planned trip to the Gaza Strip for talks with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, and both sides said no new date has been set."

Court Rules Hamas Lawmakers Must Remain In Jail. The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) reports, "An Israeli military appeals court in the West Bank on Monday reversed an earlier ruling and said that 18 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers would have to remain in jail pending trial. A military court on Sept. 12 ordered Israel to release the Hamas members," but "military prosecutors appealed. The men are charged with belonging to a terrorist organization. Aziz Dweik, the speaker of parliament and one of those being held, called the ruling a political decision."

Rice Says UNIFIL Has "Robust Mandate" To Act. The New York Times (9/26, Shanker, 1.21M) reports Secretary Rice "urged the peacekeeping mission in southern Lebanon yesterday to act on what she termed 'a very robust' mandate approved by the United Nations that grants international troops authority to challenge anyone who attempts to block their mission, and to use force if necessary." Rice is quoted saying UNSCR 1701 "says that anything and anyone who keeps them from fulfilling their responsibilities is to be challenged on that, and they even have the right to use force if they need to. That mandate was written in a very robust fashion." Rice "acknowledged, however, that 'it's always a matter of how it's interpreted.'" Rice "noted that the expanded UNIFIL mission was new and that it was not yet operating with the full number of desired troops. But she stressed that the peacekeepers 'certainly got the authority to do whatever they need to do to do their job.'" The Times says UNIFIL commanders believe UNSCR 1701 "places Lebanese sovereignty paramount — meaning they first must be authorized to take such actions by the Lebanese Army." The Times adds that "a goal of" UNSCR 1701 "was to increase the numbers and military punch of the international force in Lebanon, as well as to create the conditions for the Lebanese military to move into the south. Both operations are viewed as important to separate Israeli and Hezbollah forces, halt attacks and prevent Hezbollah from rearming."

Bush Names CEOs To Lebanon Rebuilding Effort. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A8, King, 2.03M) notes President Bush "tapped top officials at Cisco Systems Inc., Intel Corp. and two other companies to lead a private-sector rebuilding effort in Lebanon similar to ones the White House launched last year in Pakistan and Central America." Cisco Chief Executive John Chambers "led a presidential delegation to Beirut over the weekend that included Ray Irani, CEO of Occidental Petroleum Corp., and Yousif Ghafari, chairman of Ghafari Inc., an architecture, design and engineering company. Joining the team, but not the trip, is Intel Chairman Craig Barrett." The four men "chipped in $1 million of their own money to the new U.S.-Lebanon Partnership Fund, while Citibank and the federal Overseas Private Investment Corp. created a $120 million loan facility to offer financing for home repairs, small businesses and long-term mortgages. Cisco is proposing to invest about $10 million in projects in Lebanon, a sum that Mr. Chambers described as 'a rounding error in terms of our business.'"

Unexploded Bombs Litter Southern Lebanon. The Washington Post (9/26, A1, Shadid, 748K) reports on "the scourge of munitions from the cluster bombs now littering southern Lebanon, mostly American-made but some manufactured in Israel." They "will be a 'lasting legacy,' the United Nations has said. UN officials estimate that the Israeli military fired 90 percent of the bombs during the last 72 hours of the conflict, which began on July 12 after Hezbollah fighters seized two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid and ended with a cease-fire on Aug. 14. As many as 1 million of the bomblets are unexploded, they say, wounding or killing three people a day. The threat of stumbling across a bomblet has paralyzed life in parts of the south that depend on the harvest of tobacco and now-abandoned groves of bananas, olives and citrus."

UN Investigator Probing Identity Of Hariri Killers. The New York Times (9/26, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "The director of the United Nations commission investigating the killing of Rafik Hariri, the former prime minister of Lebanon, reported Monday that it had confirmed preliminary findings that the attack was the work of a suicide bomber but was still pursuing the identities of the participants in the highly organized plot." In "a largely technical 22-page report," Serge

DOJ_NMG_0069542

Brammertz, the prosecutor leading the inquiry, "said he had developed evidence from the crime scene about the bombing to a level suitable for presentation to a court and was intent on doing the same thing with evidence pointing to the conspirators." Brammertz "is scheduled to brief the Security Council on his report on Friday."

Bush Expected To Sign Darfur Sanctions Bill. The AP (9/26, Hananel) reports the US House of Representatives yesterday "approved a bill that would impose sanctions on the government of Sudan, as lawmakers warned that tougher action is needed to stem the death and suffering in that nation's Darfur region." HR3127, "passed by unanimous consent, authorizes sanctions against anyone President Bush determines is responsible for atrocities and war crimes in the conflict that has left more than 200,000 people dead and 2.5 million homeless since 2003. The Senate passed a nearly identical measure last week and is expected to endorse the House version this week, sending it to the president's desk for his signature." The bill includes asset blocking, travel bans and shipping restrictions, and asks Bush to "deny" Khartoum "oil revenues and access to military equipment." It further asks the UNSC to "suspend" Khartoum's "rights and privileges of membership in the U.N. until it agrees to halt attacks against its people."

The Washington Times (9/26, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that also, "in an early evening voice vote on a nonbinding resolution, the House urged President Bush to support humanitarian and peace efforts in the African nation." The Senate has already "unanimously agreed to the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act, paving the way, lawmakers said, for action in the genocide-stricken region."

Countries Begin Committing Troops To UN Darfur Force. AFP (9/26) notes the UN "secured its first pledges for a proposed major UN peacekeeping force for" Darfur. "But about 50 countries that attended a meeting of potential contributors…were also warned of the many problems that could face any force, including attacks by rebels opposed to a Darfur peace agreement and by Al-Qaeda." UN Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping Jean-Marie Guehenno "said one European country and some developing countries, which he did not name, had offered several battalions for any UN force," while other officials "said Norway, Nigeria, Tanzania and Bangladesh were the first countries to offer troops. Nigeria and Tanzania already have troops in the AU force but they would increase their contingent."

Abe Will Become Japanese Premier Today. The AP (9/26, Talmadge) reports, "Five years after taking office for what many analysts had expected to be a short-lived term, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said good-bye to his followers Tuesday and prepared to turn over power to his protege and long-time spokesman, Shinzo Abe. The transition ends the tenure of one Japan's longest-serving and most popular prime ministers, a term that saw both a gradual recovery of the nation's economy and a rare infusion of lightheartedness." The AP says Koizumi leaves "a legacy of discord with neighbors China and South Korea over territorial disputes and his repeated visits to a memorial to Japan's fallen soldiers, including convicted World War II war criminals." He chose to use his final address to stress "the impact of his economic reform program and efforts to trim government spending."

Hu Removes Scandal-Tainted Shanghai Leader. The Washington Post (9/26, A14, Fan, 748K) reports, "The Communist Party chief of Shanghai was fired Monday in the highest-level purge of a Chinese official in more than a decade. Analysts called the dismissal an effort by President Hu Jintao to make a bold statement against corruption and consolidate his power in advance of an important party congress." Chen Liangyu, who "also lost his seat on the country's ruling Politburo," is under investigation for helping to "loot the city's pension fund of hundreds of millions of dollars." The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Areddy, 2.03M) subtitles its reporting, "Beijing Pushes to Tighten Control, Consolidate Power Amid Corruption Scandal," while the New York Times (9/26, Kahn, 1.21M) titles its story, "Shanghai's Party Leader, Mistrusted By Hu, Is Purged."

Pope Meets With Representatives Of Muslim Nations. ABC World News (9/25, story 6, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "Overseas in Italy, an unprecedented gathering: Pope Benedict met envoys from 20 Muslim nations hoping to end anger over his use of a quote saying Islam was evil and inhuman. Benedict said there faiths must overcome differences and work to reject violence."

Somali City Turns Violent After Islamist Forces Move In. The New York Times (9/26, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports Kismayo, Somalia, one of the nation's largest cities, "fell to Islamic forces without a shot on Monday -- but then the trouble started. After the city's warlords fled and hundreds of Islamist fighters poured in, demonstrators took to the streets and hurled stones at the Islamists. Islamist troops responded with machine guns, opening fire on the demonstrators and killing at least one teenage boy."

DOJ_NMG_0069543

Indonesian Christians Warily Watching For Response To Bali Bombers. The Washington Times (9/26, Foek, 88K) reports Indonesian Christians, "deeply troubled by the executions of three Christians last week, say they are watching closely to see whether the government will be equally firm in dealing with three Muslims facing the ultimate sanction for their roles in the 2002 Bali bombings. Unless Muslims and Christians are treated equally, they say, there could be a fresh outbreak of sectarian violence that claimed more than 1,000 lives on the island of Sulawesi between 1998 and 2002." The three men were executed for taking part in a "May 2000 attack on a Muslim school that left 191 persons dead." But Christians, "who make up about 8 percent of the population, say the courts have been less aggressive in prosecuting Muslims for similar attacks."

Bolton Critical Of Venezuelan Foreign Minister's Airport Complaint. The AP (9/25, Wadhams) reports UN Ambassador John Bolton "derided" Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro's "protest over being detained at a New York airport as 'street theater' and propaganda." Maduro said officials at JFK "tried to frisk and handcuff him" as he left the annual UN General Assembly session on Saturday. Screeners "grew suspicious when Maduro used cash to purchase a one-way ticket to Miami shortly before the flight was to leave, U.S. officials said."

EC Chief Says Bulgaria, Romania Will Be Last Two New EU Entrants For Now. The New York Times (9/26, Bilefsky, 1.21M) reports European Commission President José Manuel Barroso said Bulgaria and Romania will "receive qualified endorsement" to join the EU on January 1 today, but the EU "will warn that expansion must then halt until the organization makes needed structural changes." He said the admission of the two nations "was the last phase of integration in a European Union that has been stretched beyond capacity for now."

Kristof Examines Massive New African Park Plan. In his New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes from the Central African Republic about the "adjoining national parks that cover an area the size of Rhode Island and Delaware combined" that are being established by the CAR, Cameroon, and the Congo Republic. Many Africans "resent the parks, partly because they allocate vast resources to saving animals for rich foreigners to enjoy -- in regions where humans routinely die for lack of a few dollars." But "in the audacious dream to preserve this rain forest and the way of life of people in it, you see Africa's glory, fighting to survive."

Bangkok Writer Recounts Coup. In a New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) op-ed, Ismail Wolff, a freelance reporter based in Bangkok, writes about the coup in Thailand, saying that as the coup took place, "all the public TV stations, by now under the direction of the military, ran a statement from the army and police commanders. They had 'taken control of the situation in Bangkok' and politely asked for the public's cooperation. 'We apologize for any inconvenience,' it signed off. Typical Thai politeness, I thought. Is this really what a coup feels like? My shock, however, was not shared by the rest of the country. … As the rain battered down from the heavens and I sat under the canvas sharing khao tom and watching television with the smiling soldiers, I wondered whether they really would have shot someone if they were ordered to. I'm sure they would have. After all, that's what they're here to do."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Data Oon Homes Cause Jitters."
"A Rare Bloom Is Fading."
"Guantanamo's Uneasy Ramadan."
"Employers Chip Away at Retiree Health Benefits."
"Saints Make It 'Home Sweet Dome.'"
"In Pasadena, 'Smart Growth' Threatens Little Landmarks."

USA Today:

"Do Thin Models Warp Girls' Body Image."
"Rules In Effect Today."
"Liquids Not As Risky As First Feared."
"Pentagon Extends Iraq Combat Tours For 3,800 Soldiers."

DOJ_NMG_0069544

New York Times:
"Tobacco Makers Lose Key Ruling On Latest Suits Tobacco Makers Lose Key Ruling On Latest Suits."
"Qaeda Operative, An Escapee In '05, Is Killed In Iraq."
"Stricter Voting Laws Carve Latest Partisan Divide."
"Europe Panel Faults Sifting Of Bank Data."
"Delivering Small-Town Justice With A Mix Of Trial And Error."
"Baseball's Oldest Old-Timer Opens A Window On The Past."
"Homes Post Price Drop For August."
"2 Ex-Acquaintances Of Senator Allen Say He Used Slurs."
"Shanghai's Party Leader, Mistrusted by Hu, Is Purged."
"U.S. Eases Rules On Gels And Liquids In Carry-Ons."
"Gunmen Kill Afghan Official Who Backed Women's Rights."
"Beyond Black And White: Stalking The Skunks Of Martha's Vineyard."

Washington Post:
"Detainee Measure To Have Fewer Restrictions."
"In Lebanon, A War's Lethal Harvest."
"Mayor Seeks Millions For Health Needs."
"U.S. Eases Carry-On Liquid Ban."
"Officers Reach Beyond Beat's Boundaries."
"Highway Backer A Steady Ehrlich Donor."
"Opening Mars's 'History A Battle Of Databases Book.'"

Washington Times:
"Iran Deal Could Halt Enrichment."
"Pope Reaches Out In Meeting With Muslim Envoys."
"Median Home Price Falls To $225,000."
"GOP's Uptick Just In Time For Election Day."
"Afghan Leader Slams Musharraf's Politics."
"BET Founder Opens Urban bank In District."

Detroit Free Press:
"Renault See Big Payoff In Alliance."
"Inside The Tigers."
"Some Liquids Now Ok In Carrry-On Luggage."
"Gene Therapy Frees Him From Grips Of Cancer."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"The Good Times Roll Call Again In September."
"Carry-On Security Relaxes."
"Panda Checkup: Girl!"
"Lower Energy Prices Cool Off Users' Wallets."
"Fox News ' Birthday Comes With CNN View."

Houston Chronicle:
"Ban On Carry On Liquids Relaxed."
"A Home Game Like No Other."
"Rice Left Stunned By Player's Death."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: More Troops Needed-Iraq; Rumsfeld Is Blamed For-Iraq; NIE Report; Fox News-Clinton Interview; Airline Security-New Rules; Benedict Meets Muslim Leaders; Superdome-Reopens; Global Warming; Light Cigarettes Case; Housing Market Cooling; Middle School's Low Scores; Trees Losing Leaves-Fall.
CBS: More Troops To Iraq; Back Door Draft; US Soldiers On Trial-Murder; Al Qaeda Leader Killed; Rocket Launched Crashed; Airline Security-New Rules; Gas Prices; Housing Market Cooling; Bionic Man; New Orleans Superdome; Douglas Brinkley Opinion; Global Warming-Positive Effects.
NBC: NIE Report; NIE Report Analysis; Fox News Clinton Interview; US Soldiers Charged With M; Airline Security-New Rules; California Wildfires; Capitol Visitor Center; Stock Market; Superdome Reopens.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: New Orleans-Superdome Reopens; Existing Home Sales; Bush-Cincinnati Trip; Iraq-NIE Leak.
CBS: New Orleans-Superdome reopens; Negroponte-Hill Testimony; Army-Iraq Tours Of Duty Extended; TSA-Carry On Liquids; Wall Street.
NPR: TSA-Carry On Liquids; Karzai Seeks US Help Closing Madrasas; Existing Home Sales; Wall Street; Canada-Air India Bombing Hearings; Japan-Abe To Be Confirmed As PM.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs S.2590 - Federal Funding Accountability and Transparency Act. Room 350, Eisenhower EOB; Meets with President Karzai of Afghanistan, Oval Office; holds joint press availability with President Karzai, East Room; attends an Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin Victory 2006 reception, private residence, Washington.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Joy Padgett for Congress reception, Granville Inn, Granville, Ohio; speaks at a Ray Meier for Congress reception. Hotel Utica, Utica, NY.

DOJ_NMG_0069545

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and votes on nominations. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on combating child hunger. James Kunder, acting deputy administrator, USAID; CDC Administrator Julie Gerberding; George Ward, World Vision; James T. Morris, U.N. World Food Program; Ann Veneman, U.N. Children's Fund. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on illegal insider trading. Associatd Deputy Attorney General Ron Tenpas; Linda Thomsen, SEC; Robert Marchman, New York Stock Exchange; Christopher K. Thomas, Measuredmarkets Inc., Toronto; John Coffee, Columbia Law School; Jonathan R. Macey, Yale University; James Cox, Duke University. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on efforts to develop new Basel Capital Accords. FRB Governor Susan S. Bies; Sheila C. Bair, chairwoman, FDIC; John C. Dugan, comptroller of the currency; John M. Reich, director, Office of Thrift Supervision; Diana L. Taylor, superintendent of banks, New York State Banking Department. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nomination of Robert Howard to be Assistant VAD Secretary. Location: Room 418, Russell. Notes: Markup of the nomination following the first roll call vote after Noon in the Reception Room off the Senate floor.

10:45 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight of Government Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on pay-for-performance systems, especially for senior federal executives. OPM Director Linda Springer; Brenda Farrell, GAO; Carol Bonosaro, Senior Executives Association. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending judicial nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:15 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Votes on pending nominations. Location: Room S-116, Capitol.

2:30 p.m. FINANCE _ Subcommittee on Health Care. Hearing on the experience so far with health savings accounts. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal financial Management, Government Information and Internatiuonal Security Subcommittee. Hearing on uncollected taxes and issues of transparency in the tax code. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson; Russell George, inspector general for tax administration, Department of the Treasury; Nina Olsen, national taxpayer advocate, IRS; Jay Soled, Rutgers University; Stephen Entin, president and executive director, Institute for Research on the Economics of Taxation; Jason Furman, New York University. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

3:15 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION AND FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committees. Joint hearing on the International Polar Year. Buck Sharpton, University of Alaska Fairbanks Center for Research Services; Alan Parkinson,Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; Mead Treadwell, U.S. Arctic Research Commission; Robin Bell, Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory of Columbia University; Arden L. Bement Jr. National Science Foundation; Thomas Armstrong, U.S. Geological Survey. Location: Room 253. Russell.

3:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for morning hour and at 10 a.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (47 bills): 1) H.R. 4766 - Native American Languages Preservation Act of 2006; 2) H.R. 6138 - To temporarily extend the programs under the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes; 3) H. Res. 1009 - Supporting efforts to promote greater public awareness of effective runaway youth prevention programs and the need for safe and productive alternatives, resources, and supports for homeless youth and youth in other high-risk situations; 4) H.Res. 295 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives supporting the establishment of September as Campus Fire Safety Month, and for other purposes; 5) H.R. 6142 - Haitian Hemispheric Opportunity through Partnership Encouragement Act of 2006; 6) S. 3525 - Children and Family Services Improvement Act of 2006; 7) H.R. 6131 - To permit certain expenditures from the Leaking Underground Storage Tank Trust Fund; 8) H.R. 5637 - Nonadmitted and Reinsurance Reform Act of 2006; 9) H.R. 6062 - Community Development Investment Enhancements Act of 2006; 10) H.R. 6072 - Financial Services Regulatory Relief Amendments Act of 2006; 11) H.R. 4942 - Promoting Antiterrorism Capabilities Through International Cooperation Act; 12) H.R. 6116 - More Border Patrol Agents Now Act of 2006; 13) H.R. __ - Secure Border Initiative Financial Accountability Act of 2006; 14) H. Res. 1030 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that the United States Border Patrol is performing an invaluable service to the United States, and that the House of Representatives fully supports the more than 12,000 Border Patrol agents; 15) H. Con. Res. 473 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Gynecologic Cancer Awareness Month; 16) H. Res. 402 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Infant Mortality Awareness Month; 17) H. Res. 748 - Recognizing the 225th anniversary of the American and French victory at Yorktown, Virginia, during the Revolutionary War; 18) H. Res. 991 - Congratulating the Columbus Northern Little League Baseball Team from Columbus, Georgia, on its victory in the 2006 Little League World Series Championship games; 19) H.R. 5108 - Lance Corporal Robert A. Martinez Post Office Building Designation Act; 20) H.R. 6075 - Robert J. Thompson Post Office Building Designation Act; 21) H.R 6078 - Chuck Fortenberry Post Office Building Designation Act; 22) H. Res. 973 - Recognizing Financial Planning Week, recognizing the significant impact of sound financial planning on achieving life's goals, and honoring families and the financial planning profession for their adherence and dedication to the financial planning process; 23) H.R. 5989 - John J. Sinde Post Office Building Designation Act; 24) H.R. 5990 - Wallace W. Sykes Post Office Building Designation Act; 25) S. 3613 - Major George Quamo Post Office Building Designation Act; 26) S. 3187 - Richard L. Cevoli Post Office; 27) H. Res. 1016 - Encouraging all offices of the House of Representatives to hire disabled veterans; 28) H.R. 5313 - Open Space and Farmland Preservation Act; 29) H.R. 5103 - To provide for the conveyance of the former Konnarock Lutheran Girls School in Smyth County, Virginia, which is currently owned by the United States and administered by the Forest Service, to facilitate the restoration and reuse of the property, and for other purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0069546

30) H.R. 4559 - To provide for the conveyance of certain National Forest System land to the towns of Laona and Wabeno, Wisconsin, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to convey certain isolated parcels of National Forest System land in Florence and Langlade Counties, Wisconsin, and for other purposes; 31) H.R. 1215 - Green Chemistry Research and Development Act of 2005; 32) H.R. 5074 - Railroad Retirement Technical Improvement Act of 2006; 33) H.R. 4981 - Dam Safety Act of 2006; 34) H.R. 6051 - John F. Seiberling Federal Building Designation Act; 35) H.R. 1556 - Clyde S. Cahill Memorial Park Designation Act; 3) H.R. 5546 - Carroll A. Campbell, Jr. Federal Courthouse Designation Act; 37) H.R. 5606 - William M. Steger Federal Building and United States Courthouse Designation Act; 38) H.R. 5026 - Andres Toro Building Designation Act; 39) H.R. 2322 - Kika de la Garza Federal Building Designation Act; 40) H.R. __ - National Institutes of Health Reform Act of 2006; 41) H.R. 5533 - Biodefense and Pandemic Vaccine and Drug Development Act of 2006; 42) H.R. 4377 - To extend the time required for construction of a hydroelectric project, and for other purposes; 43) H.R. 4417 - To provide for the reinstatement of a license for a certain Federal Energy Regulatory project; 44) S. 244 - A bill to extend the deadline for commencement of construction of a hydroelectric project in the State of Wyoming; 45) S. 176 - A bill to extend the deadline for commencement of construction of a hydroelectric project in the State of Alaska; 46) H.R. 971 - To extend the deadline for commencement of construction of certain hydroelectric projects in Connecticut, and for other purposes; 47) H.R. 5835 - Veterans Identity and Credit Security Act of 2006.

9 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for morning business. At 10 a.m. meets for legislative business.

9:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Livestock and Horticulture Subcommittee. Hearing on federal farm policy affecting the speciality crop industry. Kevin Van Dyke, President, Skinner Nurseries, St. Augustine, Fla.; Phil Brumley, San Joaquin Farm Bureau Federation, Escalon, Calif.; Ervin Lineberger, Lineberger's Killdeer Farms, Kings Mountain, N.C.; Dean Okimoto, President, Hawaii Farm Bureau Federation; R. Jay Taylor, Chairman, Florida Fruit and Vegetable Association; Paul E. Dolan, III, President, Mendocino Wine Company, Ukiah, Calif.; Cynthia A. Brown, President, U.S. Dry Bean Council, Menomonie, Wis. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on sexual exploitation of children over the Internet. Anna Carol Salter, psychologist, Madison, Wis.; Andres Hernandez, Director, Bureau of Prisons' Sex Offender Treatment Program; Phillip Jenkins, Pennsylvania State University; Thomas Krawawecz, CEO, Blue Gravity Communications, Inc., Pennsauken, N.J.; Christine Jones, GoDaddy.com, Inc., Scottsdale, Ariz. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on how the FDA regulates the reprocessing of supposedly single-use devices. Dr. Daniel G. Schultz, FDA; Don Selvey, Ascent Healthcare Solutions, Inc.; Dennis J. Toussaint, SteriMed, Inc.; Stephen J. Ubl, Advanced Medical Technology Association. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0069547

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Hearing on Homeland Security Department initiatives for 2007. Secretary Chertoff. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on human trafficking. UNICEF goodwill ambassador Ricky Martin; John Miller, State Department; Assistant HHS Secretary Wade Horn. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn. Notes: Media avaiability with Rep. Christopher Smith and Ricky Martin at 9:45 a.m., Room 2172, Rayburn. Event contact: Patrick Creamer, 202-225-3765.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Space and Aeronautics Subcommittee. Hearing on the National Academy of Sciences' plan for aeronautics. Lisa Porter, NASA; William Hoover, chairman of the NAS committee. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Select Revenue Measures Subcommittee. Hearing on tax reform proposals. Location: Room B-318, Rayburn.

11 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ 21st Century Competitiveness Subcommittee. Hearing on how the entertainment industry and higher education are working to combat Internet piracy. University of Maryland Chancellor William E. Kirwan; Dan Glickman, CEO, Motion Picture Association of America; Cary Sherman, president, Recording Industry Association of America; Cheryl Elzy, Illinois State University; William W. Fisher, Harvard Law School. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

1 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on current nuclear proliferation challenges. Hans Blix, Chairman, Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission; William Tobey, Energy Department; Andrew Semmel, State Department; Jack David, Defense Department; Gene Aloise, GAO; Amb. Thomas Graham, Jr. Global Security Institute; Baker Spring, Heritage Foundation; Jonathan Granoff, Global Security Institute; Henry Sokolski, Nonproliferation Policy Education Center; Frank von Hippel, International Panel on Fissile Materials. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

1 p.m. RESOURCES _ Water and Power Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

1 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the National Academy of Sciences icebreaker report. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on Defense Department alternative energy and energy efficiency programs. John Young, Director, Defense Research and Engineering, Department of Defense; Richard Connelly, Director, Defense Energy Support Center; Mike Aimone, Deputy Chief of Staff for Logistics, Installations and Mission Support; Phil Grone, Deputy Undersecretary of Defense for Installations and Environment. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on ``Editing Hollywood's Editors: Cleaning Flicks for Families." Bill Aho, CEO, ClearPlay Inc., Salt Lake City; Allan L. Erb, President, Clean Flicks, Pleasant Grove, Utah; John Feehery, Motion Picture Association of America; Robin Bronk, The Creative Coalition; Jason Schultz, Electronic Frontier Foundation, San Francisco Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Regulatory Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on H.R. 5242 - Small Business Paperwork Amnesty Act. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

3 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to set rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT MUSHARRAF _ Highlights: No public schedule.

AFGHAN PRESIDENT HAMID KARZAI _ Highlights: 10:20 a.m. Meets with President Bush. Oval Office. 11:40 a.m. Holds joint media availability with President Bush. East Room. 3:30 p.m. Speaks at George Washington University on economic development, with Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW. Note: By invitation and credentialed media only. Media checkin at 1 p.m. Cameras in place by 2 p.m. RSVP required. Event contact: Adela de la Torre, 202-994-6424.

IRAQI PRESIDENT JALAL TALABANI _ Highlights: 10:45 a.m. Meets with Senate Majority Leader Sen. Bill Frist. Alcove, across from the old Senate Chamber. Setup at 10:25 a.m. 2:30 p.m. Speaks at the Wilson International Center for Scholars. 6th floor auditorium, Wilson Center, Reagan Trade

DOJ_NMG_0069548

Bjuilding. Event contact: Sharon McCarter, 2026914016. Note: RSVP required by 4 p.m. Sept. 25.

GREEK FOREIGN MINISTER DORA BAKOYANNIS _ Highlights: 10:30 a.m. Meets with Sen. Hillary Clinton. Room 476, Russell. 12 p.m. Addresses the Center for Strategic and International Studies. JW Marriott Hotel, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. 3 p.m. Meets with Sen. Chuck Hagel. Room 248, Russell. 5 p.m. Inauguration ceremony for the new chancery of the Greek Embassy. 2217 Massachusetts Ave. NW. 6 p.m. Meets with the House International Relations Committee. Room 2172, Rayburn.

FIREPOWER 2006 _ Institute for Defense and Government Advancement holds Firepower 2006, focusing on the newest weapons and equipment, as well as the future of munitions. Highlights: 11:10 a.m. Appropriations Overview, with Col. Michael Waclawski, Chief, Army Congressional Budget Liaison. Location: Hilton Washington/Silver Spring, 8727 Colesville Road, Silver Spring, Md.

HEALTH INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY _ The eHealth Initiative and Bridges to Excellence co-sponsor the Third Annual (HIT) Health Information Technology Summit for national, regional and state healthcare decision makers, who will consider emerging policy changes related to both quality and HIT emerging from the Administration, Congress, the 50 states, and the private sector. Highlights: 8 a.m. Opening Remarks by Janet M. Marchibroda, Chief Executive Officer eHealth Initiative and Foundation. 9 a.m. Keynote Address by HHS Secretary Michael O. Leavitt. 9:30 a.m. Keynote Presentation by Bill McInturff, Partner and Co-Founder, Public Opinion Strategies; Mark S. Mellman, President and Chief Executive Officer, The Mellman Group. 10:15 a.m. Congressional Health Information Technology Policy Panel with Katy Barr, Professional Staff Member, Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions; others. 1:15 p.m. Concurrent sessions on Federal Administration, other topics. Location: Renaissance Washington Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

FRANCHISE DAY _ The International Franchise Association holds its 2006 Franchise Appreciation Day. Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Rep. Tom Tancredo. 10:10 a.m. Secretary of Commerce Gutierrez. 10:45 a.m. SBA Administrator Steven Preston. 11:45 a.m. Rep. Mel Watt.. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE _ 8 a.m. - 4:30 p.m. The Joint Military Intelligence College holds a conference, ``Science and Technology Equals Intelligence on Target." Highlights: Location: Defense Intelligence Analysis Center, Bolling AFB.

ALBRIGHT _ 8:30 a.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record program with former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

EMPLOYER HEALTH PLANS _ 10 a.m. The Kaiser Family Foundation and the Health Research and Educational Trust hold a media briefing and conference call to release the 2006 Employer Health Benefits Survey. This survey is an in-depth look at trends in health insurance costs and coverage in the workplace. Location: The 9th Floor Conference Room, Kaiser Family Foundation Offices, 1330 G St. NW.

HIV TESTING _ 10 a.m. The National Minority Health Month Foundation, others, hold a telephone briefing to announce an HIV testing campaign and to discuss HIV testing recommendations recently announced by the Centers for Disease Control. Contacts: Hillary Maxwell, 202-572-6205. Notes: Callin number: 800-967-7138; passcode: 1468235.

IRAN-RELIGION _ 10 a.m. Evangelical Christian, Jewish and Muslim religious leaders hold a telephone briefing to call on Congress to use its oversight authority to prevent a preemptive strike on Iran. Contacts: Trevor FitzGibbon, 202-246-5303. Notes: Callin number: 800-795-1259; passcode: Talk to Iran.

MODERN FAMILIES _ 10 a.m. The National Center for Policy Analysis and the National Press Club hold a panel discussion, ``Modern Families: Outdated Laws," with former White House press secretary Dee Dee Myers, Wall Street Journal editorial writer Kim Strassel, author Leslie Morgan Steiner, Lyric Winik of Parade magazine, and Karen Czarnecki of the Labor Department. Location: National Press club.

NATIONAL SECURITY _ 10 a.m. News conference to launch a new progressive national security organization, the National Security Network, with Rand Beers, president and Les Gelb, advisory board chairman, Rep. Jane Harman, and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Location: National Press Club.

TERRORISM INSURANCE _ 10 a.m. The Coalition to Insure Against Terrorism holds a briefing with policyholders and insurers to give an update on the state of the terrorism risk insurance market. Location: National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts, Suite 600, 1875 ``Eye" St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0069549

VISA WAIVERS _ 10 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, ambassadors from the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Slovak Republic hold a news conference on visa waivers. Location: Cannon Terrace.

IMMIGRATION _ 10:15 a.m. Senators John McCain , Ted Kennedy, Lindsey Graham, and Ken Salazar will be joined by other senators and religious leaders at a press conference to discuss the status of comprehensive immigration reform and the what they say is the need to finalize legislation in this Congress. Location: Room SR-485, Russell Senate Office Building.

BOEHNER _ 10:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner hold a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

PEACE-IRAQ _ 10:30 a.m. Interfaith ceremony, procession and nonviolent civil disobedience action organized by the National Campaign for Nonviolent Resistance. Location: Upper Senate Park.

IMMIGRATION _ 11 a.m. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison and Rep. Mike Pence discuss their immigration polan at a briefing hosted by former House Majority Leader Richard Armey. Location: Room SC-4, Capitol.

LEBANON-HARIRI _ 11 a.m. The Middle East Institute holds a program with Lebanese member of Parliament Jawad Boulous discussing the UN report on the Hariri assassination. Location: 1761 N St. NW.

RETIREMENT ASSETS _ 11 a.m. Labor Secretary Chao holds a telephone briefing to announce proposed rules on default investment options that will make it easier for fiducaries of 401(k) plans, others to adopt automatic enrollment design features. Contacts: Gloria Della, 202-693-8664.

CHINA TRADE _ 11:30 a.m. Senators Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham meet with Treasury Secretary Hank discuss China trade policy and their bill that they say will level the playing field. Location: Room 313, Hart Senate Office Building.

PORTMAN _ 12 p.m. OMB Director Rob Portman speaks to a luncheon of the IBM Center for the Business of Government and the National Academy of Public Administration about the administration's emphasis on performance and results. Location: Ballroom, Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

SPELLINGS-HIGHER EDUCATION _ 12:30 p.m. Education Secretary Maragret Spellings announces her plans to make the U.S. higher education system more affordable, accessible and consumer-friendly, based on the recommendations in the final report of the Commission on the Future of Higher Education. Location: National Press Club.

NEPAL-POLITICS _ 2 p.m. Nepalese Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister K.P. Sharma Oli addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Topic: ``Political Developments in Nepal and the Peace Process with the Maoists. Location: National Press Club.

POLITICS-RELIGION _ 2 p.m. Brookings Institution holds a briefing on America's polarized politics, with Alan Wolfe of Boston College and Karlyn Bowman of AEI. Location: 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAQ COSTS _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., hosts a Congressional Forum examining the financial, military, and opportunity costs of the occupation of Iraq. Woolsey will be joined by colleagues in the House, as well as two sets of panelists who will address the different aspects of the costs associated with the continued occupation. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

ENDANGERED SPECIES _ 2:15 p.m. Interior Secretary Kempthorne holds a telephone briefing to announce $67 million in grants to conserve habitat for threatened or endangered species. Contacts: Hugh Vickery, 202-501-4633. Notes: Callin number: 888-282-1673; passcode: DOI.

ENERGY-INDONESIA _ 3 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman meets with Indonesian Energy Minister Purnomo to discuss energy issues of mutual interest and energy security. Closed press. Location: Energy Department.

LEVIN _ 4:30 p.m. The University of Illinois' Institute of Government and Public Affairs presents its 2006 Paul Douglas Ethics in Government Award to Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich. Location: Madison Building, Library of Congress.

CHENEY PROTEST-TORTURE _ 5 p.m. - 6:30 p.m. Washington Region Religious Campaign Against Torture holds one in series of vigils outside Vice President Cheney's house. They're pushing for the Administration and Congress to support the Geneva Conventions and anti-torture policies. Location: Mass. Ave and 34th St. NW.

RELIGIUOUS-TORTURE _ 5 p.m. - 6:30 p.m. Faith leaders and church members from different denominations participate in a vigil on Massachusetts Avenue outside Vice President Cheney's house. They will be demonstrating to urge the Administration and Congress to support the Geneva Conventions and against the torture policies and practices of the last four years. Location: Outside the Vice Presidents House at Massachusetts Avenue and 34th Street NW.

DOJ_NMG_0069550

FRANCE-US _ 5 p.m. Former French Amb. Jacques Andeani discusses French and U.S. studies approaches to international crisis, sponsored by the School of Advanced International Studies. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PARTISAN POLITICS _ 6:30 p.m. Panel discussion on ``How Partisan is too Partisan'' in politics, sponsored by Pajamasmedia.com, with Michael Barone of US News and World Report, Paul Mirengoff of Powerline Blog, Tom Bevan of Real Clear Politics, others. Location: National Press Club.

WOMEN BROADCASTERS _ 6:30 p.m. The 2006 Alice Award, named after Alice Paul, the founder of the historic National Womans Party, will be presented to a group of nationally recognized women broadcasters. This years prestigious award goes to the women of NPR, including Cokie Roberts, Susan Stamberg, Nina Totenberg and Linda Wertheimer. Location: Sewall-Belmont House and Museum, 144 Constitution Ave. NE.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Compromise Plan Could Broaden Definition Of Unlawful Combatants ... 3
Republican Leaders Reach Tentative Deal On Domestic Surveillance Legislation ... 3
US, EU Close To Agreement On Passenger Data ... 4
FBI Confirms Legality Of Contributions To Michigan Muslim Charity ... 4
Pakistani Sentenced To 18 Years In Prison For Al Qaeda Missile Plot ... 4
EU Panel Expresses Doubts Over US Financial Transaction Monitoring ... 4
Guantanamo Authorities Strive To Teach Guards About Ramadan ... 4
Wickham Says Administration Has Double Standard On Extradition ... 4

Patriot Act:

Internet Consultant Suing DOJ, FBI Over NSL Gag Order ... 5

Homeland Response:

Administration Awards Nearly $400 Million In Security Grants ... 5
TSA Will Allow Some Liquid Gels And Aerosols On Airplanes ... 5
FBI Says 2001 Anthrax Was Not Specially Treated ... 6
Muslim Scholar Denied Visa To Enter US ... 6

War News:

Democrats Say Leaked NIE Proves Bush's Iraq Policy Is Flawed 6
Top Al Qaeda Figure Who Escaped From Afghan Prison Killed In Iraq ... 8
Former Generals Blast Rumsfeld At Democrats' Hearing ... 9
Townsend Defends Cheney's Assertions On Iraq ... 10
Pentagon Extends 3,800 Soldiers' Iraq Tours ... 10
US Soldiers Targeted By Militants From Within Sadr City ... 11
Kurds Seize Police Station Slated To Be Handed Over To Sunni Commander ... 11
Saddam Once Again Removed From Court ... 12
Rice's Use Of Civil Rights Movement As Analogy For Iraq War Derided ... 12
Marines Accused Of Murdering Iraqi Civilian Will Not Face Death Penalty ... 12
Karzai Accuses Musharraf Of Tolerating Presence Of Terrorists 12
Afghan Women's Rights Activist Assassinated ... 12

DOJ:

Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Receives DOJ Service Award ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

H-P Urged To Overhaul Its Board ... 13
Sentencing Of Ex-Homestore CEO Delayed ... 14
Former Hedge Fund Manager Charged With Insider Trading ... 14
Scrushy Lawyers Say Jurors Discussed Case In E-Mails ... 14
Ebbers To Report To Federal Prison Today ... 15
Fastow To Help Prosecutors Pursue Bankers In Enron Case ... 15
FBI Cracking Down On Options Fraud ... 15
Fleming Cos. Ordered To Pay $3 Million In Claims, Interest And Attorney Fees ... 15
Judge Delays Sale Of Segal Estate ... 15
SEC Database To Undergo $54 Million Upgrade ... 15
Firms Ousting CEOs At Record Pace ... 16
WPost Says Amaranth Shows Danger And Safety Of Hedge Funds ... 16

Criminal Law:

"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Pleads Guilty To Record-Keeping Violations ... 16
Judge Backs FBI Search Of Coca-Cola Executive's Home ... 16
World Gaming Officials Resign Amid Widening Online Gambling Probe ... 17
US Fails To Win Convictions In Pellicano-Related Perjury Trial . 17
Gotti's Mother Lashes Out At Prosecutor As Jurors Continue Deliberations ... 17
Three Arrested In Massachusetts Mob Gambling Investigation .. 17
Washington State Inmate Charged With Threatening Judges ... 18
Miller Seeks Criminal Probe Of Reading Program ... 18
US Indicts Former GUEA Directors With Fraud, Tax Violations .. 18
Jurors In Katrina Bus Case Will Not Hear About Deadly Blaze ... 18
Sister Of Connecticut Drug Lord Charged With Lying About 1996 Murder ... 18
Unfamiliarity With Legal Principles Common In New York's Justice Courts ... 19
Virginia Police Chief Seeks To Protect Kids From Internet Predators ... 19

Civil Law:

DOJ Appeals Order To Release NRO Budget Documents ... 19

Judge Rules Suit Over "Light" Cigarettes Can Proceed 19
Insurance Adjuster Seeks To Silence Whistleblowing Sisters..... 21
AOL Sued Over Release Of Search Data 21

Civil Rights:

FBI Investigating Possible Arizona Hate Crime 21
Veteran ACLU Supporters Seek Ouster Of Group's Leadership 21
Republicans, Democrats At Odds Over Voter ID Laws 21
Spellings Letter Encourages Public School Teachers To Celebrate Christmas 21
Tierney Criticizes "Pre-Ordained Conclusion" Of NAS Report On Discrimination In Sciences 22

Antitrust:

Consumer Groups Urge Limits On Proposed AT&T-BellSouth Merger 22
Legislative Obstacles Remain For Texas Airfield Bill 22
Brokers Lining Up As Partners To Traditional Players 22
IBM To Publish Patent Filings Online 23
United Airlines Retains Bank To Chart Merger Strategy 23
Loudeye Gets Antitrust Nod For Nokia Buy 23
EU Ends Antitrust Immunity For Shippers 23

Environment:

Judge Blocks Sale Of Alaska Oil And Gas Leases 23
Three Maryland E-Coli Cases Not Linked To Bad Spinach 24
Government Climatologists Warn Of Continuing Global Warming24
EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program To Reorganize 24
Doctoral Student Examines Skunks' Effect On Martha's Vineyard's Endangered Birds 24
LATimes Says Bush Must Heed Law On Roadless Forest Policy24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Norte Valle Ring Member Extradited To US 24
Drug Seizures Along US-Mexico Border Reach Record Amounts25
Federal Anti-Meth Measure To Take Effect 25
US Gives Tajikistan Boats, Equipment To Combat Drug Trafficking 25
NYTimes Blasts House "Gun Decontrol Measure." 25

Immigration:

House, Senate Negotiators Agree On New Funds To Secure Border 25

Congress-Administration:

DOJ Support For 9th Circuit Split Seen As Possible Sea Change26
WSJournal Defends FREE Judiciary Seminars 26
Roberts, Alito To Stay In Cert Pool This Term 27
Lawmakers Urge Creation Of Food Safety Agency 27
Bloggers To Join Bush For Signing Of Spending Database Law 27
Democrats Hope To Use Majority To Force US Withdrawal From Iraq 27
GOP House Leaders Indecisive On Date For Leadership Elections 28
CMS Names New Acting Director 28
Federal Agencies Hiring Contractors In Times Of Crisis 28
Report Suggests Federal Government Tighten Hiring Procedures 29
Critics Say Capitol Visitor Center Has Become Boondoggle..... 29

Other News:

Data On Home Prices Add To Evidence Of Cooling Real Estate Market 29
Crude Oil Prices Rise Sharply After Dipping Below $60 30
Rice Calls Clinton's Statements On Bush And Bin Laden "Flatly False." 30
Both Parties Seek Edge On Issues In Congress As Midterm Elections Loom 31
Congressional Republicans Not Running From Bush's Fundraising 32
Snow To Raise Funds For GOP Candidates 33
House GOP Leaders, Rove To Press Lobbyists For Funds..... 33
Control Of House May Not Be Settled In November 33
Landscape Of Battle For Senate Shifting 34
Democrats Hope To Be Competitive In Western States 34
House GOP Boosts Contribution Levy 34
Blue Dogs' PAC Raises $1 Million For First Time 34
Former Allen Acquaintances Say He Used Racist Slurs In 1970s And '80s 35
Green Party Candidate Will Be Removed From Pennsylvania Senate Ballot 35
Lieberman Calls For Expediting US Training Of Iraqi Forces..... 36
Ehrlich Donor A Major Backer Of Controversial Road Project 36
Campaigns Rely On "Microtargeting" To Reach Voters 36
Panel Recommends Course To Affordable Healthcare 36
Obama's Household Income Soars In First Year In Senate..... 36
Elizabeth Edwards' Book Focuses On Tragedy Of Son's Death. 36
Judge Delays Ruling On Lawsuit Against Clintons 37
Superdome's Return Seen As Symbol Of Hope For New Orleans 37
EU, Iran Said To Be "Close" To Enrichment Suspension Deal ... 37
Armitage Sees "Even Chance" Of North Korean Nuclear Test This Year 37
Musharraf Memoir Discusses Khan's Activities 38
Olmert, Senior Saudi Official Said To Have Met 38
Hamas, Fatah Call Off Talks On Unity Government 38
Rice Says UNIFIL Has "Robust Mandate" To Act 38
Bush Expected To Sign Darfur Sanctions Bill 39
Abe Will Become Japanese Premier Today 39
Hu Removes Scandal-Tainted Shanghai Leader 40
Pope Meets With Representatives Of Muslim Nations 40
Somali City Turns Violent After Islamist Forces Move In 40
Indonesian Christians Warily Watching For Response To Bali Bombers 40
Bolton Critical Of Venezuelan Foreign Minister's Airport Complaint 40
EC Chief Says Bulgaria, Romania Will Be Last Two New EU Entrants For Now 40
Kristof Examines Massive New African Park Plan 40
Bangkok Writer Recounts Coup 40

DOJ_NMG_0069553

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 42

TERRORISM NEWS:

Compromise Plan Could Broaden Definition Of Unlawful Combatants. The Washington Post (9/26, Smith, 748K) reports on its front page that government sources say GOP lawmakers and the White House "agreed over the weekend to alter new legislation on military commissions to allow the United States to detain and try a wider range of foreign nationals than an earlier version of the bill permitted." Congress "has not yet expressed its view on who is an unlawful combatant, and the Supreme Court has not ruled directly on the matter," and human rights advocates are concerned that the "language in the new provision would be a precedent-setting congressional endorsement for the indefinite detention of anyone who, as the bill states, 'has engaged in hostilities or who has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States' or its military allies." The definition "applies to foreigners living inside or outside" the US, "and does not rule out the possibility of designating a U.S. citizen as an unlawful combatant."

Specter Opposes Stripping Courts Of Jurisdiction. The AP (9/25, Kellman) reports Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter is "leading the charge" against a provision in the compromise plan that would "strip federal courts of jurisdiction over cases in which detainees have not been charged with war crimes." Specter and other opponents say it would "deny terrorism suspects the ability to challenge their detainment, a right afforded defendants in military and criminal courts." USA Today (9/26, 4A, Kiely, Jackson, 2.27M) says Specter's opposition could complicate efforts to win congressional approval for the compromise.

Democrats In "Awkward Position" Due To Intelligence Briefing Secrecy. The Hill (9/26, Tiron) reports some senior congressional Democrats "find themselves in an awkward position" in the debate over detainees, "unable to openly criticize some of the Bush administration's policies" because they were sworn to secrecy after receiving intelligence briefings. House Intelligence ranking Democrat Jane Harman says that "makes it difficult to attempt to change the clandestine policies or conduct proper oversight." Harman said, "It is very hard to deal with an incomplete deck of cards."

WPost Calls Court-Stripping "A Terrible Idea." The Washington Post (9/26, A20, 748K) editorializes, "The compromise bill strips the courts of any jurisdiction to hear cases -- including those cases already pending -- concerning detainee treatment. … This is not the first time Congress has sought to limit judicial supervision of detentions in the war on terrorism. After the Supreme Court's assertion of jurisdiction over Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, in 2004 triggered a series of lawsuits, Congress moved to force their dismissal as part of the Detainee Treatment Act. The court found that the act did not apply to pending cases, leaving the lower courts unable to hear new cases but with jurisdiction over those already filed. The new measure would complete the job, removing jurisdiction over the remaining cases. … This is a terrible idea."

Republican Leaders Reach Tentative Deal On Domestic Surveillance Legislation. The New York Times (9/26, Lichtblau) reports, "Republican leaders said Monday that they had reached a tentative agreement to garner political support for legislation on domestic surveillance, in part by sidestepping the question of whether the president has the constitutional authority to order wiretapping without a court order." The Times continues, "There was wide disagreement about the plan's impact. Supporters billed the most recent version as a way of requiring a court order for most domestic wiretaps. But civil rights advocates and even some administration officials suggested that it would maintain the status quo in allowing the continuation of wiretapping without warrants under a program approved by President Bush. … Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who leads the Judiciary Committee, said that in recent negotiations, the White House had agreed to delete language from his bill that critics said would have implicitly acknowledged the president's constitutional authority to order wiretapping without a warrant." The Times adds, "Three Republican senators — Larry E. Craig of Idaho, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska — had raised concerns about this and other aspects of the Specter bill, which would submit the wiretapping program to a secret court to rule on its constitutionality. With the changes, they said they could support the legislation, and Mr. Specter predicted he would have enough Senate votes to gain passage. … The three said the new plan would protect 'the rights afforded to citizens in the Constitution,' in part by requiring that the administration get a court order if it wanted to listen to conversations of an American citizen or others defined as 'U.S. persons." In a statement, they said the new plan would require that "in order to conduct electronic surveillance of a U.S. person, a court-ordered warrant is necessary.' … Some lawmakers and civil rights advocates said they believed that the three senators had mischaracterized or misinterpreted what they had agreed to and that the White House was retaining the right to order wiretaps without a warrant." The Times notes, "The program approved by Mr. Bush 'does allow for the interception without court order of international communications where one end is within the United States, and this agreement would provide this authority and would establish a process for moving to individualized court orders with respect to individuals within the United States,' said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. He declined to elaborate." The Washington Post (9/26, A3, Weisman, 748K) reports the changes "have won the support of three balking Senate Republicans," Larry Craig, Lisa Murkowski, and John Sununu, "improving the chances that a bill expanding the Bush administration's surveillance authority will pass Congress this week." The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Simon, Schmitt, 918K) carries a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0069554

US, EU Close To Agreement On Passenger Data. The Financial Times (9/26, Bounds, Cameron) reports, "The US and European Union are close to a deal for sharing airline passenger information that would avert disruption to the world's busiest air traffic routes. Officials from both sides of the Atlantic have confirmed that a new anti-terrorism agreement is almost certain to be signed on Thursday, two days before the current regime expires." A "US official" said, "This is too big to fail. … We have made a lot of progress over the last few days."

FBI Confirms Legality Of Contributions To Michigan Muslim Charity. The Detroit News (9/26, Krupa) reports, "Contributions to an Islamic charity in Southfield remain legal despite an FBI raid on Sept. 18, according to federal officials. The Life for Relief and Development has not been designated by the federal government as an organization that provides support for terrorists, according to Bob Beeckman, a spokesman for the FBI in Detroit. … 'The search warrant is based on criminal statutes, and I can't go any farther,' Beeckman said. Local Muslim leaders said that the information that donations remain legal will help assuage rampant concerns in their community, at the beginning of the holy month of Ramadan, when Muslims are required to make charitable donations."

Pakistani Sentenced To 18 Years In Prison For Al Qaeda Missile Plot. The AP (9/26) reports, "A Pakistani man was sentenced Monday to more than 18 years in prison for conspiring with an Indian-born U.S. citizen to obtain and sell Stinger anti-aircraft missiles to the Taliban and al-Qaida." Syed Mustajab Shah "admitted that he tried to sell five tons of hashish and a half-ton of heroin in exchange for cash and four shoulder-fired Stinger missiles, which he and the other defendants intended to sell to members of the Taliban. … Shah knew at the time that the Taliban was the same as al-Qaida, prosecutors said." The AP notes Shah and co-defendants Ilyas Ali and Muhamed Abid Afridi "were arrested…by police in Hong Kong who received a tip from the FBI. The three were secretly videotaped in meetings days earlier with undercover FBI agents at a Hong Kong hotel."

EU Panel Expresses Doubts Over US Financial Transaction Monitoring. The New York Times (9/26, Lichtblau, 1.21M) reports an EU panel "has serious doubts about the legality of a Bush administration program that monitors international financial transactions," according to its German leader. The panel "plans to recommend tighter controls to prevent privacy abuses." The panel "will not call for the program to be stopped," but it is "expected to recommend that additional safeguards be put in place" to check how financial records are shared with US intelligence.

Guantanamo Authorities Strive To Teach Guards About Ramadan. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Connell, Lopez, 918K) reports that with the beginning of Ramadan, Guantanamo Bay authorities "have stepped up efforts to teach guards about the religious observance, amid signs that radical strains of Islam are becoming a potent organizing tool at the facility." Some military officials "say it may have been a tactical mistake to stop providing Muslim chaplains. Many of the detainees are poorly educated and look up to those who can read and cite Quranic verses, according to former troops who worked inside the camps. This has opened the way for radical interpretations by religious leaders on the cellblocks and helped justify such actions as suicides, according to personnel who served at the camp."

Wickham Says Administration Has Double Standard On Extradition. In his USA Today (9/26, 11A, 2.27M) column, DeWayne Wickham contrasts the Bush Administration's sending of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen of Syrian descent, to Syria, where "the Bush administration had good reason to know he would be brutalized," with its refusal to send Luis Posada Carriles back to Venezuela. Wickham says, "The Bush administration has contradictory standards -- one for people who are thought to be enemies of this country, such as Arar, and another for Posada, an accused terrorist, who is the enemy of its enemies."

DOJ_NMG_0069555

PATRIOT ACT:

Internet Consultant Suing DOJ, FBI Over NSL Gag Order. The New York Times (9/26, Hartocollis, 1.21M) reports, "Federal District Court in Manhattan has made public an affidavit from a plaintiff whose identity cannot be revealed. In the affidavit, he says he has to lie to those close to him to preserve the secrecy of a national security investigation that he believes is morally questionable. … He describes himself as the former president of an Internet access and consulting business. Some time ago (the government will not allow him to say when), he received a so-called national security letter from the F.B.I., asking him to provide information about one of his clients in connection with 'international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities.' The letter also said he was prohibited from talking with anyone about the investigation." The Times notes, "Mr. Doe said he resisted the government's demand because he did not want to violate the privacy of his clients. In April 2004, represented by the American Civil Liberties Union, he filed a lawsuit against the attorney general, John Ashcroft, and Robert S. Mueller, the director of the F.B.I."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Awards Nearly $400 Million In Security Grants. The AP (9/26, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration doled out nearly $400 million Monday to help protect seaports, commuter trains and other transit systems from terrorists, boosting money to high-risk cities that saw funding cuts earlier this year. Major winners included New York City, which won $79.5 million to secure its port, subways, bus and rail systems -- up from $50 million in 2005." The AP adds, "Losing cities that got no money for 2006 after being on the Homeland Security Department funding list last year included Memphis, Tenn., and Tampa, Fla., which lost funds for ports."

USA Today (9/26, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "More than three months after the department caused an uproar by cutting funds by 40% in another grant program to New York City and Washington, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said his department is reworking the way it distributes such grants. 'You're never going to make everybody happy,' he said. 'There's never enough money.'" Chertoff "said the cuts in June came because Congress shrank the amount of grants. He said risk and consequence always would be the main factors the department uses in handing out federal anti-terrorism money." Port security "accounted for $168 million of the money distributed Monday to 51 cities." The Washington Post (9/26, A3, Hsu, 748K) notes American Public Transportation Association spokeswoman Virginia Miller "said the $13 million is helpful, but the industry has identified $6 billion in security needs."

The New York Times/AP (9/26) reports, "Money to protect the perimeters of New York and New Jersey's ports will be increased to $25.7 million, from $6.6 million." Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg "said that he was gratified federal officials 'are recognizing the risks here and giving us more money.'"

TSA Will Allow Some Liquid Gels And Aerosols On Airplanes. ABC World News (9/25, story 5, 0:30, Gibson) reported, "The government…announced new rules for what airline passengers can bring in their carry-on bags and what they can take on planes. A sweeping ban on liquids and gels was put into effect last month. when a terror plot in Britain was uncovered." But "starting tomorrow, the Transportation Security Administration will allow travel-size toiletries on planes that fit in one small, clear plastic bag as well as drinks, if they are bought in the secure area of the airport."

The AP (9/26, Miller) reports Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley said yesterday "the FBI and other laboratories tested a variety of explosives and found that tiny amounts of substances -- so small they fit into a quart-size plastic bag -- can't blow up an airliner, Hawley said at a news conference at Reagan National Airport."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some will say this is more confusion in the air. Some will say it's a victory for common sense." NBC (Costello) added that " while airline security has improved dramatically since 9/11, the TSA still doesn't have the technology in place to screen every bag for liquid explosives. A gaping hole, say security experts, in the nation's security blanket." Rick Haan, former FBI explosives expert: "The technology is not there to detect liquid explosives, these are actually precursor chemicals that would be mixed into an explosive mixture onboard the aircraft." NBC added, "Several companies are working to develop the technology, but in the meantime, the TSA's convinced the amounts liquids and gels it's allowing onboard now are too small to pose a risk."

CBS Evening News (9/25, story 6, 2:50, Orr reported, "Critics…say the Transportation Security Administration is years late in developing high-tech scanners…which can tell the difference between a liquid explosive and a bottle of water." CBS added that "the ban on large volumes of carry-on liquids will likely remain in place through the ends of the year. At least with these tweaks…arriving passengers will no longer have to make their first stop a drugstore."

The New York Times (9/26, Lipton, 1.21M) reports Hawley "said the agency intended to test new equipment, including a machine that can evaluate bottles to see whether a liquid inside is explosive, or a machine similar to a CAT scan that can more reliably evaluate carry-on bags to see whether they might have bombs." The problem, he said, is "ensuring that the equipment will work as promised by the manufacturers, Mr. Hawley said. 'We don't want to be in the position of, out of the urgent need to do this, we essentially waste the taxpayers' money,' he said. 'We want to take our time to do it right.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069556

USA Today (9/26, Frank, 2.27M) reports A.J. Castilla, "a screener at Boston's Logan International Airport and spokesman for a screeners union, said the new policy "is more confusing and certainly will add to the lines during the holidays." 'We're just adding another level of screening to a screening process that was simple,' Castilla said."

The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Neuman, Mohammed, 918K) says "the changes were hailed by passengers and by the airline industry." Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (9/26, Meckler, 2.03M) reports "the US decision was welcomed not only by travelers but by airlines and airports, whose operations were hampered by the stricter rules. Airport vendors lost considerable revenue as customers stopped buying drinks and, at duty-free shops, bottles of perfume and liquor that were banned from the planes. And airlines had to contend with the sharp increase in checked bags."

The Washington Times (9/26, Hudson, 88K) and Washington Post (9/26, A1, Wilber, 748K) run similar reports. USA Today (9/26, Frank, 2.27M) also runs a Q&A section detailing the new policy,

Former DHS IG Opposes Lifting Ban. On USA Today (9/26, 2.27M), Clark Kent Ervin, director of the Aspen Institute's homeland security initiative and former inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security, writes that "it would be one thing if TSA had developed an effective counter-technology in the ensuing weeks, but it has not done so. Instead, it says that it has determined that small quantities of liquids and gels pose no harm, and that drinks purchased in the "sterile" areas of airports past the screening checkpoints are likewise harmless." He adds, "I am skeptical that TSA has definitively determined that small quantities of liquids and gels pose no threat. Given its track record, it is far likelier that TSA has simply determined that small quantities pose minimal threats. The problem with that is I would have said that small things such as box cutters probably could not be used to kill 3,000 people, and yet, that's what the 9/11 hijackers did."

FBI Says 2001 Anthrax Was Not Specially Treated. The New York Times (9/26, Broad, 1.21M) reports, "Seeking to clear up public confusion, an F.B.I. official has reiterated the bureau's judgment that the anthrax in the letter attacks five years ago bore no special coatings to increase its deadliness and no hallmarks of a military weapon." The statement "contradicts an array of assessments over the years," in which a "variety of public and private experts proclaimed the deadly spores to have been specially treated to enhance their ability to float in the air and reach deep into human lungs, where they could germinate and kill their host. … But the bureau official, Douglas J. Beecher, a scientist at the F.B.I. Laboratory in Quantico, Va., disputed such claims as misguided in a recent journal article."

Muslim Scholar Denied Visa To Enter US. The AP (9/25, Neumeister) reported Tariq Ramadan, "a prominent Muslim scholar" and Swiss citizen "was denied a temporary business and tourism visa Thursday 'based solely on his actions, which constituted providing material support to a terrorist organization,' said Janelle Hironimus, a State Department spokeswoman." However, the American Civil Liberties Union, which says Ramadan "was being excluded because he donated $765 to French and Swiss organizations that provide humanitarian aid to Palestinians," argued that the decision "amounts to censorship. 'This case is really about speech,' said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU lawyer. 'The government is using the immigration laws as a means of silencing and stigmatizing a prominent cleric.'"

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Say Leaked NIE Proves Bush's Iraq Policy Is Flawed. NBC Nightly News (9/25, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It is a report from the very top of US intelligence and it is meant for the boss -- the President and the very top of our government. The report, called the National Intelligence Estimate, or the NIE, has been leaked to the press. That is bad news for the Bush Administration because of the report's conclusion -- that the war in Iraq has created a new generation of Islamic radicals and the overall terrorist threat is now worse because this war has amounted to a huge recruiting tool for those who would do us harm." NBC added, "For weeks the President has successfully kept public attention on terrorism rather than the war in Iraq. Today, Democrats tried to change that by seizing on intelligence findings that the Iraq war has made the terror threat worse. Mr. Bush got the blame."

ABC World News (9/25, story 3, 1:55, Gibson) reported, "There was no question that this report would cause a political firestorm because it really goes right to the heart of the debate in this country. The President has been arguing for months that fighting terrorists in Iraq has made Americans safer at home. … But the National Intelligence Estimate says the war has created a rallying cry for terrorists, a point Democrats seized on today."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "These conclusions are not a surprise. This is what we've been hearing from the CIA Director and from the Director of National Intelligence, John Negroponte and in their recent speeches. … Some of the other conclusions are interesting. The Internet has helped spread Jihadist ideology. Cyberspace is now a haven for these operatives and they spread beyond their original bases in places like Afghanistan and they're not centrally controlled by Osama bin Laden but they're self-generating cells who are inspired by bin Laden. We've known some of these things but when it comes to Iraq, they don't pull their punches. In the short term the war has become a breeding ground and has made things worse, not better."

DOJ_NMG_0069557

The Washington Post (9/26, A3, Abramowitz, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Democratic lawmakers yesterday seized on elements of a new classified intelligence assessment as validation of their long-standing position that the Iraq war has been a distraction from the broader war against terrorists, seeing the new study as an opportunity to undermine President Bush's determined offensive to turn terrorism to political advantage in the midterm elections. … After weeks in which White House officials believed they had partly succeeded in reframing the elections around terrorism, rather than Iraq, the new report threatened to reverse those gains."

The Washington Times (9/26, Fagan, 88K) reports Democrats "said their long-standing criticisms of the administration are validated by a leaked intelligence assessment that reportedly found the Iraq war has helped spur more Islamic radicals. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said April's National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), as described Sunday by the New York Times and The Washington Post, states 'what many of us have been saying for months' about U.S. efforts in Iraq. … Democrats said the administration should make the report public but Carl Kropf, a spokesman for Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, said in an e-mail message that 'there is no indication that this NIE will be declassified.'"

Bartlett Says Leaked Portion Of NIE Does Not Provide A Full Picture. CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Malveaux) reported, "I talked to the counselor to the President, Dan Bartlett, earlier today who made a couple of important points. First of all, he says that this leaked portion of the NIE portion is just. It's a leaked portion. It does not give the full picture and does not give the full story. … So I asked him, of course, why not just declassify this NIE document? It has been done in the past when the lead up to the Iraq war and making the case for Iraq, weapons of mass destruction, most recently the president talking about his secret CIA detainee program and Bartlett said he did not believe that this rises to the occasion of declassifying that material."

Roberts Seeks Declassification Of NIE. The New York Times (9/26, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports Senators Pat Roberts and Jay Rockefeller, the top Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, "called on Monday for the White House to declassify the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism that was produced in April. … 'I think the administration should declassify this document so the American people can see the material for themselves and come to their own conclusions,' Mr. Roberts said in a statement. Mr. Roberts and Mr. Rockefeller said the estimate should be stripped of sensitive material before being released." However, the Times adds that White House officials "said making the information public would only help terrorists gain a better understanding of how much the United States knows of their operations. 'What we don't want to do is tell them what we know so they know how to operate around that,' Frances Townsend, the White House domestic security adviser, said in an interview on CNN." Counselor to the president, Dan Bartlett, "told CNN on Monday that releasing the report would have a chilling effect on the intelligence analysts 'who are trying to give very candid advice or very candid estimates.'"

The AP (9/26, Shrader) reports Roberts "said the public discussion has given the 'false impression' that the National Intelligence Estimate focuses exclusively on Iraq and terrorism. 'That is not true,' Roberts said, noting that the committee has had the report since April. 'This NIE examines global terrorism in its totality.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Blitzer) reported that "some Democrats are finding aid and comfort in the classified intelligence estimate of the terror threat to the United States. Intelligence and counter-terrorism officials say the report concludes the war in Iraq is giving fuel to Islamic extremism and al Qaeda wannabes. Now some Democrats and Republicans are feuding over the leaked part of the report, and whether it distorts the truth or proves the Iraq war was a failure. And it's all playing out only six weeks before Election Day."

Townsend Makes Case For Keeping NIE Classified. President Bush's Homeland Security Adviser Fran Townsend was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/25) why the Administration will not declassify the NIE "so the American public will be able to read it in terms of its full context." Townsend said, "Because the problem…is, as usual, with classified documents, the reason they're classified is so we don't share what our understanding is and what our beliefs are about their motives and their capability. What we don't want to do is tell them what we know so they know how to operate around that. And so the leaking of classified documents is always very dangerous and it's particularly dangerous in this case." Townsend added that "having gone through this document, it's a difficult thing to do when you're talking about an assessment of global trends and the development of the enemy."

Townsend made the same case on MSNBC's Hardball (9/25), saying that "you've got a paragraph that's been leaked out of a nine-page summary and a more-than-35-page report that looks at global trends in terrorism. It talks about the jihad in Iraq as being one of the propaganda tools of the jihadists as a method of recruiting, as a method of raising money – that's -- but it's one. There's many historical grievances that they use, and this is one piece." Townsend added, "I don't think there's any question that it's been selectively leaked."

DOJ_NMG_0069558

Townsend was also the guest at Monday's Christian Science Monitor (9/26, Cook, 58K) "Monitor Breakfast." The "self-described worrier…quipped, 'If we were going to go through the long list of things that bother me and that I worry about, we would be here for lunch.'" The Monitor says the "youthful and outgoing Townsend is a rarity in Washington -- someone who worked in the top reaches of both the Clinton and the Bush administrations. President George Bush has entrusted her with a crucial portfolio. During Bill Clinton's presidency, Townsend rose through a series of increasingly influential Justice Department positions." Discussing the leaked NIE that said the Iraq war has increased the problem of terrorism, Townsend said, "It is not clear to me that the headline we saw…that America is less safe, is actually contained in the NIE. The statements that were leaked, once again it was classified information, and that is always damaging. And secondly, what I would say…is most damaging, frankly, as the director of national intelligence said yesterday, [is that] it is taken out of context."

Hunter Says NIE Offers An Opinion, Not Evidence. Rep. Duncan Hunter said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/25), "What you're getting from the NIE is not evidence. What you're getting is an opinion. And I disagree with the opinion and I'll tell you why. When we got hit on 9/11, the last two American military operations, major operations had been to save Muslim nations. That was Kuwait and of course Bosnia. So we went in and we saved Muslim nations. And the reward was we got struck on 9/11. So the idea that we've somehow created the enemy, that but for our aggressiveness, guys like al-Zarqawi would not be targeting the United States, that doesn't make any sense."

Talabani Disagrees With NIE's Conclusions. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/25) for his opinions on the NIE. Talabani said, "I don't agree with this. I don't agree at all. I think the liberation of Iraq reduced the danger of terrorism on the United States of America because all terrorist groups are now concentrating on Iraq, focusing in Iraq, sending their troops to Iraq, busy with Iraq; otherwise they're concentrating their efforts against the United States of America."

NIE's Conclusions Questioned. In his monthly column for the Washington Post (9/26, A21, 748K) Robert Kagan writes, "It's too bad we won't get to see the full National Intelligence Estimate on 'Trends in Global Terrorism' selectively leaked to The Post and the New York Times last week. The Times headline read 'Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat.' But there were no quotations from the NIE itself, so all we have are journalists' characterizations of anonymous comments by government officials, whose motives and reliability we can't judge, about intelligence assessments whose logic and argument, as well as factual basis, we have no way of knowing or gauging. Based on the press coverage alone, the NIE's judgment seems both impressionistic and imprecise."

WSJournal Urges Bush To Declassify NIE. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes, "It's impossible to know how true this report is, of course, since the NIE itself hasn't been leaked. The reports are based on what sources claim the NIE says, but we don't know who those sources are and what motivations they might have. Since their spin coincides rather conveniently with the argument made by Democratic critics of the war, and since this leak has also conveniently sprung in high campaign season, wise readers will be skeptical. … So here's our suggestion for President Bush: Declassify the entire NIE."

Top Al Qaeda Figure Who Escaped From Afghan Prison Killed In Iraq. CBS Evening News (9/25, story 4, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "British troops killed a top al Qaeda terrorist who was living in Basra in southern Iraq. … He was once thought to head up al Qaeda's operations in southeast Asia." The New York Times (9/26, Tavernise, 1.21M) says Omar al-Faruq was an Iraqi "senior operative of Al Qaeda who engineered a brazen escape from a high-security American prison in Afghanistan last year." He "was killed Monday in a predawn raid by British soldiers in a quiet, wealthy neighborhood in southern Iraq, an American official and an official in Basra said. About 250 soldiers wearing night-vision goggles and carrying specially equipped rifles stormed a house in the Junainah neighborhood of Basra, intending to capture the operative. … They were fired upon as they entered, and shot back, killing Mr. Faruq." A British military spokesman "declined to say whether he was the same man who had escaped from the American military detention center in Bagram, Afghanistan, in July 2005. An American official in Washington and an official in Basra, neither of whom was authorized to speak publicly on the subject, said Mr. Faruq was the same man." The Times notes, "At the time of his arrest, in Jakarta, Indonesia, in June 2002, Mr. Faruq was described as one of the most important Qaeda figures ever captured by the United States."

The AP (9/26, Quinn) reports Farouq "and three other al-Qaida suspects escaped from Bagram, in central Afghanistan, in July 2005, but the Pentagon waited until November to confirm his escape. The delay upset Indonesia, which had arrested al-Farouq in 2002 and turned him over to the United States. …. Al-Farouq and the three other escapees boasted about their breakout from Bagram on a video broadcast in October 2005 on Al-Arabiya television."

DOJ_NMG_0069559

Former Generals Blast Rumsfeld At Democrats' Hearing. ABC World News (9/25, story 2, 0:50, Gibson) reported, "a retired Army General made a stunning declaration. Major General John Batiste said the way the war has been conducted has inflamed Islamic fundamentalism, created more enemies for the US and, in a charge you don't expect to hear from an Army commander said the war needlessly destroyed American lives and he placed the blame on the Defense Secretary." Batiste: "Secretary Rumsfeld's dismal strategic decisions resulted in the unnecessary deaths of American servicemen and women and our allies and good people of Iraq. He was responsible for American or allies going to war with the wrong plan and a strategy that did not address the realities of fighting an insurgency."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "today at a hearing organized by Democrats, retired military officers accused Defense Secretary Rumsfeld of fueling terrorism by mismanaging the war." Batiste was shown saying, "Iraq didn't have to be the way it was. We created this insurgency. We let it grow, we let it develop, we let it blossom."

The AP (9/26, Espo) reports the retired officers "bluntly accused" Rumsfeld "of bungling the war in Iraq, saying U.S. troops were sent to fight without the best equipment and that critical facts were hidden from the public." The Democratic Policy Committee's panel heard testimony from Batiste, retired Army Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton and retired Marine Col. Thomas Hammes, all of whom support Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's ouster. Batiste testified that Rumsfeld "and others in the administration did not tell the American people the truth for fear of losing support for the war in Iraq." Batiste also "said Rumsfeld at one point threatened to fire the next person who mentioned the need for a postwar plan in Iraq." Eaton "assessed Rumsfeld as 'incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically.'" Sen. John Cornyn "dismissed the Democratic-sponsored event as 'an election-year smoke screen aimed at obscuring the Democrats' dismal record on national security.'

The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Levey, 918K) reports, "Adding to criticism of the Bush administration's prosecution of the war in Iraq," Batiste "said Monday that requests by commanders for more soldiers were repeatedly turned down." Batiste said, "Many of us routinely asked for more troops." The Times reports that Batiste was "contradicting statements by President Bush and his senior aides that the administration had given the military all the resources it had asked for." Eaton, "who oversaw efforts to train and equip Iraqi security forces in 2003 and 2004, also said he was not given enough U.S. troops to do the job."

Generals Prescribe "More Troops, More Money And More Time In Iraq." The Washington Post's Dana Milbank (9/26, A2) writes Batiste, "who retired in protest rather than accept a three-star promotion, was a persuasive witness -- and Democrats were joyous. 'Your statement, I believe, defines the word "courage,"' Sen. Byron Dorgan gushed." Sen. Charles Schumer "pumped his fist and gave Batiste and his colleagues pats on the biceps." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "proclaimed, giddily: 'This hearing today could change our country.' Perhaps. But Democrats, while celebrating Batiste's criticism of the administration, exercised some selective listening at the hearing when Batiste and his colleagues offered their solution: more troops, more money and more time in Iraq." Milbank notes Eaton said, "We are, conservatively, 60,000 soldiers short."

The Washington Times (9/26, Fagan, 88K) reports, "all three of the retired leaders, however, backed up the administration assertion that pulling out of Iraq now would be disastrous and cause a dangerous regional instability."

McConnell Calls Hearing "Another Partisan Media Event." McClatchy Newspapers (9/26, Talev) report the testimony came during "the first of what Senate Democrats say will be a series of oversight hearings they're holding on the Iraq war. They say Republicans haven't exercised enough oversight since the March 2003 invasion. But Democrats also are trying to focus public attention back on Iraq because polls show Republicans are vulnerable on it and congressional elections will be held in six weeks." Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell "denounced the two-hour hearing, packed with anti-war activists and reporters, as 'simply another partisan media event. And while it may rile up their liberal base, it won't kill a single terrorist or prevent a single attack.'"

Lott Threatens Democrats Over Unofficial Hearings On Iraq. The Hill (9/26, Allen) reports Sen. Trent Lott "is threatening to punish Democrats for using an Appropriations Committee room for an unofficial hearing on Iraq oversight if it happens again." Lott is quoted as saying, "They better stop this. … This will be the last one or there will be retribution." However, The Hill notes that "if he is looking for a culprit in abetting the Democratic Policy Committee's (DPC) hearing yesterday, he need look no further than fellow Mississippi Republican Thad Cochran, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who controls the Dirksen Building room that Democrats used yesterday and have used for past hearings." According to The Hill, Lott and other Republicans "are upset that Democrats have gone outside the committee process to highlight the Iraq war before the November election."

Jones Attends Democrats' Hearing. The Hill (9/26, Allen) also reports that "the mostly Democratic panel was not without Republican representation." Rep. Walter B. Jones "made a nearly five-hour drive to the Capitol to participate in the hearing. Jones, who represents Camp Lejeune, voted to authorize the Iraq war but has criticized its execution. 'To me this is not politics, this is policy issues,' he said. 'The party that demands the truth is the party that the public respects.' In his opening statement, Jones quoted Rudyard Kipling: 'If any question why we died, tell them, because our fathers lied.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069560

Townsend Defends Cheney's Assertions On Iraq. President Bush's Homeland Security Adviser Fran Townsend was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/25) about the fact that Vice President Dick Cheney is "on the record as having said that Saddam Hussein was somehow involved in the attack on us on 9/11," but now says that "there was no connection between Saddam Hussein and 9/11." Townsend said, "What I would say to you, when you say that, is Republicans and Democrats -- both administrations -- believed that Iraq was a threat, believed the intelligence on Iraq. The intelligence turned out to be wrong."

Harman Says Cheney Should Correct The Record On Iraq. Rep. Jane Harman said on MSNBC's Hardball (9/25) that Vice President Dick Cheney "refuses even now to correct the record. He was on Meet The Press two weeks ago and he said, We don't know there was this connection between Iraq and al Qaeda before 9/11. There was not. Let me say it definitively, there was not, and he should correct the record."

Matthews Says Cheney Is "Always Wrong." On MSNBC's Hardball (9/25) Chris Matthews commented on Vice President Cheney's claim that the insurgency is in its last throes and that the US would be greeted as liberators in Iraq, saying, "He's been dead wrong, month after month after month. Yet he receives respect of the media. I don't get it." Matthews later added, "Everything he ever said about this war has been wrong, and yet he comes on Sunday television like the prophet himself and everybody stands back and says, oh, he's a wise man. He's very prescient about things. He's always wrong."

Pentagon Extends 3,800 Soldiers' Iraq Tours. CBS Evening News (9/25, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Remember when US military officials said they were hoping some of the 140,000 troops in Iraq could start coming home by the end of this year? Those hopes were dashed last week when the top commander on the ground said that with the current violence there, it's not going to happen. And today nearly 4,000 soldiers who were due to come home the first of next year were told they're staying a few more weeks. And some other troops will be sent back ahead of schedule. All of this is a tremendous strain on both the military and military families. … The Army is scrambling to maintain the number of troops at 140,000 and today a former division commander in Iraq who already is on record as calling for Secretary Rumsfeld's resignation, told members of Congress even that is not enough." Major General John Batiste (ret): "It's a shell game that we play in Iraq and we've been doing it since day one and we're still doing it today. There's simply not enough troops there to accomplish the task."

USA Today (9/26, Welch, 2.27M) reports, "The Pentagon said Thursday that 3,800 U.S. soldiers will be staying in Iraq about six weeks beyond their one-year combat tours as coalition forces grapple with violence in and around Baghdad. … Although the Pentagon did not say why the extension was needed, the top commander in the region, Army Gen. John Abizaid, said last week that more troops would be needed to deal with increased sectarian violence around Baghdad.

McClatchy (9/26, Brown) reports Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "said the changes were in order to maintain 15 combat brigades in Iraq. … 'What these decisions reflect is the flexibility that the United States military has to adjust to a changing environment and a changing situation,' Whitman said. A congressional staffer briefed on the development on Monday said that the Army was moving up the deployment of the 1st Cavalry Division troops by a month so that the 172nd Stryker Brigade's deployment wouldn't be extended again. But an Army spokesman, Lt. Col. Carl Ey, said the two developments weren't necessarily connected."

The Washington Post (9/26, A16, Tyson, 748K) reports the extension "demonstrates the increasingly tough trade-offs U.S. commanders face between the imperatives of war fighting and the need to retrain and recuperate the taxed Army and Marine Corps. In this case, commanders had to choose between extending thousands of U.S. troops serving in one of Iraq's deadliest cities -- the 1st Armored Division brigade in Ramadi -- or requiring another combat-hardened unit that has already served two tours in Iraq, a brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, to return to the desert after less than a year at home. They opted for the former. 'The chief of staff of the Army refuses to compromise on the one-year dwell time,' said an Army official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record. The chief of staff is Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, and 'dwell time' refers to the amount of time troops have at home between deployments to retrain, repair equipment and reconnect with their families."

Army Said To Need An Additional 60,000 Troops. ABC World News (9/25, lead story, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "ABC News has learned that top generals in the Army have come consensus, that to meet its responsibilities the Army has to be larger, more troops are needed, tens of thousands more. It's not a request yesterday or recommendation but senior Army officials have discussed this for weeks and are now in agreement that the army to meet current and future obligations has to have more men and women. Our national security correspondent Jonathan Karl is here." ABC added, "The top Army leadership is saying that the only long term solution is to increase the size of army by about 60,000 troops. That would be a difficult, controversial and costly proposition that could cost $7 billion a year. … Increasing the size of the Army would take time and money. To deal with the strain in the short run, officials are also considering another costly and unpopular idea using more National Guard troops in Iraq. Even without increasing the overall size of the Army these challenges are about to hit taxpayers hard. The Army is pushing for an increase of $20 billion in the next budget."

DOJ_NMG_0069561

US Expected To Maintain Troop Levels In Iraq At More Than 140,000. The Financial Times (9/26, Luce) reports US officials "said on Monday that American troop levels in Iraq were likely to remain well above 140,000 for the next few months. … The overall US troop presence in Iraq has risen from 127,000 in July to 142,000 this week."

Army Described As "Stretched Thin" And "Struggling." CBS Evening News (9/25, lead story, 2:40, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "just keeping the current level is stretching the Army to its limit. Its goal is two years at home for every one year in Iraq. The reality has been 18 months, now that's slipped to just 14 months. … The Army is also running short of money. Over the next several years, it will need $66 billion just to repair or replace equipment torn up in Iraq."

The AP (9/26, Burns) reports the Army "is stretched so thin by the war in Iraq that it is again extending the combat tours of thousands of soldiers beyond the promised 12 months — the second such move since August. Soldiers of the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division had been expecting to return to their home base in Germany in mid-January. Instead, they will stay an extra 46 days in Iraq, until late February, the Pentagon announced Monday. The soldiers are operating in western Anbar province, one of the most violent parts of Iraq. The Pentagon also announced that the 4th Brigade, 1st Cavalry Division will deploy to Iraq 30 days earlier than scheduled, starting in late October. … 'The Army is coming to the end of its rope in Iraq,' said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a private research group. 'It simply does not have enough active-duty military personnel to sustain the current level of effort.'"

The Washington Times (9/26, Scarborough, 88K) reports the Army "already is struggling to meet worldwide commitments and dealing with low-combat readiness among non-deployed units who lack adequate equipment at their home bases. The Army is wearing out weapons systems so fast in Iraq's harsh environment that it needs more than $40 billion in the next three years to buy replacements."

Use Of Individual Ready Reservists Called "Back-Door Draft." CBS Evening News (9/25, story 2, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "As wrenching as the sudden changes are for active duty troops, they can be down right crushing for some soldiers and Marines who have already put their uniforms in mothballs. CBS added, "The last time we saw US Army Captain Todd McGowan in uniform two years ago he and his wife Tracy thought it was the last time he'd ever need it. … Todd is what the Army calls an IRR, Individual Ready Reservist. Unlike Reservists, they're semi-retired soldiers who thought they were done with the military until this reactivation letter came in the mail. … Reactivated for 545 days, Todd's bound for Iraq, 35 pounds heavier, he hasn't fired a gun in two years." According to CBS, McGowan "and others call it a back-door draft." McGowan's wife was shown saying, "For them to call him back seven months shy of resigning his commission is despicable."

Two Top Army Generals In Iraq Reassigned. The AP (9/26, Burns) reports, "Two of the Army's top commanders in Iraq have been selected for new assignments. The second-in-command in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, will become a special assistant to the commander of Central Command with responsibility for developing the military capabilities of nations in the Middle East and Central Asia. Chiarelli is due to be replaced in Iraq by Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno when Odierno becomes commander of Multi-National Corps-Iraq early next year. Chiarelli had previously commanded the 1st Cavalry Division in Iraq. Also moving on from Iraq will be Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, the 4th Infantry Division commander, who has been chosen for promotion to the rank of lieutenant general and assignment as commander of 5th Corps, the Army's top organization in Europe. Thurman currently is commanding all forces in the Baghdad area."

US Soldiers Targeted By Militants From Within Sadr City. The AP (9/26, Castaneda) reports, "U.S. soldiers trying to calm Baghdad say the sprawling Sadr City slum has once again become a haven for anti-American militants — and the source of most of the gunfire and mortars directed at them. In the last two weeks, U.S. forces have suffered several casualties from dozens of shootings, mortar attacks and roadside bombings that American troops believe originated from Sadr City. Yet the Americans have been restrained in their response, as U.S. and Iraqi leaders strive to avoid a third confrontation in two years with firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army — the biggest and most dangerous Shiite militia in Iraq." The AP notes, "Al-Sadr's followers hold 30 of the 275 seats in the national parliament and five posts in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Cabinet and are a major pillar of the prime minister's political support. In August, al-Maliki, a Shiite, publicly berated the Americans for a raid on Sadr City."

Kurds Seize Police Station Slated To Be Handed Over To Sunni Commander. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Murphy, 918K) reports, "Kurdish

DOJ_NMG_0069562

militiamen seized a police station in northern Iraq on Monday to prevent its transfer to a new Sunni Arab commander, igniting a daylong standoff that echoed the parliament's continuing unease over territory-sharing in the final administrative map of Iraq. The clash in the town of Jalawla underscored the potential for violence as parliament prepared to study the contentious issue of creating autonomous regions in this multiethnic and heavily armed nation. Though most of the biggest political disputes are likely to center on the oilfields in the south, in largely Shiite Muslim areas, and the northern city of Kirkuk, another oil-rich area claimed by the Kurds, the clash in Jalawla marked an early warning of what many fear could be a turbulent battle for the frontiers of a future Kurdish zone."

Saddam Once Again Removed From Court. The Washington Post (9/26, A16, Paley, 748K) reports on "another tumultuous day in the genocide trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein, culminating in his expulsion from the courtroom for the second time in as many sessions. The proceedings began with Hussein and his six co-defendants…vigorously protesting the absence of their attorneys. Last week, the entire defense team boycotted the trial to protest the Iraqi government's dismissal of the chief judge for saying that Hussein was 'not a dictator.' The eight new court-appointed defense attorneys appeared to struggle Monday during simple cross-examinations of witnesses." The new chief judge, Mohammed al-Uraibiy "instructed [Hussein] to remain silent and respect the court. 'I'd respect the session if it was a respected court,' Hussein retorted. Then he held up a folded piece of yellow paper that he said was a request not to attend the trial as long as Uraibiy remained the presiding judge. … The judge angrily ordered Hussein to be removed from the courtroom and refused to accept his petition."

Rice's Use Of Civil Rights Movement As Analogy For Iraq War Derided. The Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (9/26, A21) writes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice argues that "critics of the administration's Middle East policies are like the racists who contended that black Americans were not ready to participate in democracy because they were 'kind of childlike' and couldn't handle the vote. But that's a bizarre analogy. … She makes it sound as if those who disagree with the administration are standing in the schoolhouse door. But no one wants to deny Iraqis or anyone else the chance to practice democracy. The question is whether democracy should, or can, be imposed at the point of a gun. If Rice really believes what she says, then why does she shun the democratically elected Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority? Are the Palestinians childlike and not ready for the vote?"

Marines Accused Of Murdering Iraqi Civilian Will Not Face Death Penalty. CBS Evening News (9/25, story 3, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Three US Marines accused of dishonoring the nation top our CBS News briefing tonight. They're accused of kidnapping and killing an Iraqi civilian in April west of Baghdad. And today it was decided they will be charged with murder. But the commanding general in the case said he will not seek the death penalty."

Karzai Accuses Musharraf Of Tolerating Presence Of Terrorists. The Washington Times (9/26, Behn, 88K) reports, "The political divide between Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf became increasingly acerbic yesterday, with the Afghan leader accusing his counterpart of pursuing policies that foster terrorism. The outburst came on the eve of a critical meeting in which the two men will join President Bush in the Oval Office to discuss ways to improve their cooperation in fighting a revitalized Taliban insurgency. In a reference to Pakistan, Mr. Karzai said in an address at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars yesterday that there will be no peace in the region until nations stopped using religious extremism as a means of promoting policy. 'For all of us in the world to be safer, we must remove the need for groups, organizations or state entities -- and here I am beginning to be very careful in my remarks -- of reliance on religious radicalism as instruments of policy,' he said."

Afghan Women's Rights Activist Assassinated. The New York Times (9/26, Gall, 1.21M) reports, "A senior Afghan official specializing in women's rights was gunned down here on her way to work on Monday morning by suspected Taliban gunmen. It was the highest-level assassination of a woman in Afghanistan in the five years since the Taliban were ousted from power. Safia Amajan, 65, had served as chief of the women's affairs department in Kandahar Province for five years, working for women's rights and education and vocational training. A former teacher and high school principal, she was well known and much liked in Kandahar.

DOJ:

Massachusetts Federal Prosecutor Receives DOJ Service Award. The Worcester (MA) Telegram (9/26, Hammel) reports, "David H. Hennessy, acting chief of the U.S. Attorney's Worcester branch , has been given the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, the Justice Department's highest award." The Telegram continues, "Mr. Hennessy, an assistant U.S. attorney since 1995, was among two Massachusetts assistant U.S. attorneys and a former assistant U.S. attorney from Massachusetts to be given awards Sept. 12 at DAR Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. Mr. Hennessy was given the award for his service on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, which investigated and prosecuted individuals considered most responsible for fraud in the energy company." The Telegram adds, "Mr. Hennessy served on the task force, which had about 40 prosecutors and FBI agents, from August 2003 through June 2004. The task force had offices in Washington and Houston, Enron's base. During part of that time he continued with some of his duties in the federal courthouse in Worcester, but for much of it he left Worcester early each Monday not to return from Houston until Thursday or Friday. … Mr. Hennessy served on the team that prosecuted Lea Fastow and the so-called Barge case defendants. Ms. Fastow, a former Enron assistant treasurer and wife of Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, was sentenced to a year in prison on a misdemeanor tax charge. … Referring to the Enron prosecutions, the Justice Department said, 'This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069563

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P Urged To Overhaul Its Board. Corporate governance experts say Hewlett-Packard CO. should overhaul its board in the wake of the recent leak investigation scandal. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Clark, Lublin) reports that "four public pension funds are proposing a way for shareholders to help do that. The four funds -- representing public workers in Connecticut, New York, North Carolina and Washington, D.C. -- said they filed a proposal asking H-P to change its bylaws to allow any shareholder group holding 3% of the company's stock for at least a year to nominate one or more board candidates. Backers of the proposal are the New York State Common Retirement Fund, the Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds, the North Carolina Retirement Systems and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Pension Funds. Their proposal relies partly on a recent appeals court ruling that sided with AFSCME." The Journal adds, "Separately, a House committee studying the H-P imbroglio said it issued subpoenas to two H-P executives and a private investigator it had invited to testify at a hearing Thursday. Several other senior H-P executives -- including Chief Executive Mark Hurd and former Chairman Patricia Dunn -- are expected to appear."

House Panel Subpoenas Two Hewlett-Packard Officials, Contractor. The Washington Post (9/26, D12, Nakashima, Noguchi) reports, "Congressional investigators have subpoenaed two Hewlett-Packard Co. employees and one contractor to testify before a House investigative subcommittee Thursday as part of the panel's probe of an HP spying scandal that has spawned two criminal investigations. … The subpoenas, the first issued by the panel in this case, went out over the weekend to HP senior counsel and ethics director Kevin Hunsaker; former HP global security director Anthony Gentilucci; and Ronald R. DeLia, owner of Security Outsourcing Solutions, a Boston investigative firm HP hired to help identify the sources of media leaks." The Post notes, "Congress is questioning HP executives and its investigators as part of a broader examination into companies that sell or obtain unauthorized access to phone records. Hunsaker and Gentilucci were both involved in HP's leak probe, which the company has said involved obtaining private phone records by impersonating directors and journalists. … Thursday, the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee will question HP chief executive Mark V. Hurd, former chairman Patricia C. Dunn and others." The AP (9/26, Gordon) reports, "The subpoenas are the first issued by the panel in its investigation. They were served over the weekend, according to a congressional aide who asked not to be identified because the investigation is continuing. .. . Until now, the invitations to testify at Thursday's hearing had been voluntary and other witnesses had accepted them."

Gentilucci Resigns After Receiving Subpoena. USA Today (9/26, Kessler) reports that Anthony Gentilucci, a global security manager for H-P, submitted his resignation yesterday after he and two others were subpoenaed by federal officials. Gentilucci "was part of a team assigned to find out who inside HP was leaking confidential information to the press. The team, which included HP staffers and outside detectives, used unsavory tactics to obtain confidential phone records, physically tracked board members and reporters, and tried to plant electronic tracking software on a reporter's computer."

Lawyer Praises Dunn's Decision To Step Aside. Viet Dinh, a Georgetown law professor and principal of Bancroft Associates PLLC, and the attorney for Tom Perkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/26), "Justice Felix Frankfurter once wrote, 'Wisdom too often never comes, and so one ought not to reject it merely because it comes late.' So it is with Hewlett-Packard's decision on Friday to come clean with the available facts about Chairman Patricia Dunn's ill-advised investigation into board members and journalists, as well as to replace her with CEO Mark Hurd and appoint respected prosecutor Bart Schwartz to mop up the mess. Belated but welcome, these actions show that Mr. Hurd's steady hand will guide H-P out of the scandal and back to its rightful place as the icon of Silicon Valley." Dinh adds, "By stepping aside, Ms. Dunn proved her personal commitment to H-P and its shareholders. It is never easy to let go under pressure, and her decision speaks volumes about her courage, her grace and, in Mr. Hurd's words, 'her ability to put the interests of H-P before her personal interests.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069564

Sonsini Hires Former Bush Attorney. Bloomberg (9/26, Rosenblatt) reports, "Lawrence W. Sonsini, a legal adviser to Hewlett-Packard Co., hired President Bush's former election counsel Michael Madigan to help him as he faces a Congressional investigation of the company's probe of boardroom leaks." Bloomberg continues, "Sonsini, 65, chairman of the Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati law firm, hired a team that includes Madigan and former Congressman Bill Paxon, both of the Washington, D.C., office of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld. Madigan was chief litigation counsel for Bush's campaign in the Florida recount during the 2000 election." Bloomberg adds, "Sonsini and officials at Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard are scheduled to appear Thursday before a subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is investigating whether company tactics used to determine the source of news leaks to its board were illegal. … Wilson Sonsini 'is working with Akin Gump, under the leadership of former Congressman Bill Paxon and Mike Madigan to help understand the congressional process,' firm spokeswoman Courtney Dorman said in an e-mail."

Sentencing Of Ex-Homestore CEO Delayed. Inman News (9/26) reports, "Sentencing for Stuart Wolff, the former CEO of Homestore Inc. who was convicted in June on charges ranging from conspiracy to fraudulent insider trading, has been delayed until at least Oct. 10." Inman continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said today, 'At the defense's request, the hearing has been postponed' and could be delayed until Oct. 10 or Oct. 16." Inman adds, "Wolff, 43, reportedly faces a maximum statutory sentence of 175 years in federal prison for the crimes at Homestore, now known as Move Inc. The company operates popular home-search Web site Realtor.com. … Wolff served as CEO and chairman of the board at Homestore from 1997-2002, when he resigned during an internal investigation. A jury found Wolff guilty of conspiracy, filing false statements with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, lying to accountants, fraudulent insider trading, and falsification of corporate books and records. … He had originally been scheduled for sentencing Sept. 11."

Former Hedge Fund Manager Charged With Insider Trading. The Washington Post (9/26, D4, Masters) reports, "A former hedge fund manager has been charged with criminal insider trading for allegedly profiting from confidential information she had received from Arlington investment firm Friedman Billings Ramsey Group Inc. Hilary L. Shane, 39, was indicted earlier this month on five counts of securities fraud, and she was arraigned on Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. She pleaded not guilty." Shane "has already paid $1.45 million to settle a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and been banned from the industry by the NASD. Her lawyer, Robert Gold, declined to comment outside of the courtroom."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (9/26) reports that Shane "pleaded not guilty yesterday to illegally short selling shares of CompuDyne hours before the company announced a private share offering." Bloomberg continues, "An indictment said that Hilary L. Shane, 39, bought shares for herself and her clients, agreeing to keep the offering secret until it was announced. Hours before the announcement in 2001, Ms. Shane sold 122,900 CompuDyne shares short for about $14.59 apiece, according to the indictment, which was dated Sept. 12 and unsealed Thursday." Bloomberg adds, "Weeks later, Ms. Shane used shares she had bought in the private offering for $12 each to return the borrowed shares, making a profit of $315,216 for herself and her clients, prosecutors said. Ms. Shane, of Jupiter, Fla., made her plea before Magistrate Judge Henry Pittman of Federal District Court in Manhattan. She was released without bail, and her next court date is Oct. 10, a Justice Department spokeswoman said. A call to CompuDyne, a security system company based in Annapolis, Md., was not returned. … In May 2005, Ms. Shane paid more than $1 million in fines and restitution to settle a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit arising from the same transactions, without admitting or denying the accusations, the S.E.C. said."

Scrushy Lawyers Say Jurors Discussed Case In E-Mails. In a motion seeking a new trial for HealthSouth Corp. founder and former chief executive Richard Scrushy say some of the jurors in his corruption trial discussed the case in e-mails before convicting him. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, McKay, Bauerlein) reports, "The motion, filed yesterday in U.S. District Court in Montgomery, Ala., by lawyers for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Donald Siegelman, included copies of four emails that the attorneys said were sent to them anonymously, as well as an affidavit from an unidentified juror alleging that some jurors had introduced information about the case to other jurors that they had gotten off the Internet." US District Judge Mark Fuller "admonished jurors repeatedly throughout the trial not to discuss the case among themselves outside of formal deliberations. On May 29, a month before Mr. Scrushy's conviction, one juror, using a Google g-mail account, wrote to another that 'some of the kounts r confusing 2 our friends' and that two other jurors were 'still off trac.' On June 25, an email from the same Google g-mail account said that 'penalty 2 severe ... still unclear on couple of counts against pastor &

DOJ_NMG_0069565

gov.' The term 'pastor' appears to refer to Mr. Scrushy, who has a religious cable TV show."

Ebbers To Report To Federal Prison Today. WorldCom founder and former CEO Bernie Ebbers will report to federal prison today to being serving a 25-year sentence for accounting fraud. USA Today (9/26, O'Donnell) reports, "It could be a life sentence for Ebbers, who is 65. It's the harshest sentence in the recent wave of white-collar convictions and is being contested by Ebbers' defense lawyer, Reid Weingarten. But Ebbers was ordered to report to prison anyway." USA adds, "Bureau of Prisons officials on Monday would not say where Ebbers will be sent. But because of the sentence length, Ebbers won't be going to a prison camp. Minimum-security prison camps have a more campuslike atmosphere, and inmates are allowed to move somewhat freely on the grounds."

Fastow To Help Prosecutors Pursue Bankers In Enron Case. The Washington Post (9/26, D1, Johnson) reports that Former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow "has agreed to assist lawyers representing shareholders who lost billions of dollars when the energy trader filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in December 2001, according to documents reviewed by The Washington Post." Fastow "is pointing to several investment banks that have rebuffed efforts to settle a class-action shareholder lawsuit. The banks, all of which have denied wrongdoing in court filings, include Merrill Lynch & Co., the Credit Suisse Group, and the Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC." Fastow "has consented to sit for an extensive deposition with plaintiff lawyers to tell them what he knows and to point them to documents that flesh out the bankers' role in helping Enron in exchange for hundreds of millions of dollars in fees, the documents indicate."

FBI Cracking Down On Options Fraud. Bloomberg (9/26, Schmidt) reports, "The FBI is conducting probes of 52 companies that may have illegally backdated stock options and more cases are on the way, its new criminal investigative chief said." Bloomberg continues, "The number of criminal cases has increased 16 percent in less than two months, said Chip Burrus, an assistant director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. 'We're going to knock that pretty good,' he said in an interview. 'We're going to go after those.'" Bloomberg adds, "Burrus signaled the Justice Department will oppose efforts to water down the corporate-governance overhaul adopted in the wake of the scandals involving Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and others. In the interview, he praised the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley accounting law, which has been under attack from business groups and Wall Street, and said the FBI is paying close attention to fraud in the $1.2 trillion hedge-fund industry. … The FBI is investigating 486 corporate fraud cases this fiscal year, up from 423 in 2005, according to the agency. It has also opened 1,160 securities fraud probes, compared with 1,139 last year. Twenty of the bureau's corporate-fraud cases allegedly involve more than $1 billion. … The bureau works closely with the Securities and Exchange Commission, U.S. attorneys' offices, the Justice Department's fraud section and other agencies. … Burrus's comments echo those of Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who said in a June 29 interview that corporate fraud remains a priority for the Justice Department."

Fleming Cos. Ordered To Pay $3 Million In Claims, Interest And Attorney Fees. The Washington Post (9/26, D1, Skrzycki) reports in its "The Regulators" column that the estate of Fleming Cos. Has "balked at claims, totaling some $1.6 million, of H.J. Heinz Co., J.R. Simplot Co. and Cavendish Farms on the grounds that their product -- frozen french fries -- shouldn't be covered by an arcane U.S. Department of Agriculture regulation that falls under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act. The law lets agribusiness suppliers collect first in such cases as long as they provided fresh vegetables. That can mean the difference between getting paid in full or standing with the unsecured creditors and getting pennies on the dollar. The fries folks had lost claims in earlier bankruptcy cases, so they succeeded in getting 'batter and coating' added to the list of processes allowed in the rule governing what constitutes 'fresh' vegetables. A Sept. 14 ruling by a federal judge in Delaware, following earlier court precedents in Texas, handed victory to the frozen spuds industry. It ordered Fleming to pay the three companies some $3 million in claims, interest and attorney fees."

Judge Delays Sale Of Segal Estate. The Chicago Tribune (9/26, Flynn) reports, "A federal judge on Monday gave prosecutors more time to accept offers for the Highland Park estate of convicted insurance executive Michael Segal after an attorney for a developer who won an auction to buy the property expressed concerns about a potential federal historic review process. … US District Judge Ruben Castillo gave prosecutors, who are seeking to recoup part of the $30 million Segal was ordered to forfeit after his 2004 conviction on racketeering, fraud, embezzlement and other charges, until Oct. 3 to consider other offers. Castillo has not ruled on whether proceedings for historic properties would apply to the Segal property."

SEC Database To Undergo $54 Million Upgrade. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Burns, Scannell) reports, "Securities regulators are planning a $54 million upgrade of the computer database on corporate financial reports that officials say will revolutionize the public-disclosure system.

DOJ_NMG_0069566

The Securities and Exchange Commission's Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis and Retrieval system, known as Edgar, will be transformed and likely will be renamed, said SEC chief Christopher Cox. … For more than a year, Mr. Cox has been pushing interactive data as a way to change how companies communicate information to investors. Mr. Cox hopes to see some changes in six months, with the entire financial-reporting system overhauled within 18 months."

Firms Ousting CEOs At Record Pace. Bloomberg (9/26, Kelly) reports, "Chief executive officers are falling faster than ever this year. In just the first 12 days of September, leaders at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Ford Motor Co. and Viacom Inc. were deposed -- fueling the breakneck pace in which one CEO departs every six hours." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. companies are on track to fire or lose a record 1,400 chiefs in 2006, up from 1,322 last year and 663 in 2004, says executive recruiting firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas Inc. in Chicago. From Sun Microsystems Inc. and Pfizer Inc. to Kraft Foods Inc. and RadioShack Corp., most types of firms have felt the rash of CEO departures." Bloomberg adds, "Chiefs are being pushed out the door as directors abandon their laissez faire approach to governance following the prosecutions at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other companies. About 96 percent of companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index now have independent lead or presiding directors, up from 36 percent in 2003, says a survey by Spencer Stuart Inc., an executive search firm in Chicago. … 'Boards are under a lot more pressure, and they're being hypervigilant,' says Donald Hambrick, a management professor at Pennsylvania State University's Smeal College of Business in University Park. 'They are cleansing.' … For a price. The average severance package for a departing CEO totaled about $16 million in the past three years, according to the Corporate Library, a governance watchdog group in Portland, Maine."

WPost Says Amaranth Shows Danger And Safety Of Hedge Funds. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/26, A20) says the "spectacular trouble at Amaranth Advisors LLC, a medium-size hedge fund that specialized in energy trading, did not roil the financial markets or destabilize the banking system. … Amaranth's story illustrates both the danger and the safety of hedge funds. … Because they can invest in anything and can bet on declines in prices as well as increases, hedge funds scour the world for illogically priced assets, and their buying or selling moves prices to a rational level. Hedge funds that believe markets are overvalued can slow the inflation of a dangerous bubble. Hedge funds that believe markets are undervalued can push prices up, reducing the cost of capital to firms. Mutual funds, which don't bet against the market and which mainly aim for average performance, contribute far less to this process of price discovery, which allocates the world's savings to the countries, companies and individuals who are likely to use it best."

CRIMINAL LAW:

"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Pleads Guilty To Record-Keeping Violations. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Hoffman) reports, "Joe Francis, the founder and chief executive of the 'Girls Gone Wild' empire, pleaded guilty Monday to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws by failing to document the ages of young women in his racy videos." The Times continues, "The pleas in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles were the result of an agreement announced this month between Francis and the Justice Department after an investigation into whether his Santa Monica companies filmed minors." The Times adds, "Francis agreed to personally pay a $500,000 fine to settle charges that he failed to keep records of the ages and identities of the women who appeared in his soft-core sex videos. Francis earlier this month acknowledged that footage of minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct appeared in at least two DVDs he released. … Francis' Mantra Films Inc. pleaded guilty this month in Panama City, Fla., to 10 felony counts stemming from the same violations and agreed to pay $1.6 million in fines. … MRA Holdings Inc., another company owned by Francis, entered into a so-called deferred prosecution agreement under which the government would dismiss all charges if MRA abided by the accord for three years and hired an outside monitoring company."

The AP (9/26) reports, "Outside court, Francis told reporters he thought the chances are 'pretty slim' that the judge would reject the deal. … 'We are thrilled to have this stuff behind us,' Francis said." The AP adds, "Francis' attorney, Aaron Dyer, said underage girls who had appeared in the videos had lied about their age to the company. … Francis' Santa Monica-based company, Mantra Films Inc., pleaded guilty earlier this month in U.S. District Court in Florida on similar charges. According to court papers, Mantra Films admitted to violating record keeping and labeling laws while producing and distributing the videos during all of 2002 and part of 2003. … Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines. It must also hire an outside company to monitor its records and production facilities to ensure compliance with federal law."

Judge Backs FBI Search Of Coca-Cola Executive's Home. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/26, Weber) reports, "A federal magistrate judge has recommended that a former Coca-Cola employee's request to throw out evidence seized from her in a trade secrets theft case be denied. U.S. Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn Brill said in a report dated Thursday but not entered until Monday that investigators had sufficient probable cause to search Joya Williams' home, and therefore, evidence seized should not be suppressed. The recommendation to deny Williams' motion goes to a federal district judge for a final decision." The AP notes, "Williams' lawyer, Janice Singer, had filed a motion asking a judge to suppress evidence seized from her client's…home, alleging that FBI agents provided insufficient probable cause in obtaining a warrant to search the home." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/26, 399K) also reports on the ruling in "Daily Briefing."

DOJ_NMG_0069567

World Gaming Officials Resign Amid Widening Online Gambling Probe. The Financial Times (9/26, Blitz) reports, "A retired lawyer in the US who served under former US President George H.W. Bush resigned yesterday as chairman and director of an online gambling company, highlighting fears among executives in the sector that they face arrest by travelling to the US or other countries taking a tough line against gambling." The Times continues, "World Gaming, an Aim-listed company whose operations are almost entirely US-facing, announced the resignation of James Grossman, along with that of Clare Roberts, a fellow non-executive director, after a board meeting of the company, which has offices in Antigua, London and Vancouver." The Times adds, "Mr Grossman, 66, a former practising attorney, was a special representative for the United Nations Development Programme and was appointed by former President Bush in 1992 to the US Foreign Claims Settlement Commission. … The resignations come at a critical time for the gaming industry, hit in the past two months by the arrest in the US and France of four senior executives and non-executives on various anti-gambling charges. … Senators are engaged in a struggle over a bill to tighten US laws against gambling."

US Fails To Win Convictions In Pellicano-Related Perjury Trial. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "In a setback for government prosecutors, a federal jury in Los Angeles on Monday acquitted a former SBC employee on four felony counts of lying about her contacts with a central figure in the wiretapping case against onetime Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano." The jury "also told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that it was deadlocked on a fifth perjury count against Joann Wiggan of Burbank, who was fired in March after 34 years with…AT&T." Wiggan's lawyer, David R. Reed, "celebrated outside the courtroom as a speechless federal prosecutor and several FBI agents looked on. He compared Wiggan's acquittal after seven hours of deliberation 'to David beating Goliath.'" The Times notes that the US attorney's office "sought to distance Monday's courtroom loss from the larger Pellicano case," but "with the same judge, prosecutors and agents involved in the pending Pellicano racketeering case, several legal observers saw the verdict Monday as a clear setback for the government."

Gotti's Mother Lashes Out At Prosecutor As Jurors Continue Deliberations. Newsday (9/26, DeStefano) reports, "The fur flew at the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti when his mother had sharp words for a woman prosecutor as the jury continued its deliberations. As assistant U.S. attorney Miriam Rocah was exiting the well of the courtroom yesterday, Victoria Gotti…stunned the quiet courtroom with a remark to the prosecutor. 'Who the hell do you think you are talking to?' said Victoria Gotti. … Outside the courtroom, the elder Victoria Gotti explained that Rocah gave her a disrespectful remark in court that shocked her." Newsday adds, "After lunch yesterday, the jury sent out a note asking for clarification on two legal points. In one question the jury wanted to know the standard by which the government had to prove Gotti was part of the charged racketeering conspiracy. The jury also questioned whether Gotti had to prove that he left the Gambino crime family by July 21, 1999 or just the specific conspiracy charged in the indictment."

Three Arrested In Massachusetts Mob Gambling Investigation. The Boston Herald (9/20, Sweet, 203K) reported, "Reputed mob boss Arthur Gianelli's bride and two alleged members of his crew were arrested…in connection with a 520-count federal indictment charging their alleged criminal enterprise with illegal gambling, extortion and arson. Mary Ann Gianelli, 49, an MIT nurse and the sister-in-law of convicted ex-FBI Agent John Connolly Jr., turned herself in to state and federal authorities after reputed loan shark Philip Puopolo was busted at the Revere Businessmen's Association by the state police Organized Crime Unit." The Herald noted Puopolo allegedly "operated a sports betting office for Arthur Gianelli, 49, of Lynnfield and threatened witnesses to lie to a grand jury. Gianelli's gang reportedly pays 'rent' to the New England Mafia in order to stay in business."

The AP (9/20) reported, "Gianelli and three other men allegedly plotted to burn down a sports bar in an attempt to intimidate the owner into selling them another bar, federal prosecutors said. … A total of 13 people are charged in the gambling case. The new indictment dropped three defendants who have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing."

DOJ_NMG_0069568

Washington State Inmate Charged With Threatening Judges. The AP (9/26) reports, "A man about to be released from state prison after serving several years for harassing a judge has been charged with sending a threatening letter to federal judges in Tacoma." Charles Gary Felts "was charged with mailing threatening communications to U.S. Magistrate Judge J. Kelley Arnold and U.S. District Judge Ronald B. Leighton, in which he said 'the people need to delcare marshal (sic) law ... and shoot any and all of you filth on sight or stench.' The letter was sent in June as part of a civil rights claim Felts is pursuing in federal court in Tacoma, aspects of which have come before the judges." The AP notes, "In charging papers made public Monday, FBI Special Agent Ryan Bruett said Felts admitted sending the letter," but he "signed a statement saying he did not mean to threaten anyone, Bruett said. The letter was a 'metaphor' designed to 'wake them up and make them think,' Felts wrote."

Miller Seeks Criminal Probe Of Reading Program. Bloomberg (9/26, Basken) reports, "A Democratic congressman called for a criminal investigation after an audit found that a $1 billion federal program to improve reading among grade-school children was run by staff who steered contracts to favored publishers." Bloomberg continues, "The Education Department's inspector-general last week recommended an overhaul of the 'Reading First' program, part of the 'No Child Left Behind' law, including removing directors and reviewing the propriety of their contract awards. … 'The inspector-general's report raises serious questions about whether Education Department officials violated criminal law, and those questions must be pursued by the Justice Department,' said Representative George Miller of California, the top-ranking Democrat on the House Education Committee." Bloomberg adds, "Miller, in his statement, called the audit part of pattern in which the Education Department under President George W. Bush 'has repeatedly run afoul of ethical standards.' … Miller's office also cited an independent analysis published last year by the Washington-based American Institutes for Research that found the program favored by Reading First directors, a product of the McGraw-Hill Companies Inc., was one of only two programs to receive AIR's highest rating."

US Indicts Former GUEA Directors With Fraud, Tax Violations. The AP (9/26) reports, "A federal grand jury (in Gary, IN) indicted two former directors of the Gary Urban Enterprise Association and issued new tax charges against the group's previously indicted former executive director and former fiscal manager, federal prosecutors said Monday." The AP continues, "Former directors Johnnie Wright, 76, and Derrick Earls, 51, both of Gary, have been charged with 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of conspiracy and one count of federal program theft, the Justice Department said in a news release. … Former Director Jojuana Meeks and the group's former fiscal manager, Charmaine Pratchett, were indicted on identical charges in June, accused of embezzling more than $800,000 to pay for cars, trips and funeral expenses." The AP adds, "Wright and Earls were expected to surrender Tuesday, when they are due to have their initial hearings on the charges, said Mary Hatton, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Joseph Van Bokkelen. … The two served as directors from 1999 to 2004 for the group, which was created to attract new investment to the Gary area. … A superseding indictment in the case also charged Meeks with four counts of tax evasion for not filing tax returns for the years 2000 to 2004. It charged Pratchett with four counts of filing false tax returns for the same years."

Jurors In Katrina Bus Case Will Not Hear About Deadly Blaze. The Houston Chronicle (9/26, Pinkerton) reports, "Jurors today (in McAllen, TX) will hear about maintenance and safety practices of charter bus company Global Limo Inc. but not about the bus fire that killed 23 nursing home residents evacuated from Houston last year as Hurricane Rita bore down." The Chronicle continues, "U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa granted a defense motion to limit testimony to alleged mismanagement that occurred during a four-month period before last year's accident. … James H. Maples, president and director of Pharr-based Global, faces charges he falsified driver time records and failed to adequately inspect and maintain his fleet of buses. The company was shut down for safety violations two weeks after the September 2005 accident." The Chronicle adds, "Lawyers for Maples, a 67-year-old retired NFL player, have said that he looks forward to clearing his name. … An eight-woman, four-man jury was selected late Monday after two hours of questioning." The Chronicle notes, "During jury selection, Justice Department prosecutors informed the court they plan to call Juan Robles Gutierrez, an undocumented immigrant from Monterrey who was driving the bus when the fire erupted near Dallas. His family has said Robles did all he could to stop the fire, but oxygen bottles needed by many elderly nursing home residents exploded as the fire spread from a rear wheel well. … Based on the judge's statements Monday, it appears testimony from Robles will be limited to his experiences with the company before the accident. … Robles was arrested on an immigration charge — unlawful entry to the U.S. — shortly after the accident, but he has been allowed to remain in Texas to testify."

Sister Of Connecticut Drug Lord Charged With Lying About 1996 Murder. The Connecticut Post (9/26, Mayko) reports, "The sister of admitted drug lord

DOJ_NMG_0069569

Frankie Estrada is under arrest and indictment for lying to the federal grand jury investigating the 1996 murder of a local prostitute." The Post continues, "Frances Estrada, 44, was arrested recently in Greenville, N.C., where she now lives. Federal marshals on Monday brought her into U.S. Magistrate Judge William I. Garfinkel's courtroom, where she pleaded not guilty to four perjury charges — each carrying a maximum five-year prison term. … At the request of Assistant U.S. Attorney Karen Peck, Garfinkel ordered Estrada detained without bond pending a hearing Wednesday." The Post adds, "The indictment lleges that Estrada committed perjury while appearing before a federal grand jury in New Haven on May 10, 2005. At the time, the grand jury was investigating the Jan. 30, 1996, murder of Aida Escalara. .. . The indictment accuses Frances Estrada of lying to the grand jury when she denied knowing Escalara or seeing her on the night of the murder. … It further alleges she lied while denying knowing Eddie Mercado and Billie 'The Kid' Gomez, Escalara's convicted murderers. … Finally, the indictment accuses Frances Estrada of lying by telling the grand jury that her daughter, Star, was not living with her at the time of the murder."

Unfamiliarity With Legal Principles Common In New York's Justice Courts. The New York Times (9/26, Glaberson) reports, "An unfamiliarity with basic legal principles is remarkably common in what are known as the justice courts, legacies of the Colonial era that survive in more than 1,000 New York towns and villages. For generations, justices have hailed them as 'poor man's courts,' where ordinary people can get simple justice with little formality or expense. But there are few more vivid spots to view their shortcomings than here in one of New York's poorest corners: Franklin County, a place of rugged beauty on the Canadian border where only one of the 32 local justices is a lawyer. The county's justices have repeatedly drawn the attention of state judicial conduct officials, with 15 publicly disciplined since the late 1970's, some twice."

Virginia Police Chief Seeks To Protect Kids From Internet Predators. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/26, A1, Markon) reports on Chief Calvin Johnson of the Dumfries, Virginia police. Around town, Johnson, "is known by his first name. His 14 officers handle the usual traffic crashes, fights and domestic violence calls, but anything more serious -- homicides, robberies -- is sent to Prince William police. County police also investigate all sex crimes. Chapman vowed to change that. … So, with support from the chief, he attended a one-week training course run by the Northern Virginia/Washington, D.C. Internet Crimes Against Children task force, which helps local police fight Internet predators. When he returned in July, he told the chief he'd work part time and come in on his days off. All he needed was a laptop. Chapman was issued a blue Toshiba laptop, and he set up shop on his desk in the corner of the squad room, known as 'the bullpen.' In July, he went online, posing first as a 14-year-old girl. He was inundated with propositions from older men."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Appeals Order To Release NRO Budget Documents. The Federal Times (9/26, Friedman) reports, "The Justice Department is appealing a federal court order requiring the National Reconnaissance Office to release unclassified budget documents." The Times continues, "The Federation of American Scientists filed a Freedom of Information Act request last year for parts of the fiscal 2006 budget justification sent to Congress by NRO, which builds and operates intelligence satellites. NRO rejected the request, claiming that the relevant documents are "operational files," which document scientific and technical means for collecting information. Intelligence agencies can exempt operational files from FOIA. .. . But a federal judge ruled in July that the exemption did not apply to the NRO budget documents. According to Steven Aftergood, director of the FAS Project on Government Secrecy, NRO initially said it would comply with the decision." The Times adds, "On Sept. 20, however, the Justice Department filed a notice of appeal in U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. … Justice spokesman Charles Miller confirmed the notice of appeal was filed, but declined to comment on its substance or on FOIA policy."

Judge Rules Suit Over "Light" Cigarettes Can Proceed. ABC World News (9/25, story 9, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "A Federal Judge today dealt a huge blow to big tobacco in a lawsuit over light cigarettes. The judge is allowing the case to go ahead as a class action lawsuit brought by smokers who claim tobacco companies duped them into thinking they were safer."

The Financial Times (9/26, Foster) reports, "A US federal judge on Monday dealt a blow to the tobacco industry when he ruled a case involving the big cigarette makers and tens of millions of smokers of 'light' cigarettes could proceed to trial as a national class action. The Schwab claim – filed in 2004 under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organisations Act (Rico) – alleges cigarette companies defrauded smokers into believing "light" cigarettes were safer than regular ones. The class includes anyone in the US who bought cigarettes that were labelled 'light' or 'lights' between 1971 and 2006. Lawyers are seeking as much as $200bn (£105bn) in damages, which would automatically be tripled under Rico."

DOJ_NMG_0069570

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, O'Connell) reports, "U.S. District Judge Jack B. Weinstein in Brooklyn, N.Y., made the pretrial ruling yesterday in a 2004 lawsuit alleging that Philip Morris USA, Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco unit, among others, falsely marketed 'light' and 'low-tar' cigarettes as a lower-risk alternative to conventional higher-tar smokes."

USA Today (9/26, Smith) reports, "At issue, Weinstein said, 'is not whether a fraud case can be proven, but whether damages can be' calculated for smokers who allegedly were unaware of a fact the tobacco companies have known since the late 1960s: Consumers of low-tar cigarettes smoke more intensively to compensate for their nicotine addictions, putting them at elevated health risks. Plaintiffs' attorney Michael Hausfeld, who built the smokers' legal claims around a federal racketeering statute, said he will prove damages of $26 billion to $200 billion through statistical models that estimate how much Americans allegedly were overcharged for 'light' cigarettes and how much faster they would have quit smoking had not 'light' cigarettes been marketed so effectively since the early 1970s."

The New York Times (9/26, Johnston, Warner) calls the decision a "legal blow to the tobacco industry." The Times adds, "The decision, coming at a time when the tobacco industry felt it was on a legal winning streak, raises the possibility that so-called lights cases will become a major threat to the companies and expose them to potentially significant damages."

The Washington Post/AP (9/26, D2, Hays) reports, "Shares of tobacco firms fell on Wall Street as the ruling, granting class-action status to the case, clouded what had appeared to be an improving legal environment for the industry. Altria Group Inc., the parent of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris USA Inc., said the ruling will delay its long-awaited restructuring plan, which includes a divestiture of its controlling stake in Kraft Foods Inc."

The New York Law Journal (9/26, Perrotta) reports, "In his ruling Monday, the judge stressed that while the suit was far from perfect, the evidence warranted that it proceed. … 'While evidence of fraud on the class appears to be quite strong -- and defendants have been less than candid in insisting that there was no fraud -- evidence of the percentage of the class which was defrauded and the amount of economic damages it suffered appears to be quite weak -- and plaintiffs have been less than candid in failing to acknowledge that deficiency in their proof,' the judge wrote." The Journal adds, "He said the jury system -- which he described as the 'ultimate focus group of the law' -- was well equipped to sort out the particulars in accordance with Amendment VII of the U.S. Constitution. … 'The jury's power and capacity to deal with complex facts and come to a reasonable resolution of a dispute should not be underestimated,' Weinstein said."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, 4:50 p.m.) reported, "It's been called a big blow to tobacco. A federal judge in New York is allowing millions of light cigarette smokers to join in a class action lawsuit. The suit claims nine tobacco companies duped smokers into believing light cigarettes were safer than regular cigarettes. An attorney says the judge's ruling makes this the largest class action lawsuit in U.S. History. The defendants RJ Reynolds tobacco and Phillip Morris plan to appeal."

The decision by a New York federal judge to allow millions of light cigarette smokers to sue cigarette makers received moderate coverage by local newscasts. Overall, the ruling was seen as a big blow to tobacco industry, which said it is going to appeal the judge's decision. Some examples: NC8-TV Washington, DC, (9/25, 10:47 a.m.) reported, "Smokers of light cigarettes, won't be taken lightly in federal court. Today a Brooklyn judge granted class action status to tens of millions of smokers, in a potential 200-billion- dollar suit against tobacco heavyweights Philip Morris and RJ Reynolds, among others. The lawsuit says the defending companies have been duping smokers since the early 70s into believing 'light' brands were safer. The tobacco industry argued unsuccessfully that it's impossible to know individual smokers' motives."

KDFW-TV Dallas, (9/25, 10:19 a.m.) reported, "A federal judge has ruled tobacco companies can be sued by a large group of smokers who satisfied their habit with light cigarettes. The group could personally include tens of millions of the class action lawsuit worth up to 200 billion dollars. Tobacco companies are allegedly duping smokers into believing the brand labeled light was safer."

WWBT-TV Richmond, (9/25, 4:17 p.m.) reported, "The decision was based on a 2004 law lawsuit alleging that Phillip Morris and others fooled consumers and responded to the mounting health concerns with a campaign of lies designed to save money. Phillip Morris says they will appeal. Until that is decided anyone that purchased cigarettes labeled 'Light' after they were put on the market in the early 70s can be part of the lawsuit if it goes forward."

WGN-TV Chicago, (9/25, 8:44 a.m.) reported, "That decision has the potential of costing tobacco companies $200 billion. The suit alleges that cigarette companies mislead smokers into thinking that light cigarettes are safer than regular cigarettes."

KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/25, 5:26 p.m.) reported, "The suit says smokers were duped by light cigarettes as a low risk alternative even though documents showed they knew the risks were the same. Companies say they plan to appeal."

WGHP-TV Greensboro, (9/25, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Lawyers for the tobacco companies say it's impossible to determine smokers motives for buying light cigarettes, unless each person was interviewed separately."

DOJ_NMG_0069571

Insurance Adjuster Seeks To Silence Whistleblowing Sisters. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (9/26, Lee) reports, "An insurance adjusting firm wants two whistleblowers to stop talking about claims they handled for State Farm insurance, pay damages for economic harm and return records they turned over to federal and state investigators." The Herald continues, "The company, Alabama-based E.A. Renfroe, said sisters Cori and Kerri Rigsby also gave copies of the records to attorney Richard 'Dickie' Scruggs, whose Scruggs Katrina Group intends to profit from lawsuits filed against State Farm." The Herald adds, "Renfroe is suing the Rigsbys, insurance adjusters who claim State Farm manipulated engineering firms to minimize or deny policyholder claims. Renfroe said the Rigsbys breached their employment contract and violated the Alabama Trade Secrets Act by turning over confidential records to federal and state investigators and to Scruggs, for whom they are now working. … Renfroe wants a federal judge in Alabama to stop the Rigsbys' disclosures, award Renfroe damages for breach of contract, allow Renfroe to recover any profits the Rigsbys or Scruggs receive from the records, and award extra damages against the Rigsbys." The Herald notes, "The Rigsbys worked from the late 1990s until the spring of 2006 for Renfroe, which State Farm hired to help adjust its claims. Renfroe assigned the Rigsbys, who are from Ocean Springs, to work for State Farm. … The sisters said they left their adjusting jobs because of the wrongdoing they discovered and documented from State Farm claims files. They have accused State Farm of manipulating engineering firms to supply reports attributing hurricane damage to water, covered by national flood insurance, rather than wind, covered under State Farm policies."

AOL Sued Over Release Of Search Data. The AP (9/26, Jesdanun) reports, "Three AOL subscribers who suddenly found records of their Internet searches widely distributed online are suing the company under privacy laws and are seeking an end to its retention of search-related data." The AP continues, "The lawsuit is believed to be the first in the wake of AOL's intentional release of some 19 million search requests made over a three-month period by more than 650,000 subscribers, including the three plaintiffs - two unnamed Californians and Kasadore Ramkissoon of Richmond County, New York." The AP adds, "Filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Oakland, California, the lawsuit seeks class-action status. It does not specify the amount of damages being sought. … AOL already has apologized for the release, which it blamed on a researcher who had failed to gain proper clearances. The researcher and another AOL employee have been fired, and the company's chief technology officer has resigned. AOL also pledged to name its first chief privacy officer."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Investigating Possible Arizona Hate Crime. The Arizona Republic (9/26, Arnold) reports, "FBI agents have joined a Gilbert police investigation into a possible hate crime in which a Black Barbie doll was found hanging by its neck in the car of an African-American woman. The 24-year-old woman found the doll July 8 after leaving the vehicle unlocked overnight at her apartment complex in the 1300 block of West Juniper Avenue, according to police. The act potentially specifically targeted the victim, which could warrant federal charges should investigators determine it was motivated by the victim's race, said Special Agent Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman. Federal agents learned of the investigation through news media and have been assisting police for several weeks to determine whether federal charges are warranted, McCarley said."

Veteran ACLU Supporters Seek Ouster Of Group's Leadership. The New York Times (9/26, Strom, 1.21M) reports, "More than 30 longtime supporters of the American Civil Liberties Union are calling for the ouster of the organization's leadership, saying it has failed to adhere to the principles it demands of others and thus jeopardized the organization's effectiveness." The statement "does not name individual officials that the group wants to see removed, but in the past, criticism has been focused" on Executive Director Anthony Romero, Board of Directors President Nadine Strossen, and members of the executive committee.

Republicans, Democrats At Odds Over Voter ID Laws. The New York Times (9/26, Purnick, 1.21M) reports on the "spreading partisan brawl over new and proposed voting requirements around the country. Republicans say the laws are needed to combat fraud, especially among illegal immigrants. Democrats say there is minimal fraud, if any, and accuse Republicans of suppressing the votes of those least likely to have the required documentation — minorities, the poor and the elderly — who tend to vote for Democrats." Democrats say that in "tight races…the loss of votes could matter in November." In Maricopa County, Arizona's "largest in population, election officials said that 35 percent of new registrations were rejected for insufficient proof of citizenship last year and that 17 percent had been rejected so far this year. It is not known how many of the rejected registrants were not citizens or were unable to prove their citizenship because they had lost or could not locate birth certificates and other documents."

Spellings Letter Encourages Public School Teachers To Celebrate Christmas. The Washington

DOJ_NMG_0069572

Times (9/26, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Say you teach in a public school and you want to celebrate Christmas in your classroom with like-minded students, what's a teacher to do? Go right ahead, says Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. We've come across a letter sent to the secretary by a teacher named Karen in Salt Lake City. She writes: 'I'm so frustrated with the U.S. trying to get "Christmas" out of our vocabulary. In a Fox News poll, 96 percent of Americans, people of all faiths, celebrate Christmas. So, my question is: What are we allowed to teach and say in school?'" Spellings replied: Christmas is one of the great joys of the year for many Americans of all ages. In fact, Congress recognized Dec. 25 as a public holiday in 1870. Schools and teachers traditionally have celebrated the secular aspects of Christmas and are free to do so today."

Tierney Criticizes "Pre-Ordained Conclusion" Of NAS Report On Discrimination In Sciences. In his New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) column, John Tierney writes, "I've slogged through enough reports from the National Academy of Sciences to know they're often not shining examples of the scientific method. But -- call me naïve -- I never thought the academy was cynical enough to publish a political tract like 'Beyond Bias and Barriers,' the new report on discrimination against female scientists and engineers." Tierney says the report had a "pre-ordained conclusion: academia must stop favoring male scientists and engineers." The report "says that women are discouraged from going into science because of social pressure and 'unintentional' and 'unconscious' biases -- which may well exist." But the committee that wrote the report "is so determined to blame everything on discrimination that it dismisses other factors without giving them a fair hearing."

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Groups Urge Limits On Proposed AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/26, Geewax) reports, "Consumer advocates and civil libertarians demanded Monday that regulators refrain from approving AT&T's purchase of BellSouth unless the phone companies accept tough restrictions on their $67 billion deal." The AJC continues, "Last week, Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin recommended that the merger be approved, perhaps as soon as the FCC's regular meeting Oct. 12, according to published reports based on unidentified agency sources. Such approval would be unusual, because the Justice Department has not completed its review of the proposed merger's impact on consumers and competition. … While the two phone companies want the FCC to move quickly, consumer groups say regulators should not rush to sign off on a combination that could affect consumers for decades. … 'This merger will haunt the consumer,' Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumers Federation of America, said in a conference call with reporters. When the combined companies strengthen their grip on the marketplace, he said, 'they will use it against the public.'" The AJC notes, "The merger would allow Texas-based AT&T to extend its reach across the South to control nearly half the nation's phone lines, spreading over 22 states. It also would gain full control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest wireless service provider. .. . Consumer groups belonging to the Competition Coalition called on regulators to impose restrictions on the new telecom giant."

Legislative Obstacles Remain For Texas Airfield Bill. The Dallas Morning News (9/26, Reddy) reports, "With four days to go before a congressional recess, Texas lawmakers were still hammering out strategies late Monday to get their Wright amendment legislation past detractors in each chamber." The News continues, "A packed congressional schedule is complicating plans for a quick resolution, despite a breakthrough last week, when Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison won the support of a key senator who had objected to parts of the bill. … The House and the Senate could still pass bills this week that would lift federal flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field, though lawmakers said they were unsure exactly how the procedures would play out." The News adds, "Congress is expected to return for a lame-duck session after the November elections, but passing legislation then would face even more hurdles. … The Wright legislation would clear quickly this week – under a procedure that wouldn't even require a formal recorded vote – if its supporters could overcome the objections of Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee. … Ms. Hutchison, R-Texas, won over the chairman of the committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., by agreeing to remove a phrase exempting the deal from antitrust laws and replacing it with other protective language. … But Mr. Leahy has not signed off. The rules of the Senate allow a single member to stand in the way of legislation, forcing the sponsor to line up votes to maneuver around the opposition."

Brokers Lining Up As Partners To Traditional Players. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Lucchetti, Macdonald) reports, "With NYSE Group Inc. working to finalize its deal with Euronext NV and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. considering whether to buy the 75% of London Stock Exchange PLC it doesn't already own, exchanges look ready to embark on another new chapter, with exchange-like brokers such as Icap PLC and eSpeed Inc. now lining up as possible partners of bigger, more traditional players. These firms are lesser-known than the NYSE and the LSE but are key players in the trading of bonds, currencies and derivatives that are increasingly popular among hedge funds, which control a big slice of the trading on Wall Street."

DOJ_NMG_0069573

IBM To Publish Patent Filings Online. The New York Times (9/26, Lohr) reports that IBM "will publish its patent filings on the Web for public review as part of a new policy that the company hopes will be a model for others. If widely adopted, the policy could help to curb the rising wave of patent disputes and patent litigation." IBM's new policy "includes standards like clearly identifying the corporate ownership of patents, to avoid filings that cloak authorship under the name of an individual or dummy company. It also asserts that so-called business methods alone — broad descriptions of ideas, without technical specifics — should not be patentable."

United Airlines Retains Bank To Chart Merger Strategy. The AP (9/26, Carpenter) reports, "Speculation that United Airlines may be destined for an eventual merger with another U.S. carrier intensified Monday with its reported hiring of Goldman Sachs & Co. to explore strategic options." The AP continues, "United, a unit of UAL Corp., has been advocating more industry consolidation for years under CEO Glenn Tilton and is in better position since leaving bankruptcy in February to take part in it." The AP adds, "The report Monday by Crain's Chicago Business that United had hired an investment banker appeared to add credence to widespread industry talk that it could merge with a carrier such as Continental Airlines or Delta Air Lines. … 'It seems to show that United is serious about looking further into it -- it's not just remarks by the CEO,' said Standard and Poor's Corp. analyst Philip Baggaley. … Most observers and airlines think industry consolidation is likely at some point, but it's been hard to predict when and with whom." The AP notes, "Tilton has been increasingly signaling the possible involvement of United, the nation's second-largest carrier, in industry consolidation. He said in Chicago last week that the company is on solid footing to participate in the merger and acquisition market following three years of restructuring in bankruptcy, which ended in February."

Loudeye Gets Antitrust Nod For Nokia Buy. The AP (9/26) reports, "Loudeye Corp., a digital music distributor, on Monday said U.S. regulators approved its acquisition by Finnish cell-phone maker Nokia Inc." The AP continues, "Loudeye said it received early termination of the waiting period from the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department." The AP adds, "In early August, Nokia said it would buy Loudeye for about $60 million, as a way to expand its mobile digital music offerings. … The deal is expected to close in the fourth quarter, and is still pending shareholder approval and other conditions."

EU Ends Antitrust Immunity For Shippers. The AP (9/26) reports, "European Union governments agreed Monday to open up shipping routes to competition from October 2008, ending a 20-year antitrust immunity law for liner conferences -- groups of shipping companies that strike special trade deals." The AP continues, These scheduled sea freight transport carriers -- grouped in cartels -- have been fixing prices since the 1870s, enjoying immunity from antitrust laws across the world." The AP adds, "The European Commission said the EU economy as whole stood to benefit from lower transport prices and more competitive exports that should result from liberalizing the market. It expects the cost of sea containers to drop after price-fixing falls away. … It will in the future be able to apply antitrust rules to shipping routes -- both scheduled and unscheduled -- to and from Europe and within the same country." The AP notes, "The EU executive said last year that the cartel exemption should be scrapped because shipping had changed considerably over the past 20 years and it no longer needed special treatment. … It said it realized that liner conferences still receive antitrust immunity in other parts of the world and would urge other governments to liberalize the sector. … Antitrust regulations are usually decided by EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, but the former Dutch transport minister -- a member of P&O Nedlloyd's supervisory board for 13 years -- bowed out to avoid conflict-of-interest concerns. She resigned from the board when she became commissioner."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Blocks Sale Of Alaska Oil And Gas Leases. The New York Times (9/26, Barringer, 1.21M) reports, "The Interior Department's plan to sell oil and natural gas leases within 389,000 acres of shallow lakes and wildlife-rich tundra in northern Alaska was blocked Monday by a federal judge in Anchorage who ruled that the department had failed to do a sufficiently broad analysis of the plan's environmental impact." The Times says, "The ruling was the most recent in a string of legal setbacks for the Bush administration's public-lands policies. In each case, federal judges said the government had failed to adhere to environmental requirements." The Time reports, "Environmental groups had sued to block former Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton's decision in January to lease parts of the Teshekpuk Lake area that had been placed off limits by earlier interior secretaries, from James Watt in the Reagan administration to Bruce Babbitt in the Clinton administration."

DOJ_NMG_0069574

Three Maryland E-Coli Cases Not Linked To Bad Spinach. The Washington Post (9/26, B2, Morse) reports, "Maryland public health officials said yesterday that three of the state's four pending cases of E. coli O157 illness are not linked to a nationwide outbreak caused by bad spinach. Officials continue to investigate the death of an 86-year-old Hagerstown woman and hope to receive test results within a week. But those results might prove inconclusive, because of problems associated with a sample. All told, only three of the state's 10 cases have conclusively been linked to the bad bagged spinach from California." On Friday state officials announced "that they had studied 10 recent cases of E. coli O157. As of yesterday, six of the cases were not connected to the spinach; three were connected; and one was inconclusive, officials said. The three positive cases are all children, all of whom are recovering."

Government Climatologists Warn Of Continuing Global Warming. ABC World News (9/25, story 8, 2:35, Gibson) reported on "a grim prediction today from top scientists whose study global warming. They say global warming has gathered so much momentum there is no way to stop earth's average temperature from rising another two degrees by the year 2050, and that will take it to a level hotter than at any time in a million years. The warning came from one of the government's top climatologists and from the National Academy of Sciences."

CBS Evening News (9/25, story 13, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "NASA climate experts reported today that the temperature of the earth has risen so much in the past three decades it's now just two degrees short of its highest temperature in a million years." CBS (Philips) then profiled how the increased temperatures are boosting the British winemaking industry.

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A2, Naik, 2.03M) says the study "finds that, while the world warmed slowly during the century to 1975, it has warmed at a more rapid rate of about 0.2 degrees Celsius (0.36 degrees Fahrenheit) per decade thereafter. The researchers say the global mean temperature is now within one degree Celsius (1.8 degrees Fahrenheit) of the maximum mean temperature of the past million years."

EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program To Reorganize. The Washington Post (9/26, B1, Fahrenthold) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency program charged with cleaning the Chesapeake Bay has decided to reorganize itself, a spokesman said yesterday, conceding that crucial goals for restoring the bay's health by 2010 are unlikely to be met without far-reaching changes. Mike Burke, a spokesman for the 23-year-old Chesapeake Bay Program, said leaders want a greater emphasis on 'implementation' -- carrying out plans to solve the bay's problems. Environmentalists have long called for that, saying the program spends too much time studying pollution and too little trying to stop it. Burke said EPA officials were concerned about their ability to meet promises made amid great fanfare in 2000: a bay with far less pollution and far more crabs, oysters and underwater grass."

Doctoral Student Examines Skunks' Effect On Martha's Vineyard's Endangered Birds. The New York Times (9/26, Dean) reports on Luanne Johnson, who has been trapping skunks on Martha's Vineyard for three years. By next year, Johnson hopes, "the data she has collected will turn into a dissertation for Antioch University New England, where Ms. Johnson is a doctoral student in environmental studies. She jokes that she will title her project 'Skunks on the Beach.' Among other things, she hopes to help settle an argument that erupts here every summer — nesting season for piping plovers and other endangered shorebirds, when stretches of beach are closed to four-wheel-drive vehicles. Opponents of the closing say the threat to the birds is not vehicles, but predators like skunks."

LATimes Says Bush Must Heed Law On Roadless Forest Policy. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, 918K) editorializes, "Decisions to build new roads in pristine forests should be made only after careful study and deliberation. That was the policy adopted in the Clinton administration, which, after three years of study and public input, in 2001 banned road-building in 58 million acres of forest. But the Bush administration, in a decision marked by neither study nor deliberation, suspended the so-called roadless rule later that year. … Just as President Clinton had the power to institute the roadless policy, President Bush has the authority to change it -- even to change it for the worse. But he does not have the right to change it without the analysis required by federal law."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Norte Valle Ring Member Extradited To US. The Washington Times (9/26, Seper) reports that a federal fugitive "considered by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as one of the most violent and dangerous members of Colombia's Norte Valle cocaine-smuggling ring has been extradited to the United States to stand trial. Jhon Eidelber Cano-Correa, 42, arrived in New York on Friday night, where he was formally placed under arrest by ICE agents. … In October, the Colombian National Police's 'Jungla' unit, working with agents from ICE and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) in Bogota captured Cano-Correa after a brief firefight that left one Colombian official wounded." Cano-Correa "is charged in a July 2004 indictment in New York with drug and money-laundering violations in connection with the Norte Valle Cartel."

DOJ_NMG_0069575

Drug Seizures Along US-Mexico Border Reach Record Amounts. According to the Dallas Morning News (9/25, Mclemore), officers at border crossings, Border Patrol agents and state troopers "are finding record amounts of cocaine and marijuana. … With greater enforcement and higher demand, drug trafficking organizations are saturating the border in hopes of getting at least some of their loads across, officials say." The DEA "estimates 65 percent of all narcotics smuggled into the U.S. enters from Mexico. Three of the four major distribution pipelines used by Mexican drug cartels pass through Texas. But for every strategic advance by drug agents, Mexican traffickers try out new ways to bypass law enforcement's attention." The Morning News notes that in June, Karen Tandy "told a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee that about 80 percent of the meth used in the U.S. is distributed by Mexican trafficking organizations and comes from large 'super labs' built on the Mexican side of the border."

Federal Anti-Meth Measure To Take Effect. The Burlington (VT) Free Press (9/25) reports, "Beginning Saturday, when the federal Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act goes into effect, every retailer in the nation that sells certain cold medicines will have to follow the same restrictions. … By restricting the sale of many standard cold medicines, Vermont is ahead of the curve in a region where meth has not become widespread. The new laws are a pre-emptive effort -- or, as State Police Detective Trooper Mike Smith puts it, 'a substantial preventative measure to keep the meth problem at bay.'"

In the Washington Post (9/26, HE1), Francesca Lunzer Kritz writes, "The active ingredient in Sudafed and other oral decongestants, pseudoephedrine will be subject to new federal sales restrictions starting Saturday. Officials hope the limits…will curb illegal production of crystal methamphetamine." Kritz adds, "Although only a small percentage of crystal methamphetamine is made with pseudoephedrine pirated from over-the-counter drugs, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration, use of the illegal drug is far lower in states that restrict pseudoephedrine sales to drugstores only than elsewhere."

US Gives Tajikistan Boats, Equipment To Combat Drug Trafficking. The AP (9/25) reports the U.S. on Monday "donated patrol boats and electronic equipment to help Tajikistan guard its borders and stem the flow of heroin from neighboring Afghanistan." The U.S. "gave the Tajik Border Protection Committee five patrol boats to be used along the Pyandj River border, as well as more than 100 computers and 60 power generators to be used at desolate checkpoints."

Drug Production Called One Of Afghanistan's Most Dangerous Problems. Bloomberg (9/26) reports Tajikistan and Uzbekistan "appealed for international support to help them fight drug trafficking from neighboring Afghanistan. 'An up-to-date, efficient and capable Afghan border service' is needed to combat drug traffickers, Tajikistan's Foreign Minister Talbak Nazarov told the United nations General Assembly yesterday. Drug production is one of the most dangerous problems facing Afghanistan and poses a threat to regional security, Vladimir Norov, Uzbekistan foreign minister, told the assembly."

NYTimes Blasts House "Gun Decontrol Measure." The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) editorializes, "House sycophants of the National Rifle Association are aiming this week to hobble the federal government's power to revoke the licenses of rogue gun dealers who arm the underworld. A shameless proposal would replace existing law with wrist-slapping penalties and an impossible definition of 'willful intent' that would hamstring efforts to close lawless marketeers." The House proposal "would have stopped federal agents from ever revoking the license of Lou's Loans, the Pennsylvania dealer that sold battlefield weapons to one of the co-conspirators in the 1993 assault on the World Trade Center. What makes this gun decontrol measure truly brazen is recent data from the Justice Department, which reported a startling jump of nearly 50 percent last year in gun crime victims, to 477,000."

IMMIGRATION:

House, Senate Negotiators Agree On New Funds To Secure Border. The New York Times (9/26, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "House and Senate negotiators agreed Monday evening to spend $1.2 billion to install hundreds of miles of fence and vehicle barriers along the Mexican border as part of a $34.8 billion spending plan for the Department of Homeland Security for the coming year." The border security spending "is just one of several major policy initiatives that Congressional leaders decided to insert into the annual appropriations bill. Others include a mandate for antiterrorism steps at high-risk chemical plants nationwide and the reorganization of the Federal Emergency Management Agency." Democrats at the conference committee meeting "Monday evening also tried to add about $1 billion in spending for areas including mass transit security, aviation explosives detection research and port security grants." But "with the Republicans holding a majority, each of the measures that Democrats proposed were defeated, one after the other, in party-line votes."

DOJ_NMG_0069576

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Rogers, 2.03M) reports, "The political centerpiece for Republicans -- just weeks before the midterm elections -- is an estimated $1.19 billion to help pay for fencing, vehicle barriers and new technology to police the U.S. border with Mexico. Hundreds of millions would also be added to equip the Coast Guard and increase the air and marine capabilities of customs and border patrols."

CQ (9/26, Sandler) reports that "with little time left and little agreement on how to use it, it appears possible that the House GOP's tactic of pushing through narrowly focused border security bills to put political pressure on Democrats might fail to yield either legislative or political results. By Monday night, the fiscal 2007 Homeland Security spending bill (HR 5441) was ruled out as a vehicle for any of the provisions. " House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "was working to include in the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill (HR 5122) language that would make it easier to deport or deny entry to immigrant gang members, his spokesman said." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "appeared confident that his chamber would clear another bill (HR 6061), which would authorize 700 miles of fencing along the southwestern border with Mexico. He filed a cloture petition, setting up a vote to end debate on the measure for Wednesday." But "even that was not without complications. Frist, working with a tight clock, took procedural steps to attach military tribunal legislation (S 3930) to the fence bill if an agreement cannot be reached on how to consider that measure separately." And "no one is yet ready to say the leadership has the 60 votes necessary to invoke cloture on the fence bill."

NYTimes Blasts Bush, GOP Bills. The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) editorializes that "the Republican-controlled House" is "passing a pre-election lineup of narrow enforcement measures packaged to give voters a false impression of resolve." President Bush "has even given up talking a good game on immigration: he says he will sign the Republican legislation as a 'first step' toward the real reform he has said he wants but has done depressingly little to achieve." The Times adds, "The House's election hunt for border-security sound bites shows how susceptible to demagoguery the debate can be. Anti-immigrant fervor is a flame that spreads easily. But leadership can help people look beyond resentment and fear. Once upon a time, Mr. Bush was a sense-talking governor from a border state who understood this. Now he has joined the leaders of his party in calling on the nation to cower behind electric fences, searchlights and squad cars. It's painful to see what he has turned into, and frustrating, in these days of immigration panic, to keep waiting for a real leader to emerge."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

DOJ Support For 9th Circuit Split Seen As Possible Sea Change. The ABA Journal (9/26, McDonough) reports, "After nearly 35 years of debate over dividing the nation's largest federal appellate court, the Justice Department has reversed its previous stance and is now weighing in on the side of a split." The Journal continues, "Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Sept. 20, Rachel Brand, assistant attorney general in the DOJ's Office of Legal Policy, stated the time is right to split the overburdened, oversized 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is based in San Francisco." The Journal adds, "Brand was one of 12 witnesses—six in favor of a split, six opposed—who testified about the legislation, which has been introduced by Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Ensign, R-Nev. Their bill would leave California and Hawaii in the 9th Circuit and create a 12th Circuit to cover Alaska, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Nevada and Arizona. It also would add seven more judges, likely to remain in the 9th Circuit. … Legislation to split the circuit passed the House last year, but never reached a vote in the Senate." The Journal notes, "The Justice Department's new position and a growing interest in Congress in splitting the circuit—seven circuit restructuring bills have been introduced this Congress alone—may indicate a sea change. … The Justice Department is one of the most frequent litigants in the federal courts. In 1998, the last time the department weighed in on the issue, it opposed the split. But Brand said the DOJ has since come to the conclusion that, while the 9th Circuit has responded to its rapidly growing caseload by being 'innovative and creative,' it has done so in large part by delegating certain functions to nonjudges. That will only work for so long, she said."

WSJournal Defends FREE Judiciary Seminars. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "The conflict-of-interest fetish continues to interfere with normal human relations, so it's a relief when someone sounds rational on the subject. That now includes the Judicial Conference of the U.S., which last week adopted new disclosure rules for federal judges who attend privately funded education seminars." The Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment (FREE) and Montana State University "have for 15 years co-sponsored seminars in Bozeman, where federal judges learn more about the effects and trade-offs of environmental public policy. Such events are common -- typically hosted by universities, public policy institutes or legal groups like the American Bar Association -- and useful in promoting a better-informed judiciary." But a group called the Community Rights Counsel has "been on a mission to stop federal judges from attending FREE seminars. … Democrats should leave FREE alone. And if they really care about legal conflicts of interest, how about going after the trial lawyers who are double dipping on asbestos and silicosis lawsuits? There's a real scandal."

DOJ_NMG_0069577

Roberts, Alito To Stay In Cert Pool This Term. The Legal Times (9/26, Mauro) reports, "As they enter their second term, the Supreme Court's two newest justices have decided, at least temporarily, to stick with the Court's clerk-pooling arrangement, despite concerns that it gives law clerks too much power." The Times continues, "In brief interviews in recent weeks, both Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. said they will stay in the "cert pool," as it is called, for the current term. … Roberts said he will participate on a 'year-to-year basis,' and Alito said the same; both indicated they are still weighing the issues that have been raised. But Alito said that during his first term it was apparent to him that certiorari petitions need to be read closely to determine if they are worth granting -- suggesting some need for pooling the workload." The Times adds, "The arrangement, devised in 1972, radically changed what happens when a petition for review or certiorari comes in to the Court. Instead of being reviewed separately by nine clerks and/or nine justices, it is scrutinized for the pool, presumably in greater depth, by one clerk, who then writes a memo for all the justices in the pool. .. . The pool drew little criticism when only four or five justices participated. But ever since the late Thurgood Marshall left the Court, in 1991, Justice John Paul Stevens has been the only justice outside the pool, preferring to have his clerks take a separate look at petitions, partly as a backstop for the pool."

Lawmakers Urge Creation Of Food Safety Agency. USA Today (9/26, Davis, Bleimes, 2.27M) reports, "While the search continues for the origin of an E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach, lawmakers are renewing calls for the creation of a single government agency responsible for the safety of the nation's food supply." Last year, "the Safe Food Act of 2005 was introduced in the Senate by Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., and in the House by Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn. The bill proposed the creation of a Food Safety Administration to assume all responsibility for food safety and oversight." USA Today adds, "Proponents say such an agency would streamline the process of preventing, tracking and containing outbreaks, which is currently handled by 12 federal agencies and subagencies." But "the legislation has remained in congressional committees since its introduction." DeLauro "has requested a hearing before the House Energy and Commerce Committee before the current session of Congress adjourns on Oct. 6." Durbin "has also requested a hearing in the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee."

Bloggers To Join Bush For Signing Of Spending Database Law. The Washington Times (9/26, Dinan, 88K) reports President Bush "has invited bloggers to join him today as he signs into law a bill creating a database of federal spending -- a recognition of their role in forcing the bill through Congress over the objections of senior senators and an indication of how much bloggers are changing the political process." A spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn, the driving force behind the bill, said, "The bloggers mobilized Congress. … It really does represent a revival of basic democratic values: that active citizens using tools of technology really can steer the political process. And what happened was profoundly subversive to the established political order."

WSJournal Gives GOP A "D" For Fiscal Conservatism. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "As Republicans lurch toward November, they're trying to reclaim their birthright as fiscal conservatives. So far they're moved up to a D from an F, with a chance to still grab a gentleman's C." The House "passed an 'earmark' reform to bring more transparency to the runaway process of sticking pork into appropriations bills," but it "won't apply to the 10 spending bills the House has already passed this year. Meanwhile, the Senate has yet to act, and the new House rule expires at the end of this Congress. … In a better sign of progress, President Bush will today sign the 'Federal Transparency Act,' which will create a searchable public database of some $1 trillion worth of federal grants, contracts and loans."

Democrats Hope To Use Majority To Force US Withdrawal From Iraq. The Hill (9/26, Cusack) reports Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) "will chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win control of the House next year, but his main goal in 2007 does not fall within his panel's jurisdiction." Rangel said, "I can't stop this war." But when "pressed on how he could stop the war even if Democrats control the House during the last years of President Bush's second term, Rangel paused before saying, 'You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?'" The Hill adds Rangel's "views on funding the war are shared by many of his colleagues – especially within the 73-member Out of Iraq Caucus." Some Democratic legislators "want to halt funding for the war immediately, while others say they would allocate money for activities such as reconstruction, setting up international security forces, and the ultimate withdrawal of U.S. troops." Rep. Lynne Woolsey "is among the Democrats in Congress who are hoping to control the power of the purse in 2007 to force an end to the war. Woolsey and some of her colleagues note that Congress helped force the end of Vietnam War by refusing to pay for it." But "having lost the last two elections in part because of national security issues, Democratic leaders have been reluctant to spell out their exact Iraq war funding strategy." Rep. Woolsey said, "I don't think the Democratic leadership should put that out at the moment."

DOJ_NMG_0069578

Democrats Say White House Rhetoric Distorts War On Terror. In the New York Times' "White House Memo" column (9/26), Jim Rutenberg says that as the White House "intensifies a campaign to paint its opponents as wobbly in the war on terrorism, Democrats say it is engaging in a rhetorical device that subtly distorts their positions to make them seem extreme or misguided, raising phantom positions and implying they belong to Democrats before knocking them down as dangerous." Current and former administration officials "say some cases cited by the Democrats are legitimate interpretations of Democratic positions through a deductive, if Republican, lens. Other times, they say, Democrats were seeing things that were not there." Both sides agree "that the White House is seeking to draw as sharp a distinction between Republicans and Democrats on terrorism as possible, something it has done skillfully in the past two election cycles. And so far this year it has lived up to its reputation of being particularly adept at using carefully chosen language to cast its opponents as unflatteringly as possible — and to define their positions for voters before they can define them themselves." President Bush, "not known for particularly smooth oratory, could well be remembered for his perceived use of rhetorical sleight of hand that consistently ensnares and enrages his rivals. It is a skill at which even Democrats marvel." White House press secretary Tony Snow "accused Democrats of engaging in 'exegetical work' in seeking evidence of something that was not there and 'protesting too much' in the face of accusations that Mr. Bush was not, in fact, hurling." Snow said, "I don't think the president's ever said the Democrats want to negotiate with these people. He's trying to make a dramatic point you can't reason with them. I just don't understand it when you express umbrage at a statement that wasn't aimed at you." Snow added, "I defy you to find a directly personal insult from the president that would compare with, or that is as bald or direct as, calling him a loser or a liar."

GOP House Leaders Indecisive On Date For Leadership Elections. The Hill (9/26, O'Connor) reports House GOP leaders "cannot decide whether to hold leadership elections the week after the midterm elections. Their uncertainty is a sign of Republican unease and suggests that officeholders may postpone the contests for their jobs if the party suffers heavy losses." The caucus elects its leadership "during an organizing conference traditionally held the first week after the election, but this year, leaders appear torn on when to hold that conference." The House Administration Committee "has scheduled a conference meeting for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week after the midterm, when new lawmakers come to Washington for orientation. But Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said last week that leaders had not yet decided whether to hold elections that day."

CMS Names New Acting Director. The AP (9/25, Freking) reports, "A lawyer who has served in two Bush administrations has been named the acting chief of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, federal officials said Monday. Leslie Norwalk, 40, has served on the senior leadership team at the agency for the past five years, currently as the deputy administrator. She will succeed Mark McClellan, who recently announced that he is stepping down." As the acting director, Norwalk "will oversee the government health care programs for the elderly and the poor. The agency is responsible for $1 out of every $3 spent on health care in the United States."

Congress' Medicare Policy Said To Defy Laws Of Economics. Dr. Lawrence A. Hunter, former staff director of the Joint Economic Committee, wrote in The Hill (9/25), "In an attempt to help stop spiraling inflation during 1970's, Congress thought it would try placing price controls on the fees doctors could charge under Medicare." The price controls "failed completely to keep Medicare costs down." This happened because "Medicare is not a free market; it is a gigantic welfare program in which the taxes people pay as workers to support the program are completely disconnected from the benefits they receive as Medicare recipients." Yet "despite this confirmation of the laws of economics, Congress persists in its hubris to eclipse the economic laws of nature and continues to impose price controls on doctors' fees."

Federal Agencies Hiring Contractors In Times Of Crisis. The Washington Post (9/26, A19, Lee, 748K) reports, "Increasingly, federal agencies are outsourcing toll-free lines in times of crisis -- both to ensure that every call from a citizen is answered and to free agency staff members to deal with the crisis itself, federal officials said. Federal contractors routinely field calls from Americans worried about friends or relatives when a hurricane hits, when terrorist bombs go off in places such as Bali, Madrid and London and, most recently, when war broke out in Lebanon." As an example, the Post notes, "When a Department of Veterans Affairs laptop computer was stolen in May, putting the sensitive personal information of millions of veterans at risk, VA officials sought to quell concerns by providing a toll-free number to call. … The people answering the phone, though, were not federal civil servants at the department's D.C. headquarters but contract workers in commercial call centers in far-flung places such as North Hollywood, Calif., Lock Haven, Pa., and Sergeant Bluff, Iowa."

DOJ_NMG_0069579

Report Suggests Federal Government Tighten Hiring Procedures. The Washington Post (9/26, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that in response to complaints about the federal hiring process, the government has tried to speed things up. According to the Post, "Agencies are increasingly using computers to decrease processing time. The Office of Personnel Management has developed a 45-day hiring model. Still, hiring takes time, in part because many jobs require medical and security clearances (and some background checks can take a year or longer)." The Post adds, "The larger question, however, is whether the government is identifying and selecting the best applicants. Public opinion surveys suggest relatively few college graduates see the government as a first choice when job-hunting, and a new study by the Merit Systems Protection Board suggests that the government needs to do a better job of selling itself. … To address these challenges, the report recommends that the government tighten hiring procedures to emphasize quality and not just speed."

Critics Say Capitol Visitor Center Has Become Boondoggle. NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 8, 2:40, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "Critics call it the 'Pig Dig.' A massive construction project they say is pigging out on Federal tax dollars right in Congress' front yard. The Capitol visitor center, now 85% complete, three stories, all underground, state-of-the-art theaters, a great hall, even a 450-seat auditorium. The goal tighter security and an improved learning experience for millions of tourists. The problems, critics say…." Steve Ellis, Government Spending Analyst: "We've created this Taj Mahal on the Capitol grounds, a boondoggle." Reid: "In 1995 it was projected to cost $100 million and to be ready in 1999. But the digging didn't begin until 2002. By then the cost had ballooned to $265 million and kept growing and growing and growing. The latest estimate nearly $600 million. And it won't be ready until late next year at the earliest. Just last week, some members of Congress gave the project their Golden Drain award -- the qualifications?" Rep. Dave Obey: "Pitiful oversight, exploding costs and embarrassing results." Reid: "Supporters of the project say its scope changed after 9/11, necessitating expensive security upgrades."

OTHER NEWS:

Data On Home Prices Add To Evidence Of Cooling Real Estate Market. ABC World News (9/25, story 10, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "New numbers on housing market today highlight on real estate is cooling. The nation's group of realtors says a key measure has fallen for the first time in a decade. Median price sold last month was $225,000, down almost 2% from the same period a year before."

The New York Times (9/26, Peters, 1.21M) reports that "while the market slide is almost certainly not over, the report suggested that it might be beginning to ease. Existing-home sales have been falling steadily in recent months, but the month-to-month decline in August was the smallest since March." Sales "dropped 0.5 percent from July to August, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.3 million units, the Realtors association said. That compares with a decline from June to July of 4.1 percent. … If the sales trends are leveling off, however, prices still appear set to fall further."

CBS Evening News (9/25, story 9, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) said that "if you've got a house to sell, the numbers are not exactly going in the right direction. Home prices are down for the first time in more than a decade."

On NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 6, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M), David Lereah, National Association of Realtors chief economist, was shown saying,, "The sellers market has turned into a buyers market. That's why prices have come down over the last 12 months. And that is why they will continue to come down over the next six months." NBC (Thompson) added, "The biggest drop came in the Northeast, a 3.9% decline from August 2005 to this August. Followed by the South and Midwest. Only in the West did prices go up."

The Washington Post (9/26, D1, Tse, 748K) quotes Lereah characterizing 2007 as "the year of modest recovery." He added, "Prices got too high. … Buyers are not going to buy unless prices come down. That's the only way the bleeding will stop on the sale side."

USA Today (9/26, Knox, 2.27M) says home prices "are projected to fall for the rest of the year." The median-priced "US single-family detached home -- half cost more, half less -- fell 1.7% in August to $225,700, compared with a year ago. The decline is no doubt jarring to sellers." The price drop "was also sharp, the second-steepest in 38 years." The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Petruno, 918K) runs a similar report under the headline "Homes Data Cause Jitters," while the Washington Times (9/26, Hill, 88K) titles its story "Median Home Price Takes A Sharp Drop."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today the Dow was up more than 67 points [to close at 11,574.81]. The NASDAQ was up more than 30 points [to close at 2,249.07] on today's trading." USA Today (9/26, Shell, 2.27M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500 "gained 11.59 points, or 0.9%, to 1326.37, topping its May 5 high of 1325.76. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001. It is up 6.3% in 2006." The Financial Times (9/26, O'Doherty) reports "investors took heart from comments by a Federal Reserve official that slowing economic growth would probably temper inflation."

DOJ_NMG_0069580

The Wall Street Journal (9/26, McKay, 2.03M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock prices.

Slower Economy Boosting Bonds. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A1, Hudson, 2.03M) reports, "In one of the bigger surprises in financial markets this year, a growing sense that the economy is slowing and inflation receding is fueling a rally in the nation's bond markets, pushing Treasury-bond yields to their lowest levels in months." The rally "may help to shape the outlook for both the economy and for investments in coming months. Some doubt the rally will last," but "if it does, lower interest rates could help buoy stock prices, make it easier for investors to make potentially risky bets with borrowed money, and ultimately help soften the blow from a weaker economy and a cooling housing market."

Crude Oil Prices Rise Sharply After Dipping Below $60. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, C3, Farivar, 2.03M) reports, "Crude-oil futures ended sharply higher after another drop below $60 failed to stick and comments by OPEC's president offered support. Prices dipped below $60 a barrel for the second time in recent months but quickly rebounded above that psychologically important level as traders were forced to buy back previously sold positions. The November crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled 90 cents higher at $61.45 a barrel after hitting an intraday low of $59.52, the lowest level for a front-month crude contract since early March." The Journal says, "prices dipped early in the day on an announcement made by BP PLC late Friday that it would increase oil flows from its Prudhoe Bay field in Alaska." However, many traders took "recent comments by OPEC officials to suggest that the cartel will cut production to prevent prices from falling significantly below $60 a barrel.

The Financial Times (9/26, Morrison, Blas) reports, "Oil exporting countries may consider a cut in output after crude prices fell below $60 a barrel on Monday for the first time in six months." OPEC ministers "are understood to be concerned about the drop in oil prices, which are down almost a quarter from their recent peaks. They have discussed the prospect of trimming production ahead of the oil cartel's next ministerial meeting in Nigeria in December, according to Opec officials." The Times says, "The oil price fall over the past month has been accompanied by investor selling in oil and other commodity markets, mainly on concerns that economic growth in the US is slowing."

The New York Times (9/26 , 1.21M) reports, "Whether oil prices will drift back up or continue their general slide is a matter of fierce debate." The Times says, "Noncommercial buyers, which are generally pension, mutual and hedge funds, poured money into oil and other commodities in recent years, in part because they thought that the growing emerging-market economies had created a so-called supercycle that guaranteed price increases. In recent weeks, they have exited the market rapidly as prices started to fall ... ."

Rice Calls Clinton's Statements On Bush And Bin Laden "Flatly False." The New York Post's cover story this morning (9/26, Bishop), titled "Rice Boils Over At Bubba: Rips 'Flatly False' Claim On Bush's Bid To Get Bin Laden," reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "accused Bill Clinton of making 'flatly false' claims that the Bush administration didn't lift a finger to stop terrorism before the 9/11 attacks. Rice hammered Clinton, who leveled his charges in a contentious weekend interview with Chris Wallace of Fox News Channel, for his claims that the Bush administration 'did not try' to kill Osama bin Laden in the eight months they controlled the White House before the Sept. 11 attacks. 'The notion somehow for eight months the Bush administration sat there and didn't do that is just flatly false - and I think the 9/11 commission understood that,' Rice said during a wide-ranging meeting with Post editors and reporters. 'What we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years,' Rice added." According to the Post, "Her strong rebuttal was the Bush administration's first response to Clinton's headline-grabbing interview on Fox on Sunday."

The White House Bulletin/US News (9/25) reported, "Already irked at former President Clinton's comments on Fox News Sunday about the Bush administration's handling of the war on Iraq, a senior aide today said she was irked by the ex-president's charge that the Bush team wasn't looking for Osama bin Laden hard enough." Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend said, "I take offense at that. I think it's unfair to suggest, for whatever the agreements or disagreements are between the two administrations in terms of their approach, to suggest than anybody just doesn't take this very seriously, doesn't want to stop the next attack -- that's what I say offends me. It offends me, the notion that anybody wants to see that happen again or isn't doing everything they believe that legitimately is in their power to do it." The Bulletin adds Townsend "described the President and administration as deeply involved in the hunt for bin Laden. But she didn't sound angry with Clinton. In fact, she was quite diplomatic in addressing his outburst to Fox host Chris Wallace when he asked if Clinton had done enough to get bin Laden." Townsend said, "It appeared to me that in the heat of the moment the president was angry, he felt attacked and he reacted."

Clinton's Fox "Outburst" May Have Been A Signal To Democrats. ABC and NBC both ran detailed stories on President Clinton's Fox News Sunday interview. ABC World News (9/25, story 4, 2:20, Gibson) said the "issue of terrorism helped provoke an extraordinary outburst" from Clinton. But

DOJ_NMG_0069581

"was he really mad or using anger to make a larger point?" ABC (Harris) added, "Bill Clinton was visibly irate, leaning forward in his chair…interrupting…even taunting the interviewer, who asked whether he'd done enough as President to get Osama bin Laden." Clinton's advisers "say he was doing more than defending his legacy. He was sending a message to fellow Democrats, they say." Clinton spokesman Jay Carson: "We cannot continue to allow Republicans to use their tactic of smear and fear to win in this next election. President Clinton's not going to allow that to happen. And he thinks Democrats shouldn't, either." Harris: "Unlike Michael Dukakis, Al Gore and John Kerry, who many believe failed to effectively combat efforts to distort their image, the Clintons believe the Democrats have to push back hard."

NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 3, 3:20, Williams, 9.87M) said Clinton "ended up in a combative exchange" with host Chris Wallace. NBC ran a significant clip of the Fox interview, then spoke with David Gergen, who said, "He came off a terrific week as ex-President and raised more than $7 billion for worthy causes and walked into an interview with Wallace which he thought was going to be about the initiative. And he got sandbagged by this question. The question from Chris's point of view was legitimate but from Clinton's point of view was, you're trying to sandbag me with a question that echoes conservative critics that…tried to set me up as the guy who failed to get bin Laden and therefore I'm responsible for 9/11. The President completely rejects that."

Morris Says "Real" Clinton Emerged In Interview. In his column in The Hill (9/26), Dick Morris writes, "From behind the benign façade and the tranquilizing smile, the real Bill Clinton emerged" during the interview. "There he was on live television, the man those who have worked for him have come to know – the angry, sarcastic, snarling, self-righteous, bombastic bully, roused to a fever pitch. The truer the accusation, the greater the feigned indignation. … The ex-president is fully justified in laying eight months of the blame for the failure to kill or catch bin Laden at the doorstep of George W. Bush. But he should candidly acknowledge that eight years of blame fall on him."

Author Says Clinton Does Not Understand Meaning Of Truth. In a Los Angeles Times (9/26, 918K) op-ed, novelist Andrew Klavan says Clinton "has never understood what the meaning of 'is' is, the fact that some things happened and others didn't, that some things are true and others simply are not. He believes that his legacy will be created in the spin cycle of history rather than in the fitful but persistent human search for history's truth. Of course he panics and rages like a child when the spin goes the wrong way, when he is given his portion of the blame for encouraging Bin Laden through his military retreat from Somalia or for allowing the terrorist to escape by refusing to put a kill order on him. He thinks reality itself is being wrestled away from him, that he can wrestle it back and mold it into the shape he wants it to have. But he's wrong. That's just 'is' being is. That's just 'truth' bearing away the victory."

Both Parties Seek Edge On Issues In Congress As Midterm Elections Loom. The New York Times (9/26, Zernike, Hulse, 1.21M) reports Republicans and Democrats "scrambled Monday to gain the advantage in their final week before breaking to campaign for crucial midterm elections, with Republicans trying to push through bills on national security and Democrats trying to keep the focus on the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq." Though Republicans had "resolved a major party disagreement over the treatment and trials for terrorism suspects, a new dispute emerged," as Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "said he thought a crucial provision of the legislation was unconstitutional and would doom the bill before the Supreme Court." Meanwhile, Democrats "convened a session with three former high-ranking military officers who harshly criticized Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and said the Bush administration's failure to adjust its strategy as the conflict unfolded was immoral." The Democrats "also seized on the newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate concluding that the war had fueled the threat from terrorists to argue that the war had made the country less safe." Republicans had "hoped to use the month before the campaign break to emphasize their national security initiatives, but they have repeatedly run into trouble."

The New York Times (9/26, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "There is little evidence that Republicans are having success in altering the political climate in the most competitive House and Senate races. Polls this past weekend showed Republicans trailing in Senate races in Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania. In Indiana, Representative John Hostettler, a Republican, is trailing his Democratic opponent by double digits, according to a new poll."

GOP Insiders Now Rate Chances Of Holding House At 50-50. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/25) reported, "Many GOP candidates in tough races are being urged by party leaders to end their campaigns this fall on two issues -- economic security and national security. Specifically, they are being encouraged to use the following talking points: President Bush and the Republican majority in Congress will keep America safer in the war on terrorism than the Democrats would, and the Republicans would be better stewards on the economy. A final point that the GOP elders want their candidates to emphasize in the windup of the campaign: Democrats would raise taxes, and Republicans wouldn't." Democratic strategists say "their game plan includes the argument that the war in Iraq has proven that the President and the GOP have stumbled into a dangerous foreign-policy swamp. Attempting to capitalize on today's news reports on the controversial National Intelligence Estimate, the Democrats will argue that the war in Iraq is actually hindering the overall war on terror by diverting resources, over-stretching the military, and stirring up Islamic radicals." Meanwhile, a senior Republican adviser "with strong ties to the White House tells U.S. News and the Bulletin that GOP insiders now rate the prospect of Republicans holding their majority in the House at 50-50. A few weeks, ago, the internal estimate was only 30-70."

DOJ_NMG_0069582

The Washington Times (9/26, Hallow, 88K) reports there has been "a palpable shift in the mood in Washington in recent weeks. No longer are insiders in both parties sharing predictions of a Democratic rout of Republicans." Some observers "on both sides had expected an election debacle for the Republicans, driven by the Iraq war, high gas prices and the perception that a Republican-led Washington can neither shoot nor spend straight. Now those perceptions have changed." A "58 percent majority of Democratic insiders polled by National Journal, as well as an overwhelming 94 percent of Republican insiders, say the Republican National Committee is doing a better job for November than the Democratic National Committee."

House Republicans Said To Be Relying On Negative Ads. The Los Angeles Times (9/26, Hook, 918K) reports while President Bush "and national GOP leaders are attacking Democrats on such big issues as national security and America's role in the world, individual Republicans are hitting their opponents hard — below the belt, some critics say — on personal and local issues." Mudslinging is "crucial to the Republican plan for this year's midterm elections, because the party's hold on power will probably hinge on shifting attention from the unpopular war in Iraq and other national issues that cut against them." Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee chief of staff, said, "When people are looking at national issues that are not breaking our way, what you want to do is focus on your opponent. You've got to play the field's conditions. They demand very tough tactics." Cole "spelled out that approach in a recent strategy memo to House Republicans: 'Define your opponent immediately and unrelentingly.... Do not let up — keep the tough ads running right up to election day. Don't make the mistake of pulling your ads in favor of a positive rotation the last weekend.'" The Times adds Republican incumbents "this year began running attack ads earlier than ever. But the hardest-hitting are yet to come." Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said, "You haven't seen the majority of the negative ads yet."

Congressional Republicans Not Running From Bush's Fundraising. The New York Times (9/26, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports Republicans "do not expect to be riding President Bush's record to re-election this fall. But they are trying to ride his gravy train — as quietly as possible." Bush "scooped up $1.7 million for Republicans in Connecticut and Ohio on Monday, at fund-raisers that, like so many of his events this campaign season, took place in private homes behind closed doors. He lunched in Greenwich, at a home overlooking the Long Island Sound, raising $700,000 for the Connecticut Republican Party before dashing off to Ohio to help Senator Mike DeWine." Three House Republicans "from Connecticut — Representatives Nancy Johnson, Rob Simmons and Christopher Shays — face tight re-election races, but only one, Mr. Shays, whose district includes Greenwich, showed up for the afternoon affair at the home of the investment banker L. Scott Frantz." Shays said, "He is helping us to raise money and get out the vote and that is very helpful. You know and I know that my opponent is running as if President Bush is up for re-election, and he obviously isn't." The Times adds such "private events — five are planned for this week alone — give Mr. Bush a chance to mingle with donors out of the earshot of reporters, and far from photographers who might capture him with candidates leery of being viewed as too close to the White House." As of Monday, the Republican National Committee said, "Mr. Bush had raised nearly $176 million for Republican candidates this election cycle. By week's end, that figure will rise; Mr. Bush's schedule includes an 'Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin Victory 2006' reception on Tuesday (closed); an event on Wednesday for Bob Corker, the Republican Senate candidate in Tennessee (closed); a reception in Birmingham on Thursday for Alabama's governor, Bob Riley (open); and another Ohio fundraiser on Thursday, for Representative Deborah Pryce (closed)."

The AP (9/26, Lester) reports President Bush "combined two fundraising trips for threatened GOP incumbents Monday with a tour of a family-run manufacturing business he pointed to as proof that his tax cuts are helping the economy. But the most powerful economic news could be found at the gas stations all over Cincinnati, where gas could be bought for a little more than $2 a gallon." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said that 'everyone notices gas prices.' He scoffed at suggestions the administration is pushing prices down just before elections, saying people are crediting Bush 'with the kind of magisterial power unknown to any other human being.'" The AP adds Bush "advocated making his tax cuts permanent, a frequent theme at stops around the country. He said such a move would help small businesses like Meyer Tool. During his tour of the plant, Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio was close by his side. DeWine was criticized when he did not appear with Bush on some earlier visits." Bush "raised almost $1 million for DeWine, who is in a close re-election contest with Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown."

DOJ_NMG_0069583

The Cincinnati Enquirer (9/26, Wilkinson, 212K) reports President Bush came to Cincinnati "to help DeWine tap once again into Indian Hill's almost bottomless well of Republican campaign money." Bush traveled "to the Indian Hill home of John Barrett, CEO of Western & Southern Financial Group, for a DeWine fundraising event that was expected to raise at least $1 million for DeWine's tough re-election campaign against Democrat Sherrod Brown."

The Washington Post (9/26, A4, Fletcher, 748K) reports the Connecticut and Ohio events "underscored both his continued ability to attract donations and his continued unpopularity with much of the public." Bush "has been featured in the ads of Democratic congressional candidates across the country who are trying to tie the unpopular president to GOP candidates. At the same time, many Republican candidates have chosen to stay out of public view when with the president, even while seeking his help to raise money. The president's two events yesterday were among five closed fundraisers that he is scheduled to take part in this week."

CNN Poll Finds Bush's Approval Rating At 42%. CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Blitzer) reported, "In the lead up to the battle for Congress, President Bush's approval rating is holding relatively steady in our brand new poll. Forty-two percent of those surveyed now say they approve of the way Mr. Bush is doing his job. A majority, 55 percent, still disapprove. The President's approval rating has been in the low 40s in our poll since mid-August, increasing from 37 percent back in June."

Bush Said To Lack Backing Of A "Silent Majority." In his Washington Post column (9/26, A21), E.J. Dionne says, "What could prove to be the most important factor in the 2006 elections is overlooked because it is unseen: The Republicans cannot try to curry favor with a 'silent majority' that favors the Iraq war because a majority of Americans, both vocal and quiet, have come to see the war as a mistake. President Bush's defenders have cast opponents of the war as weak on terrorism. Yesterday, Vice President Cheney accused Democrats of 'resignation and defeatism.' But the charges have not taken hold, because most Americans don't agree with the premise linking the war on terror with the war in Iraq."

Snow To Raise Funds For GOP Candidates. The AP (9/26, Pickler) reports White House press secretary Tony Snow is "taking his gift of gab across the country in the coming weeks to raise money for Republican candidates, an unusual task for the president's top spokesman." But the "former Fox News commentator is in-demand on the GOP circuit. He said he decided to help maintain the party's majority in Congress after some consideration of his proper role — and that doesn't include a lot of red meat rhetoric like some speakers offer at partisan events." Snow said, "They asked, and I thought about it a lot and we went back and forth. It's one of those things where I certainly want to help the president. But you have to make sure it's a fine line, and that's why I don't want to get into opponent bashing."

House GOP Leaders, Rove To Press Lobbyists For Funds. Roll Call (9/26, Ackley, Ben Pershing) reports with "only a few days left before they leave town for the campaign trail, House Republican leaders — with an assist from White House strategist Karl Rove — will mount one final push this week for the financial support of GOP lobbyists." On Thursday afternoon "at the Capitol Hill Club, Rove will join the top six House GOP leaders to address as many as 200 lobbyists, the first large-scale meeting between lobbyists and leaders in recent months." A GOP leadership aide said, "This is a straight-out appeal to [lobbyists] to contribute to Republicans — to remind them what Republicans do not only for their specific industries but for the whole business community." The aide "added that the leaders would emphasize that 'reports of the Republican majority's demise have been greatly exaggerated, and we're coming back.'" Roll Call adds several GOP sources "said the leadership also would reiterate a warning against giving to Democrats that was conveyed by National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) earlier this month to a smaller group of lobbyists and political action committee directors." One said that "part of Thursday's message will be, 'if you're hedging your bets you're making the wrong decision.'"

Control Of House May Not Be Settled In November. The AP (9/26, Espo) reports that it is possible for neither party to emerge from the November 8 election with a House majority: "The outcome will be decided by run-off elections in Louisiana and Texas, recounts in a half-dozen races that are too close to call and perhaps a party switch or two. Unprecedented? Yes. Impossible? Absolutely not, given an era of polarization that has produced a presidential election so close the Supreme Court had to settle it, and a 50-50 tie in the Senate." Steve Elmendorf, who was chief of staff to former House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, said, "It means that all of your focus and energy will be on trying to get to 218 in two ways. One, in recounts and trying to make sure you're throwing every legal strategy and lawyer you can find into try and win the recounts. Secondly, you're going to be looking for every potential person on the other side who can switch." The AP adds Speaker Dennis Hastert, when "asked about Democrats who might be approached to become a Republican," said, "I have no one in particular in mind." Hastert said "he doubted any of his rank-and-file would defect."

DOJ_NMG_0069584

Both Parties Preparing For Possibly Contested Elections. The AP (9/26, Welsh-Huggins) reports Democrats are "openly lining up election-day teams of lawyers around the country to fight what they allege could be GOP efforts to suppress votes." Republicans "quietly say they have their own strategies for potential problems Nov. 7 but won't give specifics. They say Democrats' concerns are overblown." The parties' "efforts come in the wake of the 2000 recount in Florida and irregularities in Ohio's elections two years ago. Those problems included long lines, a shortage of voting machines and some electronic machines that malfunctioned or miscounted votes. Ohio gave President Bush the White House in 2004."

Landscape Of Battle For Senate Shifting. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A4, Calmes, 2.03M) reports that in Washington state, "disgruntled Democrats have fallen in behind" Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell "after concluding that their protest would only throw the seat to Republicans. Now, her bridge-building and the mistakes of her Republican rival, Mike McGavick, have Democratic leaders in the East resting easier about a seat that topped their endangered list for much of the year." The Washington state race "illustrates the fluidity of the fall finale for Senate control as voters tune in. Republicans are struggling in a hostile climate to protect a 55-45 majority on Election Day. Democrats have to seize nearly every Republican target while losing none of their own." Republicans have "given up on early targets among Democrats from states that backed President Bush's re-election, and are now struggling to keep some of their own red-state seats. Democrats, safe in red states, are campaigning hardest in blue ones, especially New Jersey." Five Republican incumbents "trail in polls. In Tennessee's open-seat contest to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford yesterday released a poll showing he had overtaken Republican Bob Corker. Two other Republican incumbents -- Virginia's George Allen and Arizona's John Kyl -- have seen their once-formidable leads erode to single digits." Meanwhile, Democrats "have grown less worried about three of their seats. Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Amy Klobuchar, seeking Minnesota's open spot, showed wide leads in polls released last week. Yesterday in Maryland, a Baltimore Sun poll showed Rep. Ben Cardin up by 11 points over Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. That leaves New Jersey as Democrats' biggest worry."

Democrats Hope To Be Competitive In Western States. USA Today (9/26, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports Democrat Gary Trauner's campaign to unseat Republican Barbara Cubin in Wyoming "may not be entirely quixotic. National publications that track elections such as The Cook Political Report and Congressional Quarterly have started paying attention to what once was regarded as a Republican shoo-in." Trauner's chances "could also be affected by broader changes in the Rocky Mountain West, such as strong population growth. Democrats could build on gains they made in the region in 2002 and 2004." Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz "predicted the GOP is 'going to continue to be successful in the Rocky Mountain West because ideologically we stand with voters, while Democrats have taken positions contrary to the views of a majority of voters.'" USA adds that still, in 2004, "at least below the president on the ballot, more splotches of blue appeared in the largely red region, as moderate Democrats with strong local ties won key races."

House GOP Boosts Contribution Levy. The Hill (9/26, Bolton) reports the "most endangered House Republican lawmakers have been asked by their leaders to give $75,000 to party coffers, significantly more than was asked of rank-and-file members two years ago, a sign of how desperate party leaders are to raise money when their individual donor receipts are down and lobbyists are increasing their contributions to Democrats." Rank-and-file Republicans "are being asked to give $75,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC): $25,000 or 50 percent more than they were supposed to give in the last election cycle." Committee chairmen have "been asked to give $200,000, or $50,000 (33 percent) more than last cycle, according to one chairman." Even lawmakers "who are fighting for their political lives, such as GOP Reps. Jim Gerlach (Pa.) and John Sweeney (N.Y.), have been asked to contribute $75,000 to party coffers." The increase "of individual giving targets is surprising because the overall fundraising goal for the program is the same as in 2004: around $18 million, according to a Republican who helped organize the effort last cycle."

Blue Dogs' PAC Raises $1 Million For First Time. The Hill (9/26, Hearn) reports, "Looking to shore up their influence in a more evenly divided House next year, conservative Blue Dog Democrats reached a fundraising milestone in August, raising more than $1 million for their PAC for the first time." The 37-member Blue Dog Coalition "has raised nearly $1.1 million for its PAC so far this election cycle and has doled out $600,000 in contributions, dwarfing the fundraising totals of other PACs associated with groups of lawmakers, according to figures recently filed with the Federal Election Commission." The 43-member New Democrat Coalition, "in contrast, raised only $490,000 in the same period." The Blue Dogs' "cohesion and visibility among House Democrats has contributed to their fundraising prowess. Most of the group's members are white, conservative Democrats and hail from red states. All share a desire to balance the budget." The group has "added cachet.

DOJ_NMG_0069585

With Democrats predicted to gain seats in November, many corporate PACs are looking to curry favor with Democrats, especially those who have been sympathetic to business interests."

Former Allen Acquaintances Say He Used Racist Slurs In 1970s And '80s. Sen. George Allen's campaign faces a new controversy over his alleged use of racial epithets while an undergraduate at the University of Virginia. The story was initially reported by Salon.com, but relied on only one named source, Dr. Ken Shelton. A subsequent New York Times report also named a second source. Salon.com (9/24, Scherer) reported, "Three former college football teammates of Sen. George Allen say that the Virginia Republican repeatedly used an inflammatory racial epithet and demonstrated racist attitudes toward blacks during the early 1970s." Dr. Ken Shelton, "a white radiologist in North Carolina who played tight end for the University of Virginia football team when Allen was quarterback," said, "Allen said he came to Virginia because he wanted to play football in a place where 'blacks knew their place.'" Salon continues to report that two other white teammates claimed Allen used a racial slur to describe African Americans.

The New York Times (9/26, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports, "Two former acquaintances of Senator George Allen said Monday that he used racist slurs in the 1970's and 1980's, a development that compounded accusations of racial insensitivity that have dogged his re-election campaign in Virginia." Christopher Taylor, who is white, "now an anthropology professor at the Birmingham campus of the University of Alabama, said he heard Mr. Allen use an epithet to describe African-Americans in the early 1980's." Separately, "Dr. Ken Shelton, who was a football teammate of the senator at the University of Virginia and who is also white, said that while in college in the early 1970's Mr. Allen often used the same racially charged term."

The AP (9/26, Lewis) reports Sen. Allen "denounced as 'ludicrously false' allegations from a former college football teammate that he frequently used a racial slur to refer to blacks in the early 1970s and that he once stuffed a severed deer head into a black household's mailbox." Allen's campaign "also released statements from four other ex-teammates defending the senator and rejecting Dr. Ken Shelton's claims." Meanwhile, Larry J. Sabato, "one of Virginia's most-quoted political science professors and a classmate of Allen's in the early 1970s, said in a televised interview Monday that Allen used the epithet." On MSNBC's Hardball, Sabato said, "I'm simply going to stay with what I know is the case and the fact is he did use the n-word, whether he's denying it or not." Sabato "would not say whether he had heard Allen say the word, and did not know whether it was true that Allen used the word frequently in college."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (9/26, Stallsmith) reports Allen "forcefully denied allegations that he used the n-word to describe black people while a football player at the University of Virginia more than 30 years ago." Speaking at a "news conference yesterday morning with mostly black pastors in support of the proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage in Virginia," Allen "denounced as 'completely false'" the Salon.com report."

The Washington Post (9/26, B1, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports Shelton "said Allen frequently used the 'N-word' to describe blacks and nicknamed him 'Wizard' because of the similarity of his name to that of Robert Shelton, a former imperial wizard of the Alabama Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. He also recounted an event from 1973 or 1974 in which he, Allen and a third friend were hunting deer. After the deer was killed, Shelton said, Allen cut off the doe's head, asked for directions to the home of the nearest black person and shoved the head into that person's mailbox." But Allen adviser Chris LaCivita "said that Taylor is lying and that 'this guy is not credible, period.' LaCivita said Taylor is a liberal activist." The Post adds Stuart Rothenberg, "an independent analyst who edits the Rothenberg Political Report, said the senator is caught in a media frenzy that threatens his campaign and his consideration of a possible run for president in 2008."

Panel Changes Hearing Date From Yom Kippur. Roll Call (9/26, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that it "looks as though" Sen. Allen "might be embracing his Jewish roots after all. The Senator long ago had scheduled a field hearing of the Senate Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee for Monday, Oct. 2, which is Yom Kippur. Last week, Allen moved the date to Oct. 3 to avoid conflict with the high holiday, according to the interest group involved in the hearing." Brynn Slate, spokeswoman for the National Association of Women Business Owners, said, "He's Jewish and Monday is Yom Kippur." Roll Call adds Allen spokesman David Snepp "said the date of the hearing, which will explore women-owned businesses vying for federal contracts, was changed at the request of the association. And technically, that's true."

Green Party Candidate Will Be Removed From Pennsylvania Senate Ballot. The Washington Post/AP (9/26, A10, Raffaele) reports Commonwealth Court Judge James R. Kelley "said Monday that he will remove the Green Party candidate for U.S. Senate from the November ballot because the party did not have enough valid signatures in its nominating petitions." Carl Romanelli's candidacy "had been challenged by state Democrats. Romanelli's bid was backed by Sen. Rick Santorum (R), who hoped that Romanelli could siphon votes from his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Robert P. Casey Jr." Judge Kelley "ruled that Romanelli, a railroad industry consultant from Wilkes-Barre, was 8,931 signatures shy of the 67,070 he needed to qualify as a minor-party candidate."

DOJ_NMG_0069586

Lieberman Calls For Expediting US Training Of Iraqi Forces. The New York Times (9/26, Medina, 1.21M) reports that in his "first major speech on Iraq since his loss in the primary election," Sen. Joseph Lieberman "called on Monday for the number of United States troops embedded with Iraqi forces to be doubled or tripled, to speed up the training of the Iraqis and help hasten the withdrawal of the Americans." In "a 40-minute speech at a Veterans of Foreign Wars post" in East Hampton, Lieberman, "who has been under attack for his support of the war, said that those troops could be added through redeployments, rather than by committing additional troops in the region." At the "same time, he called for increasing the overall size of the United States Army and Marine Corps, to better prepare for looming conflicts." Lieberman "attacked" Democratic nominee Ned Lamont, "portraying his rival's position on the withdrawal of American troops as 'giving up on Iraq.'"

Ehrlich Donor A Major Backer Of Controversial Road Project. The Washington Post (9/26, A1, Mosk, 748K) reports in a front page story that the "$4,000 checks started arriving in Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s reelection campaign treasury Jan. 2 from such obscure corporations as Freestate Owner LLC, Muirkirk, Chase Limited and President Street Associates." By Jan. 3, "there were seven of the checks, each from a company directly linked to developer Kingdon Gould III, a descendant of railroad barons who is one of Maryland's most prolific political donors and a vigorous booster for the intercounty connector. That same day, Ehrlich's transportation secretary signed off on a final study of the controversial highway, an 18-mile ribbon of asphalt that would extend east from Rockville to the gravel pits where Gould plans a massive commercial and residential development called Konterra." State officials said "they had no idea the checks were coming in as they were sending out the long-expected report. Ehrlich (R) said the contributions, and numerous others from Gould and his companies, were based on friendship and a shared belief that the road connecting Interstates 270 and 95 should be built and that Konterra should flourish."

Campaigns Rely On "Microtargeting" To Reach Voters. The Washington Post (9/26, A1, Cillizza, VandeHei, 748K) reports in a front page story that there is "no sexier topic in politics these days than 'microtargeting.' That's the new science (some say dark art) by which candidates use the latest data-mining technology to vacuum every last scrap of information about voters, then churn out custom-tailored messages designed to herd their supporters to the polls." In Ohio's 1st CD, Rep. Steve Chabot "and his Democratic challenger, Cincinnati City Council member John Cranley, have placed large bets that it will prove effective. Both candidates have spent months combing through voter lists to find 'drop-off' voters -- those who turn out in presidential election years but rarely in midterm contests. In a district as evenly divided as this one -- President Bush won it by just 3,000 votes in 2004 -- the party best equipped to find and persuade these individuals to turn out on Nov. 7 will probably end up on top." In the "past several elections, especially in Ohio, Republicans have won the ground game, building a vast and constantly growing network of potential voters identified less by their formal party affiliation than their church membership or magazine subscriptions."

Panel Recommends Course To Affordable Healthcare. The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) reports a federal advisory panel, the Citizens' Health Care Working Group, "said Monday that Congress should take immediate steps to guarantee that all Americans have access to affordable health care by 2012. As a first step, the 14-member panel, appointed by the comptroller general of the United States, said, 'A national public or private program must be established to ensure protection against very high out-of-pocket medical costs for everyone.'" The panel "said Congress should create an independent "public-private entity" to define a basic set of health care benefits and services for all Americans."

Obama's Household Income Soars In First Year In Senate. The Chicago Tribune (9/26, Dorning, 623K) reports Democratic Sen. Barak Obama's "first year in the Senate turned out to be prosperous not only for the newly elected senator but also his wife, according to information Obama released Monday from their joint 2005 tax return." Shortly after Obama "took office, his wife, Michelle, received a promotion from her employer, the not-for-profit University of Chicago Hospitals, nearly tripling her earnings to $316,962 from $121,910 the previous year." Sen. Obama "also reached a three-book deal worth $1.9 million with Random House shortly after his 2004 election, with the senator receiving $1.2 million in payments last year." Including Obama's "$154,047 Senate salary, the family earned $1.67 million last year, more than the family's combined income for the prior seven years, according to information provided by the senator's office."

Elizabeth Edwards' Book Focuses On Tragedy Of Son's Death. USA Today (9/26, Page, 2.27M) reports

DOJ_NMG_0069587

Elizabeth Edwards' discovery of "a lump in her breast during the campaign's final push" and her diagnosis "with cancer the day after the election — brought 65,000 e-mails from strangers and the promise of a book about how she coped with a national political campaign and a devastating personal diagnosis." But that is "not the book" Mrs. Edwards, the wife of 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards, "has written. Instead, the heart of Saving Graces is the story of surviving the central tragedy of her life: the death of her son, Wade, in 1996. At 16, he was killed on his way to the family's beach house when the wind flipped over his car." In "the aftermath of that, her account of undergoing chemotherapy, a lumpectomy and radiation — her prognosis is now good, she says — seems almost perfunctory. With Wade's death, she writes, 'we had all been through the worst life could deal us' already."

Judge Delays Ruling On Lawsuit Against Clintons. The Washington Times (9/26, Seper, 88K) reports California Superior Court Judge Aurelio Munoz "said he could not rule on a complaint filed by a Hollywood producer in a lawsuit accusing President Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of reneging on a multimillion-dollar Internet deal until a pending appeal in the case is settled." In April, Sen. Clinton "invoked a California law that protects candidates from being silenced by frivolous lawsuits during their election campaigns."

Superdome's Return Seen As Symbol Of Hope For New Orleans. ABC World News (9/25, story 7, 2:15, Gibson) reported the return of NFL football to the Louisiana Superdome as "a milestone for New Orleans." ESPN's Jeremy Shaap added, "Tonight, for a city that's been through so much, winning is neither everything nor the only thing. Tonight, clearly, is about healing." NBC Nightly News (9/25, story 10, 3:00, Savidge, 9.87M) reported, "No longer a symbol of the past, the Superdome has become a beacon for the future." On CBS Evening News (9/25, story 11, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M), Gov. Kathleen Blanco was shown saying the Superdome is "the symbol of rebirth and recovery."

EU, Iran Said To Be "Close" To Enrichment Suspension Deal. The Washington Times (9/26, Gertz, 88K) reports Iran "is close to an agreement that would include a suspension of uranium enrichment but wants the deal to include a provision that the temporary halt be kept secret." EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "has been working with Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani on the enrichment-suspension deal that could be completed this week." The enrichment suspension would last 90 days "so additional talks could be held with several European nations." The Times says Administration "officials are opposing the agreement as a further concession to Iran," but "some in the State Department are supporting the deal, which they view as a step toward achieving a complete halt to uranium enrichment." Other "officials said that keeping any suspension secret would be difficult and that it would drag the United States into further negotiations with Iran. … Also, any suspension of enrichment would require International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspections to verify that work has stopped at Iranian facilities. The inspections would likely be disclosed, exposing any secret arrangement with Iran on suspension." While Iranian leaders want to keep any suspension secret as "a face-saving measure," Administration "officials said President Bush is not happy with the secrecy demand" but "continues to support the use of diplomacy to solve the problem."

The AP (9/26, Lederer, Faramarzi) notes that, in its interview of Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, he said "that talks between top Iranian and European negotiators on his country's disputed nuclear program are 'on track' and could pave the way for a negotiated solution to the standoff." He cautioned "that Iran still believes there should be no conditions on the resumption of negotiations, implicitly rejecting demands that Tehran first suspend uranium enrichment." Mottaki "said Solana and Larijani will hold their third meeting 'very soon,' probably in Europe, though he did not have an exact date or location."

End To Iran Nuclear Impasse Said To Be "Squarely In Washington's Court." In a Wall Street Journal (9/26, A14, 2.03M) op-ed, American Foreign Policy Council Vice President for Policy Ilan Berman writes, "By now, it has become all too clear that when it comes to the Iranian nuclear crisis, the ball is squarely in Washington's court. Aug. 31 has come and gone, and with it the international deadline for Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment. Iran's ayatollahs, however, have shown no signs of curbing their atomic ambitions. … Sadly, international diplomacy so far has played directly into Iran's hands. In the best case, serious U.N. Security Council action will still take weeks or months to materialize, buying Iran's ayatollahs valuable time to forge ahead with their nuclear program. What's more, if and when they do eventually emerge, U.N. sanctions are guaranteed to be limited in scope, so as not to offend two of Iran's chief strategic partners, Russia and China. As such, they are not likely to offend Iran's ayatollahs much either."

Armitage Sees "Even Chance" Of North Korean Nuclear Test This Year. The Financial Times (9/26, Fifield) reports remarks by former Deputy Secretary Armitage in Seoul that Pyongyang "will probably test a nuclear weapon, with an even chance of doing so this year, as Kim Jong-il's regime tries to assert its defiance in the face of increasing international pressure." Armitage "is urging Washington to talk directly to Pyongyang to try and resolve the nuclear stand-off," and yesterday "estimated there was a 50 per cent chance of a test by the end of the year." The Times notes, "South Korean newspapers have for weeks been reporting rumours of preparations for a test."

DOJ_NMG_0069588

AFP (9/26) adds Armitage "said that North Korea may test a nuclear weapon by the end of this year, sparking 'huge international ramifications.'" He is quoted saying, "I think in their logic it's the next rational escalation point." He later said "he would expect" President Bush and Secretary Rice "to consult other countries involved in six-nation talks on North Korea, and simultaneously to take the issue to the United Nations."

Musharraf Memoir Discusses Khan's Activities. The New York Times (9/26, Sanger, 1.21M) reports, "President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan wrote in a memoir published Monday that he now believes that the equipment sent to North Korea several years ago by Pakistan's nuclear chief included some of Pakistan's most technologically advanced nuclear centrifuges. The assertion deepened the mystery about how much progress North Korea has made in what is often called its second, and very secret, nuclear program." Musharraf "has been promoting the new book, 'In the Line of Fire' (Free Press), everywhere from the East Room of the White House to appearances on the morning talk shows." In it, "he says for the first time that his suspicions about the activities of Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer who build an illicit nuclear network that also supplied Iran and Libya, dated from 1999. … The timing is significant, because it was not until more than three years later, in 2002, that the United States gathered solid evidence that North Korea was trying to enrich uranium."

The Washington Times (9/26, Sands, 88K) says the book "earned a unique televised endorsement from President Bush at his joint press conference with the general last week and generated a pre-release buzz that a publicist for a rival publishing house called 'priceless.'" Bush "made his semi-serious endorsement at a press briefing in which Gen. Musharraf deflected reporters' questions by saying he was pledged to New York publisher Simon & Schuster not to reveal details of the manuscript before yesterday's official release date."

Musharraf Will Promote Book On "The Daily Show." The New York Times (9/26, Kornblut, 1.21M) notes that tonight, Musharraf "is to go where no sitting leader of any nation -- certainly not Mr. Bush -- has gone before. He is to plug his new memoir, 'In the Line of Fire,' tonight on 'The Daily Show' on Comedy Central."

Olmert, Senior Saudi Official Said To Have Met. The New York Times (9/26, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "An Israeli newspaper reported Monday that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert held a secret meeting about 10 days ago with a senior Saudi Arabian official to discuss issues that included Iran's nuclear program and prospects for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. In response to the reports, Mr. Olmert and his aides said he did not meet with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. However, they declined to answer directly when asked if he met with any other senior Saudi leader." The Times adds, "If a meeting did take place, it would indicate a significant development for two countries that have never had diplomatic ties. Officials from Israel and Saudi Arabia have quietly shared intelligence information, but have never met publicly, said David Kimche, chief of the Israel Council on Foreign Relations."

The Washington Times/AP (9/26, Plushnick-Masti) says the Yediot report "described other officials as hinting that the talks were with a senior official close to the king. The Israeli daily Ha'aretz later reported that the meeting took place on Sept. 13, and Israel's Army Radio said the talks were held in the royal palace in Riyadh."

Hamas, Fatah Call Off Talks On Unity Government. The AP (9/26, Lavie) reports, "Rivals Hamas and Fatah called off top-level talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government that might ease crippling international sanctions, the latest indication of difficulties in bridging their ideological differences." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, the head of Fatah, "postponed his planned trip to the Gaza Strip for talks with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, and both sides said no new date has been set."

Court Rules Hamas Lawmakers Must Remain In Jail. The New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) reports, "An Israeli military appeals court in the West Bank on Monday reversed an earlier ruling and said that 18 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers would have to remain in jail pending trial. A military court on Sept. 12 ordered Israel to release the Hamas members," but "military prosecutors appealed. The men are charged with belonging to a terrorist organization. Aziz Dweik, the speaker of parliament and one of those being held, called the ruling a political decision."

Rice Says UNIFIL Has "Robust Mandate" To Act. The New York Times (9/26, Shanker, 1.21M) reports Secretary Rice "urged the peacekeeping mission in southern Lebanon yesterday to act on what she termed 'a very robust' mandate approved by the United Nations that grants international troops authority to challenge anyone who attempts to block their mission, and to use force if necessary." Rice is quoted saying UNSCR 1701 "says that anything and anyone who keeps them from fulfilling their responsibilities is to be challenged on that, and they even have the right to use force if they need to. That mandate was written in a very robust fashion." Rice "acknowledged, however, that 'it's always a matter of how it's interpreted.'" Rice "noted that the expanded UNIFIL mission was new and that it was not yet operating with the full number of desired troops. But she stressed that the peacekeepers 'certainly got the authority to do whatever they need to do to do their job.'" The Times says UNIFIL commanders believe UNSCR 1701 "places Lebanese sovereignty paramount — meaning they first must be authorized to take such actions by the Lebanese Army." The Times adds that "a goal of" UNSCR 1701 "was to increase the numbers and military punch of the international force in Lebanon, as well as to create the conditions for the Lebanese military to move into the south. Both operations are viewed as important to separate Israeli and Hezbollah forces, halt attacks and prevent Hezbollah from rearming."

DOJ_NMG_0069589

Bush Names CEOs To Lebanon Rebuilding Effort. The Wall Street Journal (9/26, A8, King, 2.03M) notes President Bush "tapped top officials at Cisco Systems Inc., Intel Corp. and two other companies to lead a private-sector rebuilding effort in Lebanon similar to ones the White House launched last year in Pakistan and Central America." Cisco Chief Executive John Chambers "led a presidential delegation to Beirut over the weekend that included Ray Irani, CEO of Occidental Petroleum Corp., and Yousif Ghafari, chairman of Ghafari Inc., an architecture, design and engineering company. Joining the team, but not the trip, is Intel Chairman Craig Barrett." The four men "chipped in $1 million of their own money to the new U.S.-Lebanon Partnership Fund, while Citibank and the federal Overseas Private Investment Corp. created a $120 million loan facility to offer financing for home repairs, small businesses and long-term mortgages. Cisco is proposing to invest about $10 million in projects in Lebanon, a sum that Mr. Chambers described as 'a rounding error in terms of our business.'"

Unexploded Bombs Litter Southern Lebanon. The Washington Post (9/26, A1, Shadid, 748K) reports on "the scourge of munitions from the cluster bombs now littering southern Lebanon, mostly American-made but some manufactured in Israel." They "will be a 'lasting legacy,' the United Nations has said. UN officials estimate that the Israeli military fired 90 percent of the bombs during the last 72 hours of the conflict, which began on July 12 after Hezbollah fighters seized two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid and ended with a cease-fire on Aug. 14. As many as 1 million of the bomblets are unexploded, they say, wounding or killing three people a day. The threat of stumbling across a bomblet has paralyzed life in parts of the south that depend on the harvest of tobacco and now-abandoned groves of bananas, olives and citrus."

UN Investigator Probing Identity Of Hariri Killers. The New York Times (9/26, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "The director of the United Nations commission investigating the killing of Rafik Hariri, the former prime minister of Lebanon, reported Monday that it had confirmed preliminary findings that the attack was the work of a suicide bomber but was still pursuing the identities of the participants in the highly organized plot." In "a largely technical 22-page report," Serge Brammertz, the prosecutor leading the inquiry, "said he had developed evidence from the crime scene about the bombing to a level suitable for presentation to a court and was intent on doing the same thing with evidence pointing to the conspirators." Brammertz "is scheduled to brief the Security Council on his report on Friday."

Bush Expected To Sign Darfur Sanctions Bill. The AP (9/26, Hananel) reports the US House of Representatives yesterday "approved a bill that would impose sanctions on the government of Sudan, as lawmakers warned that tougher action is needed to stem the death and suffering in that nation's Darfur region." HR3127, "passed by unanimous consent, authorizes sanctions against anyone President Bush determines is responsible for atrocities and war crimes in the conflict that has left more than 200,000 people dead and 2.5 million homeless since 2003. The Senate passed a nearly identical measure last week and is expected to endorse the House version this week, sending it to the president's desk for his signature." The bill includes asset blocking, travel bans and shipping restrictions, and asks Bush to "deny" Khartoum "oil revenues and access to military equipment." It further asks the UNSC to "suspend" Khartoum's "rights and privileges of membership in the U.N. until it agrees to halt attacks against its people."

The Washington Times (9/26, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that also, "in an early evening voice vote on a nonbinding resolution, the House urged President Bush to support humanitarian and peace efforts in the African nation." The Senate has already "unanimously agreed to the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act, paving the way, lawmakers said, for action in the genocide-stricken region."

Countries Begin Committing Troops To UN Darfur Force. AFP (9/26) notes the UN "secured its first pledges for a proposed major UN peacekeeping force for" Darfur. "But about 50 countries that attended a meeting of potential contributors…were also warned of the many problems that could face any force, including attacks by rebels opposed to a Darfur peace agreement and by Al-Qaeda." UN Undersecretary-General for Peacekeeping Jean-Marie Guehenno "said one European country and some developing countries, which he did not name, had offered several battalions for any UN force," while other officials "said Norway, Nigeria, Tanzania and Bangladesh were the first countries to offer troops. Nigeria and Tanzania already have troops in the AU force but they would increase their contingent."

Abe Will Become Japanese Premier Today. The AP (9/26, Talmadge) reports, "Five years after taking office for what many analysts had expected to be a short-lived term, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said good-bye to his followers Tuesday and prepared to turn over power to his protege and long-time spokesman, Shinzo Abe. The transition ends the tenure of one Japan's longest-serving and most popular prime ministers, a term that saw both a gradual recovery of the nation's economy and a rare infusion of lightheartedness." The AP says Koizumi leaves "a legacy of discord with neighbors China and South Korea over territorial disputes and his repeated visits to a memorial to Japan's fallen soldiers, including convicted World War II war criminals." He chose to use his final address to stress "the impact of his economic reform program and efforts to trim government spending."

DOJ_NMG_0069590

Hu Removes Scandal-Tainted Shanghai Leader. The Washington Post (9/26, A14, Fan, 748K) reports, "The Communist Party chief of Shanghai was fired Monday in the highest-level purge of a Chinese official in more than a decade. Analysts called the dismissal an effort by President Hu Jintao to make a bold statement against corruption and consolidate his power in advance of an important party congress." Chen Liangyu, who "also lost his seat on the country's ruling Politburo," is under investigation for helping to "loot the city's pension fund of hundreds of millions of dollars." The Wall Street Journal (9/26, Areddy, 2.03M) subtitles its reporting, "Beijing Pushes to Tighten Control, Consolidate Power Amid Corruption Scandal," while the New York Times (9/26, Kahn, 1.21M) titles its story, "Shanghai's Party Leader, Mistrusted By Hu, Is Purged."

Pope Meets With Representatives Of Muslim Nations. ABC World News (9/25, story 6, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "Overseas in Italy, an unprecedented gathering: Pope Benedict met envoys from 20 Muslim nations hoping to end anger over his use of a quote saying Islam was evil and inhuman. Benedict said there faiths must overcome differences and work to reject violence."

Somali City Turns Violent After Islamist Forces Move In. The New York Times (9/26, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports Kismayo, Somalia, one of the nation's largest cities, "fell to Islamic forces without a shot on Monday -- but then the trouble started. After the city's warlords fled and hundreds of Islamist fighters poured in, demonstrators took to the streets and hurled stones at the Islamists. Islamist troops responded with machine guns, opening fire on the demonstrators and killing at least one teenage boy."

Indonesian Christians Warily Watching For Response To Bali Bombers. The Washington Times (9/26, Foek, 88K) reports Indonesian Christians, "deeply troubled by the executions of three Christians last week, say they are watching closely to see whether the government will be equally firm in dealing with three Muslims facing the ultimate sanction for their roles in the 2002 Bali bombings. Unless Muslims and Christians are treated equally, they say, there could be a fresh outbreak of sectarian violence that claimed more than 1,000 lives on the island of Sulawesi between 1998 and 2002." The three men were executed for taking part in a "May 2000 attack on a Muslim school that left 191 persons dead." But Christians, "who make up about 8 percent of the population, say the courts have been less aggressive in prosecuting Muslims for similar attacks."

Bolton Critical Of Venezuelan Foreign Minister's Airport Complaint. The AP (9/25, Wadhams) reports UN Ambassador John Bolton "derided" Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro's "protest over being detained at a New York airport as 'street theater' and propaganda." Maduro said officials at JFK "tried to frisk and handcuff him" as he left the annual UN General Assembly session on Saturday. Screeners "grew suspicious when Maduro used cash to purchase a one-way ticket to Miami shortly before the flight was to leave, U.S. officials said."

EC Chief Says Bulgaria, Romania Will Be Last Two New EU Entrants For Now. The New York Times (9/26, Bilefsky, 1.21M) reports European Commission President José Manuel Barroso said Bulgaria and Romania will "receive qualified endorsement" to join the EU on January 1 today, but the EU "will warn that expansion must then halt until the organization makes needed structural changes." He said the admission of the two nations "was the last phase of integration in a European Union that has been stretched beyond capacity for now."

Kristof Examines Massive New African Park Plan. In his New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes from the Central African Republic about the "adjoining national parks that cover an area the size of Rhode Island and Delaware combined" that are being established by the CAR, Cameroon, and the Congo Republic. Many Africans "resent the parks, partly because they allocate vast resources to saving animals for rich foreigners to enjoy -- in regions where humans routinely die for lack of a few dollars." But "in the audacious dream to preserve this rain forest and the way of life of people in it, you see Africa's glory, fighting to survive."

Bangkok Writer Recounts Coup. In a New York Times (9/26, 1.21M) op-ed, Ismail Wolff, a freelance reporter based in Bangkok, writes about the coup in Thailand, saying that as the coup took place, "all the public TV stations, by now under the direction of the military, ran a statement from the army and police commanders. They had 'taken control of the situation in Bangkok' and politely asked for the public's cooperation. 'We apologize for any inconvenience,' it signed off. Typical Thai politeness, I thought. Is this really what a coup feels like? My shock, however, was not shared by the rest of the country. … As the rain battered down from the heavens and I sat under the canvas sharing khao tom and watching television with the smiling soldiers, I wondered whether they really would have shot someone if they were ordered to. I'm sure they would have. After all, that's what they're here to do."

DOJ_NMG_0069591

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Data Oon Homes Cause Jitters."
"A Rare Bloom Is Fading."
"Guantanamo's Uneasy Ramadan."
"Employers Chip Away at Retiree Health Benefits."
"Saints Make It 'Home Sweet Dome.'"
"In Pasadena, 'Smart Growth' Threatens Little Landmarks."

USA Today:
"Do Thin Models Warp Girls' Body Image."
"Rules In Effect Today."
"Liquids Not As Risky As First Feared."
"Pentagon Extends Iraq Combat Tours For 3,800 Soldiers."

New York Times:
"Tobacco Makers Lose Key Ruling On Latest Suits Tobacco Makers Lose Key Ruling On Latest Suits."
"Qaeda Operative, An Escapee In '05, Is Killed In Iraq."
"Stricter Voting Laws Carve Latest Partisan Divide."
"Europe Panel Faults Sifting Of Bank Data."
"Delivering Small-Town Justice With A Mix Of Trial And Error."
"Baseball's Oldest Old-Timer Opens A Window On The Past."
"Homes Post Price Drop For August."
"2 Ex-Acquaintances Of Senator Allen Say He Used Slurs."
"Shanghai's Party Leader, Mistrusted by Hu, Is Purged."
"U.S. Eases Rules On Gels And Liquids In Carry-Ons."
"Gunmen Kill Afghan Official Who Backed Women's Rights."
"Beyond Black And White: Stalking The Skunks Of Martha's Vineyard."

Washington Post:
"Detainee Measure To Have Fewer Restrictions."
"In Lebanon, A War's Lethal Harvest."
"Mayor Seeks Millions For Health Needs."
"U.S. Eases Carry-On Liquid Ban."
"Officers Reach Beyond Beat's Boundaries."
"Highway Backer A Steady Ehrlich Donor."
"Opening Mars's 'History A Battle Of Databases Book.'"

Washington Times:
"Iran Deal Could Halt Enrichment."
"Pope Reaches Out In Meeting With Muslim Envoys."
"Median Home Price Falls To $225,000."
"GOP's Uptick Just In Time For Election Day."
"Afghan Leader Slams Musharraf's Politics."
"BET Founder Opens Urban bank In District."

Detroit Free Press:
"Renault See Big Payoff In Alliance."
"Inside The Tigers."
"Some Liquids Now Ok In Carrry-On Luggage."
"Gene Therapy Frees Him From Grips Of Cancer."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"The Good Times Roll Call Again In September."
"Carry-On Security Relaxes."
"Panda Checkup: Girl!"
"Lower Energy Prices Cool Off Users' Wallets."
"Fox News ' Birthday Comes With CNN View."

Houston Chronicle:
"Ban On Carry On Liquids Relaxed."
"A Home Game Like No Other."
"Rice Left Stunned By Player's Death."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: More Troops Needed-Iraq; Rumsfeld Is Blamed For-Iraq; NIE Report; Fox News-Clinton Interview; Airline Security-New Rules; Benedict Meets Muslim Leaders; Superdome-Reopens; Global Warming; Light Cigarettes Case; Housing Market Cooling; Middle School's Low Scores; Trees Losing Leaves-Fall.
CBS: More Troops To Iraq; Back Door Draft; US Soldiers On Trial-Murder; Al Qaeda Leader Killed; Rocket Launched Crashed; Airline Security-New Rules; Gas Prices; Housing Market Cooling; Bionic Man; New Orleans Superdome; Douglas Brinkley Opinion; Global Warming-Positive Effects.
NBC: NIE Report; NIE Report Analysis; Fox News Clinton Interview; US Soldiers Charged With M; Airline Security-New Rules; California Wildfires; Capitol Visitor Center; Stock Market; Superdome Reopens.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: New Orleans-Superdome Reopens; Existing Home Sales; Bush-Cincinnati Trip; Iraq-NIE Leak.
CBS: New Orleans-Superdome reopens; Negroponte-Hill Testimony; Army-Iraq Tours Of Duty Extended; TSA-Carry On Liquids; Wall Street.
NPR: TSA-Carry On Liquids; Karzai Seeks US Help Closing Madrasas; Existing Home Sales; Wall Street; Canada-Air India Bombing Hearings; Japan-Abe To Be Confirmed As PM.

DOJ_NMG_0069592

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs S.2590 - Federal Funding Accountability and Transparency Act. Room 350, Eisenhower EOB; Meets with President Karzai of Afghanistan, Oval Office; holds joint press availability with President Karzai, East Room; attends an Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin Victory 2006 reception, private residence, Washington.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Joy Padgett for Congress reception, Granville Inn, Granville, Ohio; speaks at a Ray Meier for Congress reception. Hotel Utica, Utica, NY.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation and votes on nominations. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on combating child hunger. James Kunder, acting deputy administrator, USAID; CDC Administrator Julie Gerberding; George Ward, World Vision; James T. Morris, U.N. World Food Program; Ann Veneman, U.N. Children's Fund. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on illegal insider trading. Associatd Deputy Attorney General Ron Tenpas; Linda Thomsen, SEC; Robert Marchman, New York Stock Exchange; Christopher K. Thomas, Measuredmarkets Inc., Toronto; John Coffee, Columbia Law School; Jonathan R. Macey, Yale University; James Cox, Duke University. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on efforts to develop new Basel Capital Accords. FRB Governor Susan S. Bies; Sheila C. Bair, chairwoman, FDIC; John C. Dugan, comptroller of the currency; John M. Reich, director, Office of Thrift Supervision; Diana L. Taylor, superintendent of banks, New York State Banking Department. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nomination of Robert Howard to be Assistant VAD Secretary. Location: Room 418, Russell. Notes: Markup of the nomination following the first roll call vote after Noon in the Reception Room off the Senate floor.

10:45 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight of Government Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on pay-for-performance systems, especially for senior federal executives. OPM Director Linda Springer; Brenda Farrell, GAO; Carol Bonosaro, Senior Executives Association. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending judicial nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:15 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Votes on pending nominations. Location: Room S-116, Capitol.

2:30 p.m. FINANCE _ Subcommittee on Health Care. Hearing on the experience so far with health savings accounts. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal financial Management, Government Information and Internatiuonal Security Subcommittee. Hearing on uncollected taxes and issues of transparency in the tax code. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson; Russell George, inspector general for tax administration, Department of the Treasury; Nina Olsen, national taxpayer advocate, IRS; Jay Soled, Rutgers University; Stephen Entin, president and executive director, Institute for Research on the Economics of Taxation; Jason Furman, New York University. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

3:15 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION AND FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committees. Joint hearing on the International Polar Year. Buck Sharpton, University of Alaska Fairbanks Center for Research Services; Alan Parkinson,Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; Mead Treadwell, U.S. Arctic Research Commission; Robin Bell, Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory of Columbia University; Arden L. Bement Jr. National Science Foundation; Thomas Armstrong, U.S. Geological Survey. Location: Room 253. Russell.

3:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for morning hour and at 10 a.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (47 bills): 1) H.R. 4766 - Native American Languages Preservation Act of 2006; 2) H.R. 6138 - To temporarily extend the programs under the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes; 3) H. Res. 1009 - Supporting efforts to promote greater public awareness of effective runaway youth prevention programs and the need for safe and productive alternatives, resources, and supports for homeless youth and youth in other high-risk situations; 4) H.Res. 295 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives supporting the establishment of September as Campus Fire Safety Month, and for other purposes; 5) H.R. 6142 - Haitian Hemispheric Opportunity through Partnership Encouragement Act of 2006; 6) S. 3525 - Children and Family Services Improvement Act of 2006; 7) H.R. 6131 - To permit certain expenditures from the Leaking Underground Storage Tank Trust Fund; 8) H.R. 5637 - Nonadmitted and Reinsurance Reform Act of 2006; 9) H.R. 6062 - Community Development Investment Enhancements

DOJ_NMG_0069593

Act of 2006; 10) H.R. 6072 - Financial Services Regulatory Relief Amendments Act of 2006; 11) H.R. 4942 - Promoting Antiterrorism Capabilities Through International Cooperation Act; 12) H.R. 6116 - More Border Patrol Agents Now Act of 2006; 13) H.R. __ - Secure Border Initiative Financial Accountability Act of 2006; 14) H. Res. 1030 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that the United States Border Patrol is performing an invaluable service to the United States, and that the House of Representatives fully supports the more than 12,000 Border Patrol agents; 15) H. Con. Res. 473 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Gynecologic Cancer Awareness Month; 16) H. Res. 402 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Infant Mortality Awareness Month; 17) H. Res. 748 - Recognizing the 225th anniversary of the American and French victory at Yorktown, Virginia, during the Revolutionary War; 18) H. Res. 991 - Congratulating the Columbus Northern Little League Baseball Team from Columbus, Georgia, on its victory in the 2006 Little League World Series Championship games; 19) H.R. 5108 - Lance Corporal Robert A. Martinez Post Office Building Designation Act; 20) H.R. 6075 - Robert J. Thompson Post Office Building Designation Act; 21) H.R 6078 - Chuck Fortenberry Post Office Building Designation Act; 22) H. Res. 973 - Recognizing Financial Planning Week, recognizing the significant impact of sound financial planning on achieving life's goals, and honoring families and the financial planning profession for their adherence and dedication to the financial planning process; 23) H.R. 5989 - John J. Sinde Post Office Building Designation Act; 24) H.R. 5990 - Wallace W. Sykes Post Office Building Designation Act; 25) S. 3613 - Major George Quamo Post Office Building Designation Act; 26) S. 3187 - Richard L. Cevoli Post Office; 27) H. Res. 1016 - Encouraging all offices of the House of Representatives to hire disabled veterans; 28) H.R. 5313 - Open Space and Farmland Preservation Act; 29) H.R. 5103 - To provide for the conveyance of the former Konnarock Lutheran Girls School in Smyth County, Virginia, which is currently owned by the United States and administered by the Forest Service, to facilitate the restoration and reuse of the property, and for other purposes.

30) H.R. 4559 - To provide for the conveyance of certain National Forest System land to the towns of Laona and Wabeno, Wisconsin, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to convey certain isolated parcels of National Forest System land in Florence and Langlade Counties, Wisconsin, and for other purposes; 31) H.R. 1215 - Green Chemistry Research and Development Act of 2005; 32) H.R. 5074 - Railroad Retirement Technical Improvement Act of 2006; 33) H.R. 4981 - Dam Safety Act of 2006; 34) H.R. 6051 - John F. Seiberling Federal Building Designation Act; 35) H.R. 1556 - Clyde S. Cahill Memorial Park Designation Act; 3) H.R. 5546 - Carroll A. Campbell, Jr. Federal Courthouse Designation Act; 37) H.R. 5606 - William M. Steger Federal Building and United States Courthouse Designation Act; 38) H.R. 5026 - Andres Toro Building Designation Act; 39) H.R. 2322 - Kika de la Garza Federal Building Designation Act; 40) H.R. __ - National Institutes of Health Reform Act of 2006; 41) H.R. 5533 - Biodefense and Pandemic Vaccine and Drug Development Act of 2006; 42) H.R. 4377 - To extend the time required for construction of a hydroelectric project, and for other purposes; 43) H.R. 4417 - To provide for the reinstatement of a license for a certain Federal Energy Regulatory project; 44) S. 244 - A bill to extend the deadline for commencement of construction of a hydroelectric project in the State of Wyoming; 45) S. 176 - A bill to extend the deadline for commencement of construction of a hydroelectric project in the State of Alaska; 46) H.R. 971 - To extend the deadline for commencement of construction of certain hydroelectric projects in Connecticut, and for other purposes; 47) H.R. 5835 - Veterans Identity and Credit Security Act of 2006.

9 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Meets for morning business. At 10 a.m. meets for legislative business.

9:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Livestock and Horticulture Subcommittee. Hearing on federal farm policy affecting the speciality crop industry. Kevin Van Dyke, President, Skinner Nurseries, St. Augustine, Fla.; Phil Brumley, San Joaquin Farm Bureau Federation, Escalon, Calif.; Ervin Lineberger, Lineberger's Killdeer Farms, Kings Mountain, N.C.; Dean Okimoto, President, Hawaii Farm Bureau Federation; R. Jay Taylor, Chairman, Florida Fruit and Vegetable Association; Paul E. Dolan, III, President, Mendocino Wine Company, Ukiah, Calif.; Cynthia A. Brown, President, U.S. Dry Bean Council, Menomonie, Wis. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on sexual exploitation of children over the Internet. Anna Carol Salter, psychologist, Madison, Wis.; Andres Hernandez, Director, Bureau of Prisons' Sex Offender Treatment Program; Phillip Jenkins, Pennsylvania State University; Thomas Krawawecz, CEO, Blue Gravity Communications, Inc., Pennsauken, N.J.; Christine Jones, GoDaddy.com, Inc., Scottsdale, Ariz. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on how the FDA regulates the reprocessing of supposedly single-use devices. Dr. Daniel G. Schultz, FDA; Don Selvey, Ascent Healthcare Solutions, Inc.; Dennis J. Toussaint, SteriMed, Inc.; Stephen J. Ubl, Advanced Medical Technology Association. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Hearing on Homeland Security Department initiatives for 2007. Secretary Chertoff. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on human trafficking. UNICEF goodwill ambassador Ricky Martin; John Miller, State Department;

DOJ_NMG_0069594

Assistant HHS Secretary Wade Horn. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn. Notes: Media avaiability with Rep. Christopher Smith and Ricky Martin at 9:45 a.m., Room 2172, Rayburn. Event contact: Patrick Creamer, 202-225-3765.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Space and Aeronautics Subcommittee. Hearing on the National Academy of Sciences' plan for aeronautics. Lisa Porter, NASA; William Hoover, chairman of the NAS committee. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Select Revenue Measures Subcommittee. Hearing on tax reform proposals. Location: Room B-318, Rayburn.

11 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ 21st Century Competitiveness Subcommittee. Hearing on how the entertainment industry and higher education are working to combat Internet piracy. University of Maryland Chancellor William E. Kirwan; Dan Glickman, CEO, Motion Picture Association of America; Cary Sherman, president, Recording Industry Association of America; Cheryl Elzy, Illinois State University; William W. Fisher, Harvard Law School. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

1 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on current nuclear proliferation challenges. Hans Blix, Chairman, Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission; William Tobey, Energy Department; Andrew Semmel, State Department; Jack David, Defense Department; Gene Aloise, GAO; Amb. Thomas Graham, Jr. Global Security Institute; Baker Spring, Heritage Foundation; Jonathan Granoff, Global Security Institute; Henry Sokolski, Nonproliferation Policy Education Center; Frank von Hippel, International Panel on Fissile Materials. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

1 p.m. RESOURCES _ Water and Power Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

1 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the National Academy of Sciences icebreaker report. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on Defense Department alternative energy and energy efficiency programs. John Young, Director, Defense Research and Engineering, Department of Defense; Richard Connelly, Director, Defense Energy Support Center; Mike Aimone, Deputy Chief of Staff for Logistics, Installations and Mission Support; Phil Grone, Deputy Undersecretary of Defense for Installations and Environment. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on ``Editing Hollywood's Editors: Cleaning Flicks for Families." Bill Aho, CEO, ClearPlay Inc., Salt Lake City; Allan L. Erb, President, Clean Flicks, Pleasant Grove, Utah; John Feehery, Motion Picture Association of America; Robin Bronk, The Creative Coalition; Jason Schultz, Electronic Frontier Foundation, San Francisco Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Regulatory Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on H.R. 5242 - Small Business Paperwork Amnesty Act. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

3 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to set rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT MUSHARRAF _ Highlights: No public schedule.

AFGHAN PRESIDENT HAMID KARZAI _ Highlights: 10:20 a.m. Meets with President Bush. Oval Office. 11:40 a.m. Holds joint media availability with President Bush. East Room. 3:30 p.m. Speaks at George Washington University on economic development, with Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW. Note: By invitation and credentialed media only. Media checkin at 1 p.m. Cameras in place by 2 p.m. RSVP required. Event contact: Adela de la Torre, 202-994-6424.

IRAQI PRESIDENT JALAL TALABANI _ Highlights: 10:45 a.m. Meets with Senate Majority Leader Sen. Bill Frist. Alcove, across from the old Senate Chamber. Setup at 10:25 a.m. 2:30 p.m. Speaks at the Wilson International Center for Scholars. 6th floor auditorium, Wilson Center, Reagan Trade Bjuilding. Event contact: Sharon McCarter, 2026914016. Note: RSVP required by 4 p.m. Sept. 25.

GREEK FOREIGN MINISTER DORA BAKOYANNIS _ Highlights: 10:30 a.m. Meets with Sen. Hillary Clinton. Room 476, Russell. 12 p.m. Addresses the Center for Strategic and International Studies. JW Marriott Hotel, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. 3 p.m. Meets with Sen. Chuck Hagel. Room 248, Russell. 5 p.m. Inauguration ceremony for the new chancery of the Greek Embassy. 2217 Massachusetts Ave. NW. 6 p.m. Meets with the House International Relations Committee. Room 2172, Rayburn.

FIREPOWER 2006 _ Institute for Defense and Government Advancement holds Firepower 2006, focusing on the newest weapons and equipment, as well as the future of munitions. Highlights: 11:10 a.m. Appropriations Overview, with Col. Michael Waclawski, Chief, Army Congressional Budget Liaison. Location: Hilton Washington/Silver Spring, 8727 Colesville Road, Silver Spring, Md.

HEALTH INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY _ The eHealth Initiative and Bridges to Excellence co-sponsor the Third Annual (HIT) Health Information Technology Summit for national, regional and state healthcare decision makers, who will consider emerging policy changes related to both quality and HIT emerging from the Administration, Congress, the 50 states, and the private sector. Highlights: 8 a.m. Opening Remarks by Janet M. Marchibroda, Chief Executive Officer eHealth Initiative and Foundation. 9 a.m. Keynote Address by HHS Secretary Michael O. Leavitt. 9:30 a.m. Keynote Presentation by Bill McInturff, Partner and Co-Founder, Public Opinion Strategies; Mark S. Mellman, President and Chief Executive Officer, The Mellman Group. 10:15 a.m. Congressional Health Information Technology Policy Panel with Katy Barr, Professional Staff Member, Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions; others. 1:15 p.m. Concurrent sessions on Federal Administration, other topics. Location: Renaissance Washington Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0069595

FRANCHISE DAY _ The International Franchise Association holds its 2006 Franchise Appreciation Day. Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Rep. Tom Tancredo. 10:10 a.m. Secretary of Commerce Gutierrez. 10:45 a.m. SBA Administrator Steven Preston. 11:45 a.m. Rep. Mel Watt.. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE _ 8 a.m. - 4:30 p.m. The Joint Military Intelligence College holds a conference, ``Science and Technology Equals Intelligence on Target." Highlights: Location: Defense Intelligence Analysis Center, Bolling AFB.

ALBRIGHT _ 8:30 a.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record program with former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

EMPLOYER HEALTH PLANS _ 10 a.m. The Kaiser Family Foundation and the Health Research and Educational Trust hold a media briefing and conference call to release the 2006 Employer Health Benefits Survey. This survey is an in-depth look at trends in health insurance costs and coverage in the workplace. Location: The 9th Floor Conference Room, Kaiser Family Foundation Offices, 1330 G St. NW.

HIV TESTING _ 10 a.m. The National Minority Health Month Foundation, others, hold a telephone briefing to announce an HIV testing campaign and to discuss HIV testing recommendations recently announced by the Centers for Disease Control. Contacts: Hillary Maxwell, 202-572-6205. Notes: Callin number: 800-967-7138; passcode: 1468235.

IRAN-RELIGION _ 10 a.m. Evangelical Christian, Jewish and Muslim religious leaders hold a telephone briefing to call on Congress to use its oversight authority to prevent a preemptive strike on Iran. Contacts: Trevor FitzGibbon, 202-246-5303. Notes: Callin number: 800-795-1259; passcode: Talk to Iran.

MODERN FAMILIES _ 10 a.m. The National Center for Policy Analysis and the National Press Club hold a panel discussion, ``Modern Families: Outdated Laws," with former White House press secretary Dee Dee Myers, Wall Street Journal editorial writer Kim Strassel, author Leslie Morgan Steiner, Lyric Winik of Parade magazine, and Karen Czarnecki of the Labor Department. Location: National Press club.

NATIONAL SECURITY _ 10 a.m. News conference to launch a new progressive national security organization, the National Security Network, with Rand Beers, president and Les Gelb, advisory board chairman, Rep. Jane Harman, and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Location: National Press Club.

TERRORISM INSURANCE _ 10 a.m. The Coalition to Insure Against Terrorism holds a briefing with policyholders and insurers to give an update on the state of the terrorism risk insurance market. Location: National Association of Real Estate Investment Trusts, Suite 600, 1875 ``Eye" St. NW.

VISA WAIVERS _ 10 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, ambassadors from the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Slovak Republic hold a news conference on visa waivers. Location: Cannon Terrace.

IMMIGRATION _ 10:15 a.m. Senators John McCain , Ted Kennedy, Lindsey Graham, and Ken Salazar will be joined by other senators and religious leaders at a press conference to discuss the status of comprehensive immigration reform and the what they say is the need to finalize legislation in this Congress. Location: Room SR-485, Russell Senate Office Building.

BOEHNER _ 10:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner hold a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

PEACE-IRAQ _ 10:30 a.m. Interfaith ceremony, procession and nonviolent civil disobedience action organized by the National Campaign for Nonviolent Resistance. Location: Upper Senate Park.

IMMIGRATION _ 11 a.m. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison and Rep. Mike Pence discuss their immigration polan at a briefing hosted by former House Majority Leader Richard Armey. Location: Room SC-4, Capitol.

LEBANON-HARIRI _ 11 a.m. The Middle East Institute holds a program with Lebanese member of Parliament Jawad Boulous discussing the UN report on the Hariri assassination. Location: 1761 N St. NW.

RETIREMENT ASSETS _ 11 a.m. Labor Secretary Chao holds a telephone briefing to announce proposed rules on default investment options that will make it easier for fiducaries of 401(k) plans, others to adopt automatic enrollment design features. Contacts: Gloria Della, 202-693-8664.

CHINA TRADE _ 11:30 a.m. Senators Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham meet with Treasury Secretary Hank discuss China trade policy and their bill that they say will level the playing field. Location: Room 313, Hart Senate Office Building.

PORTMAN _ 12 p.m. OMB Director Rob Portman speaks to a luncheon of the IBM Center for the Business of Government and the National Academy of Public Administration about the administration's emphasis on performance and results. Location: Ballroom, Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0069596

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

SPELLINGS-HIGHER EDUCATION _ 12:30 p.m. Education Secretary Maragret Spellings announces her plans to make the U.S. higher education system more affordable, accessible and consumer-friendly, based on the recommendations in the final report of the Commission on the Future of Higher Education. Location: National Press Club.

NEPAL-POLITICS _ 2 p.m. Nepalese Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister K.P. Sharma Oli addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Topic: ``Political Developments in Nepal and the Peace Process with the Maoists. Location: National Press Club.

POLITICS-RELIGION _ 2 p.m. Brookings Institution holds a briefing on America's polarized politics, with Alan Wolfe of Boston College and Karlyn Bowman of AEI. Location: 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAQ COSTS _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., hosts a Congressional Forum examining the financial, military, and opportunity costs of the occupation of Iraq. Woolsey will be joined by colleagues in the House, as well as two sets of panelists who will address the different aspects of the costs associated with the continued occupation. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

ENDANGERED SPECIES _ 2:15 p.m. Interior Secretary Kempthorne holds a telephone briefing to announce $67 million in grants to conserve habitat for threatened or endangered species. Contacts: Hugh Vickery, 202-501-4633. Notes: Callin number: 888-282-1673; passcode: DOI.

ENERGY-INDONESIA _ 3 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman meets with Indonesian Energy Minister Purnomo to discuss energy issues of mutual interest and energy security. Closed press. Location: Energy Department.

LEVIN _ 4:30 p.m. The University of Illinois' Institute of Government and Public Affairs presents its 2006 Paul Douglas Ethics in Government Award to Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich. Location: Madison Building, Library of Congress.

CHENEY PROTEST-TORTURE _ 5 p.m. - 6:30 p.m. Washington Region Religious Campaign Against Torture holds one in series of vigils outside Vice President Cheney's house. They're pushing for the Administration and Congress to support the Geneva Conventions and anti-torture policies. Location: Mass. Ave and 34th St. NW.

RELIGIUOUS-TORTURE _ 5 p.m. - 6:30 p.m. Faith leaders and church members from different denominations participate in a vigil on Massachusetts Avenue outside Vice President Cheney's house. They will be demonstrating to urge the Administration and Congress to support the Geneva Conventions and against the torture policies and practices of the last four years. Location: Outside the Vice Presidents House at Massachusetts Avenue and 34th Street NW.

FRANCE-US _ 5 p.m. Former French Amb. Jacques Andeani discusses French and U.S. studies approaches to international crisis, sponsored by the School of Advanced International Studies. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PARTISAN POLITICS _ 6:30 p.m. Panel discussion on ``How Partisan is too Partisan'' in politics, sponsored by Pajamasmedia.com, with Michael Barone of US News and World Report, Paul Mirengoff of Powerline Blog, Tom Bevan of Real Clear Politics, others. Location: National Press Club.

WOMEN BROADCASTERS _ 6:30 p.m. The 2006 Alice Award, named after Alice Paul, the founder of the historic National Womans Party, will be presented to a group of nationally recognized women broadcasters. This years prestigious award goes to the women of NPR, including Cokie Roberts, Susan Stamberg, Nina Totenberg and Linda Wertheimer. Location: Sewall-Belmont House and Museum, 144 Constitution Ave. NE.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, September 27, 2006 8:17 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, September 27, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060927.pdf; agnb060927.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Detainee Measure Likely To Pass, But Eavesdropping Action Looks Unlikely....3
EU To Investigate Belgian Firm's Data-Sharing With US....4
US Makes Adjustments At Guantanamo For Ramadan....4

Homeland Response:

US Will Not Appeal Ruling On DHS Labor Rules....5
Chertoff, Democrats Spar Over 100% Screening At Foreign Ports....5
New Carry-On Rules Cause Some Confusion, Delays....6

War News:

Bush Declassifies Portion Of NIE, Calls War Critics "Naïve."....6
Gonzales Says DOJ To Follow "Standard Procedure" On NIE Leak....9
Bush Will Try To Mediate Between Karzai, Musharraf At White House Dinner....9
Suicide Bomber Kills 18 In Afghanistan....10
Five People Killed In Baghdad As Violence Continues....10
Poll Finds Most Iraqis Want Immediate US Withdrawal....11
Saddam Removed From Courtroom....11
Oil-For-Food Inquiry Finds Australian Wheat Exporter Was Warned....11
West Point Buries First Female Graduate To Die In Iraq....11

Corporate Scandals:

Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Prison....11
Ebbers Reports To Prison....13
Attorneys To Discuss Scrushy Request For A New Trial....13
Jenkins Says H-P Scandal Is "Devoid Of Larger Meaning."....13
Options Probes Hit Investors In Bottom Line....14

Criminal Law:

Plame Probe Has Cost $1.4 Million So Far....14
Gotti Jurors Tell Judge They Are Deadlocked....14
Senate To Cooperate With DOJ On Probe Of Former FDA Head....15
Former Westinghouse Electric Nuclear Engineer Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges....15
Stevens Reveals FBI Made Second Search Of Alaska Office 16
Judge Sentences Ailing Gambino Capo To 12 Years In Prison....16
Lawmakers Seek Data Retention By Web Hosts....16
Police Seize Electronics From Home Where DC Attorney Was Killed....17
SCOTUS To Consider Appeal In Arizona Death Penalty Case....17
Biker Brawlers Go On Trial In Law Vegas....17
Many Business Web Sites Vulnerable To Cyber Crime....17
US Seeks Death Penalty For Two In DC Drug Conspiracy....18
Gambling Companies Warned Not To Accept Bets In Louisiana....18
Conspiracy Trial Begins For Two Alleged MS-13 Members.18
Murders Of Three Teens Raises Alarms Across DC....19
Thieves Killed Cutting Into Power Lines For Copper....19
Philadelphia Man Charged With Defrauding Victim-Assistance Program....19
Seven In Three States Indicted On Katrina Aid Fraud Charges....19
Paper Executive Sentenced To 15 Years In Prison For $300-Million Fraud....19
New York Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Prison For Investment Fraud....20
New York's Local Courts Survive Despite A Century Of Criticism....20
Officials Use Forensic Techniques To Diagnose Elder Abuse....20
Internet Revives Land Scams....20
"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Enters Guilty Plea....21
Tennessee Man Sentenced For Removing Classified Data..21
Resolution Of San Diego Pension Fund Scandal Criticized..21

Civil Law:

High Court To Rule On Use Of Union Dues For Political Activity 21
LATimes Criticizes Class Action Light Cigarette Lawsuit 22

Civil Rights:

Rohrabacher Asks For DOJ Probe Of Border Agents' Prosecution 22
Boston Police Officer Charged With Violating Civil Rights Of Prostitute 22
Missouri Ice Cream Company Managers Indicted On Human Trafficking Charges 22
Cambodia Cracks Down On Child Sex Trade 23
Racist Graffiti Forces Charles County To Confront Race Relations Problem 23
Judge Says Louisiana Parish Schools On Target For Release From Federal Oversight 23
House Passes Parental Notification Bill 23
House Approves Bill On Religious Lawsuits 24
Texas Court Case Tests Limits Of Legal Intervention In Church Affairs 24

Antitrust:

Wright Bill Backers Press For Compromise 25
Johnson & Johnson Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Deal 25
Judge Dismisses Part Of AMD's Claim Against Intel 26
DeCode Genetics Sues Former Employees For Stealing Trade Secrets 26
Think Tank Director Says Microsoft Can't Be Guilty Of A Crime Before It Commits It 26
FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Regent Radio Station Buy 26
Kroes Claims US Lobbied Her Over Microsoft Fine 26
New Jersey MLS Withdraws Display Policy 27

Environment:

Judge Allows California Auto Emissions Suit To Proceed 27
NOAA Researchers Accuse White House Of Blocking Warming Report 27
Seattle Law Firm Represents 76 Clients In Tainted Spinach Lawsuits 27
Ohio Town Has Been A Test Lab On Air Pollution Since 1970's 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Cali Cartel Leaders Get 30-Year Prison Sentences 28
Pakistani Man Gets 18-Year Sentence In Drugs-For-Weapons Scheme 30
Beheadings Seen As Mexican Drug Cartels' New Method Of Intimidation 30
Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team 30
House Approves New Gun Show Rules 30
ATF Seeks Creation Of Gang Field Office In Seattle Area 30

Immigration:

High Court To Consider California Immigrant Car Theft Case 31
Fort Bragg ID Sweep Nets 28 Detentions 31
Judge Orders Deportation Of Three Egyptian Students 31
McCain Says He Is Inclined To Vote For Narrower Immigration Bill 32

Tax:

Rangel Says Eliminating Tax Cuts Is On Table 33

Congress-Administration:

Congress Poised To Approve $448 Billion Defense Budget ..33
Senate Democrats Seek To Block GOP Legislative Priorities33
Bush Signs Bill Creating Online Database Of Federal Spending 34
Johanns Says Bush Administration Wants Say In Next Farm Bill 34
Spellings Outlines Higher Education Reforms 34
Swagel Nominated To Be Assistant Treasury Secretary 35
GAO Criticizes DOD Travel Booking System 35
Cheney's Helicopter Left Sitting On Tarmac As Bush's Takes Off First 35
Website Publishing Congressional Aide Salary Information ...35
O'Connor Criticizes Atmosphere Of Judicial Intimidation 35
Congress Urged To Pass Bill Aiding Disadvantaged Youth 36

Other News:

Consumer Confidence Up 36
Hillary Clinton Defends Husband's Fox Interview Performance 37
Midterm Election Ads Seen As "Most Toxic" In Memory 38
Some Conservatives Prefer Democratic Congressional Majority 38
Marriage "Gap" Could Play Role In House Elections 38
Cheney Attends His 100th Fundraiser Of Midterm Cycle 39
Democrats Seek Lobbyist Contributions 39
Challenger Seeks Investigation Of Murtha's Links To Lobbying Firms 39
Third Acquaintance Claims Allen Used Racist Slur 39
Steele Quickly Responds To First Negative DSCC Ad 40

DOJ_NMG_0069600

Chafee Criticized For Supporting GOP Leaders 41
RNC Devoting One-Third Of Fall Ad Budget To Three Senate Races 41
NRCC Wades Into MN6 To Bash Wetterling 41
Padgett Gets Welcome Boost From First Lady In OH18 41
Hospital Officials Defend Salary Increase For Obama's Wife 42
Democrats Propose Reimbursing States For Backup Paper Ballots 42
Ensign To Chair NRSC 42
Richardson Hints At 2008 Campaign 43
Bass Aide Resigns After Posing As Liberal Blogger 43
Iraq War Protesters Arrested At Hart Senate Building 43
Justices To Examine Links Between Credit Ratings, Insurance Rates 43
Surveys Find Health Premiums Rising Twice As Fast As Inflation 44
WSJournal Celebrates Possible South Carolina Move Toward School Choice 44
Russia Will Begin Nuclear Fuel Shipments To Iran In March 44
Rice Eyes Trip To Northeast Asia, Says Pyongyang's Time Running Out 45
IDF Expects To Withdraw From Lebanon Before Sunday 45
Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact 45
Korean Seen As Leading Candidate To Replace Annan 45
Japan To Continue Push For Permanent UNSC Seat 46
Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team 46
In Labor Address, Blair Does Not Clarify Departure Date 46
Senate Vote On China Tariffs May Be Delayed 47
German Opera House Cancels Mozart Opera That Could Be Offensive To Muslims 47
Bulgaria, Romania Will Join EU 48
Photographer Chronicles Darfur Genocide 48
Many Cubans Say They Haven't Seen US' Anti-Castro Broadcasts 48
Estranged Couple Face In Battle For Brazilian Congressional Seat 48
Freidman Says Bush Has Done Nothing To Stop "Petro-Authoritarianism." 49
Links To Kazakhstan Called US' Most Promising Relations With Muslim World 49
NYTimes Says Abe Should Men Japan's Relations With China 49

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 49

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 50

TERRORISM NEWS:

Detainee Measure Likely To Pass, But Eavesdropping Action Looks Unlikely. The New York Times (9/27, Hulse, Zernike, 1.21M) reports Congress "was headed toward a split decision on President Bush's pre-election national security agenda, moving closer to passage of legislation on the handling of terrorism suspects while all but giving up hope of agreeing on a final bill to authorize the administration's eavesdropping program. Lawmakers in both the House and Senate said it now appeared doubtful that bills covering the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program could pass both houses and be reconciled before Congress adjourns this weekend, an outcome that would deny Republicans one of the main achievements they hoped to take into the election." CQ (9/26, Starks) reports Democrats said the NIE offered "evidence that Iraq has been a distracting and dangerous misadventure." The Washington Post (9/27, A4, Weisman, Leonnig, 748K) reports congressional Democrats said that, after November, "without the political pressure of a looming election and with a strengthened hand coming in the next Congress, Senate Democrats would probably filibuster Republican wiretapping legislation this year."

The Washington Post (9/27, A4, Smith, Babington, 748K) reports National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and Republican senators met Tuesday to continue negotiations over military trials of terrorism suspects, but "they did not resolve a dispute over whether the captives should have access to U.S. courts." The Post says the "complex measure…nonetheless appears likely to win approval by the time Congress adjourns at the end of this week. A vote is expected in the House today on a version of the legislation that the White House supports. It was unclear yesterday evening whether Republican leaders would allow any amendments to it." The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Chaddock, 58K) says Congress is "rushing to pass new legislation" on how to bring detainees "to trial -- or not. It's the 'not' -- President Bush's claim that any 'enemy combatant' can be detained indefinitely, without access to US courts -- that is the last obstacle to finishing a bill this week."

DOJ_NMG_0069601

More Commentary. The Washington Post (9/27, A26, 748K) editorializes, "What's important is that any legal system approved by Congress pass the tests set by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) months ago: that the United States can be proud of it, that the world will see it as fair and humane, and that the Supreme Court can uphold it. … White House pressure may have persuaded many in Congress that the easiest course is to quickly approve the detention bill in its present form and leave town. If so, their actions almost surely will come back to haunt them. Until this country adopts a legal system for the war on terrorism that meets Mr. Warner's standard, the war itself will be unwinnable."

Human rights advocate Natan Sharansky appeared in the CBS Evening News (9/26, story 9, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) "Free Speech" segment, saying, "After nine years in the Soviet gulag, and 400 days in the cells, I know that sleep deprivation, exposure to cold, are forms of torture. Maintaining our principles in the face of terror is sometimes dangerous. Abandoning those principles would be even more dangerous. Still, I'm deeply concerned that some of those who insist that America not see the moral high ground don't recognize that America stands on the moral high ground. Those who abused at Abu Ghraib or Guantanamo Bay, accuse America of being no different than the Soviet Union or Saddam's regime have lost all sense of moral clarity. America is different because your citizens can protest without going to prison. America is different because your courts can defend rights, and your press can expose injustice. America is different because your Congress can hold hearings, and because your people can hold your leaders accountable. America is different because America is free. In standing up against torture, I hope that all Americans will remember the profound moral divide that separates the free world from the world of fear and work to advance a broad, the very principles you so rightly cherish at home."

In a USA Today (9/27, 13A, 2.27M) op-ed, Nat Hentoff, author of "The War on the Bill of Rights and the Gathering Resistance," writes, "The Constitution is being undermined, and the world still can't be assured that prisoners held by the U.S. are being humanely treated. So where are the winners? … Despite all the purported obeisance to the Geneva Conventions in this agreement that ended the McCain-Warner-Graham mutiny, there will be no way for Americans or the world to know whether these 'enemy combatants' -- many of whom might be innocent -- have been subjected to the same outrages upon personal dignity that this epic struggle by the three senators presumably prevents."

EU To Investigate Belgian Firm's Data-Sharing With US. The AP (9/26, Brand) reports the EU will investigate allegations that the Belgian company SWIFT's "sharing of confidential banking records with U.S. authorities for anti-terror probes could have violated EU laws." EU data protection officers said the "problem raised 'immediate concerns about the lack of transparency which has surrounded' a secret transfer deal between the U.S. Treasury" and SWIFT. The New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) reports EU spokesman Friso Roscam Abbing said the officials "would meet again in November and would then issue an opinion."

Bush Exchange With Reporter Over EU Counterterror Spokesman Recounted. In a "Verbatim" item, the Washington Post (9/27, A25, 748K) details the exchange at Tuesday's news conference between President Bush and al-Arabiya's Nadia Bilbassy-Charters, who asked Bush about comments by EU "counterterrorism chief European spokesman who said today that the international support for terrorism has receded. Do you agree with that?" Bush: "First of all, I didn't -- what was this person a spokesman for?" Bilbassy-Charters: "Counterterrorism chief in Europe." Bush: "Some obscure spokesman?" Bilbassy-Charters: "No, actually, he has a name." Bush: "Okay, he's a got a name. Well, no, I don't agree with the spokesman for the obscure organization that said that the international commitment to fighting terror is declining."

US Makes Adjustments At Guantanamo For Ramadan. The AP (9/27, Melia) reports, "Muslim detainees at Guantanamo Bay entered Ramadan with traditional sweets, dates and honey — but without a military chaplain to lead them in prayer during Islam's holy month." The AP continues, "Nearly all the alleged al-Qaida and Taliban members held at the detention center in Cuba are observing Ramadan, officials said Tuesday. Meals are offered before dawn and after sunset to accommodate their fasting during daylight hours. … The adjustments for Ramadan, which began Saturday, come as the U.S. prison faces accusations of religious insensitivity." The AP adds, "A court challenge seeking the return of a full-time Muslim chaplain to the base has been filed by one detainee's attorney, who said that regular religious services would help 'preserve the sanity' of the detainees. … 'I think it would preserve order and discourage these suicides that are happening there,' attorney Gaillard Hunt said. … A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the motion, citing ongoing litigation."

DOJ_NMG_0069602

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Will Not Appeal Ruling On DHS Labor Rules. Government Executive (9/27, Rutzick) reports, "Government officials on Monday night passed up their last chance to seek reversal of a court decision blocking proposed labor relations reforms at the Homeland Security Department." GE continues, "The solicitor general's office, which brings cases to the Supreme Court on behalf of government agencies, let a midnight deadline pass without filing an appeal at the high court. … 'We're OK with that because it allows the department to move forward in implementing our labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in the litigation process,' said Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman." GE adds, "In June, an appeals panel unanimously upheld, and even broadened, an earlier ruling that the proposed system would illegally curtail collective bargaining rights for employees by giving management the ability to cancel negotiated agreements. DHS and Justice Department officials in August decided against challenging that decision before the full appellate court, but left open the option for a Supreme Court appeal. … A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on why the solicitor general chose not to pursue the Supreme Court appeal."

Federal Computer Week (9/27, Chan) reports, "The decision allows the agency to move forward to 'pursue labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in litigation,' Orluskie said. … 'If we go to the Supreme Court, we'd go on and on and on,' he said. 'What we're going to do is engage with our other partners, with the components, OPM, sit down with the unions and consider all available options.'"

The Federal Times (9/27, Kauffman) reports, "The government had until midnight Sept. 25 to appeal the case to the Supreme Court. … The focus now will shift to figuring out how to proceed from here, Orluskie said, adding that Homeland Security soon will meet with officials from inside the department, the Office of Personnel Management and the unions to begin those discussions." The Times adds, "The June 27 decision from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit invalidated changes the department had proposed making to the Title 5 rules governing collective bargaining, labor management procedures, and employee appeals of disciplinary actions. … The department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the reformed personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors will convert on Oct. 1, Orluskie said."

The Washington Post (9/27, D04, Barr) reports, "Administration officials declined to discuss what Clement's decision means for the Defense Department, which also has been stopped by a federal court from trying to curb union rights as part of the new National Security Personnel System. The Pentagon has appealed the court ruling, but Mark Roth , general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, said that the Defense Department 'would be smart to end this now.'" The Post adds, "Four years ago, Congress gave the Homeland Security Department a green light to overhaul how it pays, promotes and disciplines about 110,000 employees as part of the larger reorganization to strengthen homeland security and fight terrorism. But the rollout of the new system was slowed by legal setbacks in the past two years, and the department no longer has "a hard timeline," as one official put it, for completing the new personnel system. … About 4,000 supervisors and nonunion employees at Homeland Security headquarters, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center have been placed under a new performance-management system. An additional 6,700 managers and supervisors at Citizenship and Immigration Services and Customs and Border Protection will convert to the new performance system next month."

Chertoff, Democrats Spar Over 100% Screening At Foreign Ports. The Washington Times (9/27, Hudson, 88K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "sparred" with Democratic members of the House Homeland Security Committee yesterday "over the feasibility of scanning cargo for nuclear materials at foreign ports before ships depart for the United States." Chertoff said "that total screening is unrealistic and that other measures are being implemented to protect US ports from such terrorist threats." Rep. Peter A. DeFazio argued that the US could refuse the entry of cargo from countries unwilling to have containers screened at their ports and "proposed a three-year period to implement such a strategy, but Mr. Chertoff balked and called it an 'artificial deadline' that would be 'as unrealistic as passing a law that says in three years cancer has to be cured.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069603

New Carry-On Rules Cause Some Confusion, Delays. In an article appearing on at least 56 news websites, the AP (9/26, Yee) reported, "Happy that new security rules have cleared their liquids and gels for takeoff, air travelers presented small, clear plastic bags filled with toiletries for inspection Tuesday, but long lines grew at some airports as others confused about the changes filled trash cans with containers that were too large." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said the new rules, announced Monday by the TSA, "'are likely to be with us for the foreseeable future.' Testifying before the House Homeland Security Committee, Chertoff said the new rules would be in place for at least six weeks, but he declined to say whether they would remain as long as six months."

USA Today (9/27, Frank, Copeland, 2.27M) reports "occasional long lines and strict security" left some passengers wondering whether "their toothpaste was worth the trouble." Some "said they were confused by a requirement that the bottles fit in the 1-quart plastic bag. Others stumbled over a policy limiting each traveler to one bag. And a few were frustrated with trying to find the right size of bag. … The new rules caused logjams of more than double the normal wait times at the security checkpoints at Hartsfield-Jackson from 7 to 8:30 a.m., according to Christopher White, TSA spokesman for the Southeastern region." However, "TSA chief Kip Hawley said he felt 'everything went smoothly across the country' on the first day since the ban was relaxed."

The Washington Times (9/27, Lengell, 88K) reports many passengers decided yesterday that "it was more convenient to forgo their new rights." Some "said it was too confusing keeping up with rules, particularly because the Homeland Security Department just announced them Monday." The Times adds, "Passengers weren't the only ones getting used to the new rules. Transportation Security Administration officials at Reagan Airport regularly deferred to clipboards with the updated regulations. And a sign outside an hourly parking garage at the airport still informed passengers that all liquids were banned on board flights, ignoring the updated rules."

The Washington Post (9/27, A12, Wilber, 748K) reports, "Security was relatively smooth at US airports yesterday, as travelers adjusted to new rules allowing them to bring aboard planes small amounts of liquids and gels in their carry-on bags. But it took some flexibility on the part of authorities to make things work." The Post recounts how former ABC "Nightline" host Ted Koppel had to be given a plastic bag by a TSA supervisor at Washington's Reagan National Airport. Likewise, the Los Angeles Times (9/27, Khalil, 918K) reports, "On the first day of the relaxed transportation safety rules, travelers and security personnel at LAX spent much of the morning working through minor kinks and confusion caused by the new guidelines."

NYTimes Fears Carry-On Rules Eased In Reaction To Airline, Business Pressure. Under the headline "A Retreat On Carry-On Liquids," the New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) editorializes "we sure wish we could be confident that the Transportation Security Administration was not simply trying to placate airlines and other businesses concerned about possible loss of revenues. … The head of the TSA said the near total ban was no longer needed because extensive testing by the FBI and others had found that small containers don't pose a real threat and because items bought in the airport's secure area have already been screened on the way in." However, "It would seem relatively easy for a small group of terrorists to combine their liquids after all have passed through security checkpoints, either in the airport's secure area or even aboard the plane." The Times states, "A safer course of action would retain the near total ban on liquids and let the airlines supply passengers with ample beverages."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Declassifies Portion Of NIE, Calls War Critics "Naïve." President Bush's declassification of certain portions of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq received heavy media coverage last night and this morning, with Bush generally portrayed as taking the initiative and being on the offensive on the issue. The AP (9/26, Shrader) reports Bush said "critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naïve" as he ordered the partial declassification of the analysis, which "has stirred heated election-season argument on the subject." At a joint news conference with visiting Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Bush

DOJ_NMG_0069604

"rejected any suggestion that the war was a mistake." Bush said, "I think it's naïve. I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe."

All three networks led with the story. ABC World News (9/26, lead story, 2:55, Gibson) said Bush "made public parts of a classified intelligence report that his opponents have been using to attack and discredit the way he's waged the war on terror." ABC (Raddatz) added, "This is the report that was released today. Three pages of a 40-page report. But the three-plus pages are very sobering. The report concludes that 'the global jihadist movement is spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts.' And if the trend continues, it will lead to 'increasing attacks worldwide,' including to US interests."

CBS Evening News (9/26, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Bush has long insisted the war in Iraq is making us safer, so when a classified intelligence review was leaked and suggested the war had created more terrorism, his critics pounced. Fighting back today, a President known for aggressively guarding government secrets decided to take a gamble. He released more of that classified document to try to make his case."

NBC Nightly News (9/26, lead story, 5:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's a report that was never meant to be public but it's out now. First it was leaked to the press and written about, and today the President, saying this is no way to do business, decided to declassify more of it and then release it officially. The intelligence report backs up the President's own position in part. But large portions of it are damaging to the Bush Administration, painting the Iraq war as a giant recruitment poster for would-be terrorists."

In a CBS Evening News (9/26, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) interview, former CIA National Counter-Terrorism Center Director John Brennan said, "Clearly the Islamic extremist elements within Iraq have taken a primary role within the insurgency, and theatre ones that are organizing a lot of attacks taking place against Iraqis, as well as against US forces. In addition, there's just a ready propaganda tool that the Islamic extremists use by showing the footage of the continuation of the struggle inside Iraq."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Blitzer) reported Bush "says he'll declassify key judgments" of the NIE, which "reportedly concludes the Iraq mission has made the terror threat worse. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Quijano) also said Bush "used the formal setting of the White House East Room to launch a full-throated political defense, attacking what he called the politically motivated leaking" of the NIE. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Miller, 918K) reports Bush "took the highly unusual step of releasing key findings" of the NIE "in an attempt to blunt a growing furor in Washington."

The Chicago Tribune (9/27, Silva, 623K) says the President "attempted to blunt criticism that the war in Iraq has emboldened a new generation of terrorists" with the partial release. The Tribune says a "carefully screened summary of the NIE concludes that a holy war in Iraq is 'shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives.' It reports that the conflict has become 'the 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement.'"

The New York Times (9/27, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports the NIE "identified the jihad in Iraq as one of four underlying factors fueling the spread of the Islamic radicalism, along with entrenched grievances, the slow pace of reform and pervasive anti-American sentiment." The NIE "said American-led counterterrorism efforts in the past five years had 'seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations,'" but it also said al Qaeda "continued to pose the greatest threat to American interests among terrorism organizations, and that the global jihadist movement overall was 'spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts.'"

Bush Sees Election-Season Motive Behind Leak Of NIE. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Wallsten, 918K) says Bush "accused unnamed people" of perpetrating the leak "as an act of political sabotage, intended to 'create confusion in the minds of the American people' in advance of the November elections." His comments and declassification decision "were the clearest signs yet that the ongoing debate over the Iraq war and its effect on U.S. security has grown to a fever pitch as the two parties struggle to shape public opinion before election day." Bush said, "Here we are, coming down the stretch of an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspaper. Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A3, Solomon, Lueck, 2.03M) says "leaders from both parties immediately seized on the findings to argue that their position on the Iraq war would better secure the U.S." While President Bush "called those who believe the war has worsened terrorism 'naïve,' and said to withdraw from Iraq could only further embolden militant groups to spread their influence across the Middle East and the Islamic world," Senate Intelligence senior Democrat Jay Rockefeller "countered that, 'The reality is, the war in Iraq has inflamed Islamic extremism…and it has created a training ground for the next generation of terrorists.'" CQ (9/26, Starks) reports Democrats said the NIE offered "evidence that Iraq has been a distracting and dangerous misadventure."

DOJ_NMG_0069605

Under the headline "Bush On Offensive Over Leaked Iraq Report," the Financial Times (9/27, Daniel) says the declassification "marked a White House effort to limit the political fallout from the admission that the Iraq war had fostered terrorism and to show that the findings were just one part of a wider analysis of terrorism trends." And the Washington Times (9/27, Curl, 88K) reports under the headline "Bush Hits 'Political' Leak" that "an angry" Bush said the NIE "had been leaked for 'political purposes' and disputed that the classified report had concluded the Iraq war is spreading Islamic extremism across the world."

NIE Calls Iraq War "Cause Celebre" For Jihadists. The Washington Post (9/27, Fletcher, 748K) reports on its front page that the NIE says the Iraq war "has become a 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and drawing new adherents to the movement." But it also says the "jihadist movement is potentially limited by its ultra-conservative interpretation of Islam and could be slowed by democratic reforms in the Muslim world." Still, the NIE says, terrorists "with experience constructing roadside bombs and other deadly devices in Iraq 'are a potential source' of leadership in attacks elsewhere." USA Today (9/27, 4A, Nichols, Jackson, 2.27M) puts the "cause célèbre" quote in the lead sentence of its report, and the AP (9/26, Shrader, Loven) also carries a story led by the phrase.

NYTimes, WPost Analyses Suggest NIE Shows US Failing To Quash Terrorism. Under the headline "Waging The War On Terror: Report Belies Optimistic View," the New York Times (9/27, Sanger, 1.21M) writes that in 2003, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "wrote a memo to his colleagues in the Pentagon posing a critical question in the 'long war' against terrorism: Is Washington's strategy successfully killing or capturing terrorists faster than new enemies are being created? Until Tuesday, the government had not publicly issued an authoritative answer." But the NIE "does exactly that, and it concludes that the administration has failed the Rumsfeld test."

The Washington Post (9/27, A21, DeYoung, Pincus, 748K) says Bush "said he agreed with the document's conclusion 'that because of our successes against the leadership of al-Qaeda, the enemy is becoming more diffuse and independent.'" But the Post says the NIE "posits no such cause and effect. Instead, while it notes that counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged and disrupted al-Qaeda's leadership, it describes the spreading 'global jihadist movement' as fueled largely by forces that al-Qaeda exploits but is not actively directing. They include Iraq, corrupt and unjust governments in Muslim-majority countries, and 'pervasive anti-U.S. sentiment among most Muslims.'" The Post says the "overall estimate is bleak, with minor notes of optimism."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A18, 2.03M) editorializes, "We're happy to take credit for the suggestion made in our editorial yesterday, 'Declassify the Terrorism NIE.' But of course it was hardly rocket science to come to this decision. … We will hold an election in this country in six weeks and a bigger one in 2008. The war on terror -- with or without Iraq -- will be central to those votes. If declassifying this national intelligence estimate helps voters in that decision, so much the better."

The New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) editorializes, "It's hard to think of a president and an administration more devoted to secrecy than President Bush and his team. Except, that is, when it suits Mr. Bush politically to give the public a glimpse of the secrets. And so, yesterday, he ordered the declassification. … Bush said he wanted to release the document so voters would not be confused about terrorism or the war when they voted for Congressional candidates in November. But the three declassified pages from what is certainly a voluminous report told us what any American with a newspaper, television or Internet connection should already know. The invasion of Iraq was a cataclysmic disaster. The current situation will get worse if American forces leave. Unfortunately, neither the report nor the president provide even a glimmer of a suggestion about how to avoid that inevitable disaster."

In his Washington Post (9/27, A27, 748K) column, David Ignatius writes, "No matter how you slice it," the NIE "is big trouble for President Bush and his party in this election year. It goes to the heart of Bush's argument for invading Iraq, which was that it would make America safer. Many Democrats act as if that's the end of the discussion. … That is understandable, given the partisanship of Republican attacks, but it isn't right. The issue raised" by the NIE "is much grimmer than the domestic political game. Iraq has fostered a new generation of terrorists. The question is what to do about that threat."

DOJ_NMG_0069606

Gonzales Says DOJ To Follow "Standard Procedure" On NIE Leak. USA Today (9/26, 4A, 2.27M) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday that the Justice Department will determine whether to investigate the weekend leak of an intelligence assessment that found the war in Iraq is exacerbating terrorism. 'We have a standard procedure in place that is followed with respect to leaks of classified information,' Gonzales said when asked at a news conference whether a criminal investigation would be launched, as it was in the case of an earlier leak of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists by the National Security Agency. 'I suspect that standard procedure will be followed in this case,' he said. That procedure requires the agency that classified the document to request a criminal investigation and then to answer 11 questions about how widely the document was circulated and how much the agency is willing to divulge in court if a case is brought to trial."

Bush Will Try To Mediate Between Karzai, Musharraf At White House Dinner. ABC World News (9/26, story 3, 2:45, Gibson) reported that Presidents Musharraf and Karzai "are having dinner" tonight "with President Bush. The rift between the Presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan is getting quite bitter. And the presidents are anticipating a spirited evening tomorrow. Presidents Bush and Karzai spoke about it when they met with reporters at the White House today." President Bush: "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are. Yeah. I'm teasing about the body language for the dinner tomorrow night. But it's going to be a good dinner. It's an important dinner."

The Washington Post (9/27, A22, Kessler, Abramowitz, 748K) reports, "Tonight, joined by Vice President Cheney and" Secretary Rice," Bush "will bring both men into the old family dining room of the White House for a private chat." The Post says the "intimate dinner has all the earmarks of a peace conference. Karzai and Musharraf have been sniping at each other from long-distance for months, and Rice was dispatched to Kabul and Islamabad last June to try to ease tensions. The meeting comes as chaos is increasing in southern Afghanistan," while Musharraf "recently signed a deal with tribal chiefs that many experts believe turned over much of the area along Afghanistan's border to the control of Pakistani-based Taliban forces." Administration officials "noted that this is the second meeting Bush has brokered between the two men, and it was an effort to build a common strategy between two countries that have been at odds for decades."

The AP (9/27, Gearan) reports that yesterday, Bush "Bush reassured Afghanistan's leader…that the United States will stick by him five years into a democratic experiment that both men acknowledged has suffered setbacks." Karzai "said the insurgent violence in his country can be tamed, and he called the staggering growth in Afghanistan's illegal drug production an embarrassment. 'You got a tough job,' Bush told his guest at the start of a White House press conference. 'Sometimes it is,' a slightly rueful Karzai agreed."

The Financial Times (9/27, Daniel) says Karzai "expressed scepticism about a key agreement to stop potential insurgents from crossing the Pakistani border, saying he would 'wait and see' how it would be implemented." Of Musharraf's deal with border-area chieftains, Karzai is quoted saying, "My initial impression was that this was a deal signed by the Taliban – and then later I learned that they actually signed with the tribal chiefs. It will have a different meaning if it is signed with the tribal chiefs." The Times says, "in the past few days," both men "have added to tensions," with Musharraf having "suggested the root cause of Afghanistan's problems is its own history," and Karzai having "blamed outsiders."

USA Today (9/27, Jackson, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Bush Guests Are Both Allies -- Of The US, At Least." Bush, says USA Today, "tests his mediation skills today when he brings together a pair of feuding neighbors who are both essential to the US war on terrorism." The White House dinner "is an attempt at trilateral negotiations for Bush."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/27, 918K) says, "Bush's famously personal approach to diplomacy hasn't always worked out -- the last leader into whose eyes he gazed, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, has not turned out to be a reliable ally of the US or of democracy -- and it will be tested tonight. Somewhere between Karzai's and Musharraf's competing versions of the truth, and within the borders of the lands they nominally control, lie the leaders of the Taliban and Al Qaeda -- the original enemies in this war." The Times concludes, "Maybe Bush can trade on his friendships with Karzai and Musharraf to come up with a coordinated plan to fight the Taliban and reduce its havens in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Otherwise, he will have to explain how those countries can continue to harbor terrorists yet not be considered hostile regimes."

DOJ_NMG_0069607

US Intel Picked Up Signs Of Sudden Activity In Pakistan's Mountain Regions Two Months Ago. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Starr) reported, "US intelligence sources tell CNN that two months ago there were signs of sudden activity in the remote mountain regions of Pakistan where Osama bin Laden is thought to be hiding. Analysts describe signs of people and movement in an area where the pace of activity is normally predictable. Part of the movement may have been Arab fighters or Taliban trying to avoid the Pakistani military. But according to one official, there was a source in the region who saw someone, possibly bin Laden himself. There have been tips before. But this time it was all enough to persuade the US intelligence community to once again order reconnaissance assets into a particular area of the tribal border region. The high-tech hunt using spy planes and sensors essentially is aimed at putting an electronic fence around an area where bin Laden might be. Spy satellites are used to look for changes in the landscape below. For example, fresh tire tracks on a mountain pass could mean medical aid is being brought to bin Laden."

Musharraf Sidesteps Question About US Entering Pakistan In Pursue Of Bin Laden. Musharraf was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/26) about President Bush's comment that he would go into Pakistan to get bin Laden if he knew where he was. Musharraf said, "My comments are -- I have been giving my comments that this is a sensitive area. And our decision is that we operate on our side of the border and US forces and allies operate on the other side. Now, having said that, we are hunting Osama and Zawahiri together. We are on the hunt, we are on the lookout for him. When we locate him, we have to take action, we have to take effective action to do away with him." Asked what would be wrong with is the US tried to capture kill bin Laden or al-Zawahiri in Pakistan, Musharraf said, "It is a very sensitive issue. We should not be discussing how and who is to deliver the blow, but whenever we locate him, we have to deal with him. And let's leave it at that and let's not get into the sensitivities of who and how it will be done."

Musharraf Appears On "Daily Show." The Washington Post (9/27, C1, Copeland, 748K) reports Musharraf "appeared on Comedy Central's 'Daily Show' with Jon Stewart, where he demonstrated both a sense of humor and a deep desire to sell 'In the Line of Fire,' which, incidentally, is now available on Amazon.com for the low, low price of $16.80, plus shipping and handling." Stewart "asked Musharraf why he hadn't made much reference in his book to America's war in Iraq. 'Is that because you felt like it was such a smart move, and has gone so well that to mention it would be gloating?' Stewart asked. Musharraf laughed and said of the war, 'It has led certainly to more extremism and terrorism around the world.'"

Suicide Bomber Kills 18 In Afghanistan. CBS Evening News (9/26, story 3, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported that in Afghanistan, "violence is on the rise. A suicide bomber struck outside a governor's compound in the south. The governor was not hurt, but 18 other people were killed, including several who were there to get papers for a pilgrimage to Mecca." NBC Nightly News (9/26, story 3, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the violence.

The AP (9/27, Khaleq) reports "the blast at the doorstep of Helmand Gov. Mohammed Daoud Safi's compound came on the same day a bombing against a NATO patrol in the Kabul area killed an Italian soldier and a child, and two weeks after militants assassinated a governor in eastern Afghanistan who had been a Karzai confidant." The New York Times (9/27, Gall, 1.21M) says the latest violence provides "another sign of the increasing size and power of suicide attacks and roadside bombs by insurgents."

Five People Killed In Baghdad As Violence Continues. CBS Evening News (9/26, story 8, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Bombs went off in several parts of Baghdad today. Five people were killed. The police found 23 bodies of men apparently killed by death squads."

Talabani Says Iraq Won't Descend Into Civil War. The AP (9/27, Schweid) reports, "Iraqi President Jalal Talabani disputed on Tuesday reports of growing violence in his country and declared, 'I can assure you there will be no civil war.'" At a news conference, Talabani also "leveled a warning to Iraq's neighbors that interference will not be tolerated. 'Iraq is not so weak our neighbors can do anything and we will remain silent,' Talabani said after delivering an upbeat speech at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars."

DOJ_NMG_0069608

Mixed Shiite-Sunni Neighborhood Is Consumed By Distrust. The Washington Post (9/27, Raghavan, 748K) in a 2,727-word front page article reports, "Across the capital, mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods have become battlegrounds of sectarian hostilities. West of the Tigris River, hundreds of Shiite families have fled mostly Sunni neighborhoods such as Amiriyah and Ghazaliya. In the east, hundreds of Sunni families have fled mostly Shiite areas such as Amin and Shaab. Increasingly, the strife is spreading into central Baghdad. In still-mixed neighborhoods such as Tobji, nestled in north-central Baghdad, political and militant Islam is clashing with tribal customs and a shared Arab and Muslim identity that have bonded Sunnis and Shiites for decades." The Post describes the fighting and killings that occur in the Tobji neighborhood of Baghdad over a 10-day span.

Poll Finds Most Iraqis Want Immediate US Withdrawal. The Washington Post (9/27, Paley, 748K) reports, "A strong majority of Iraqis want U.S.-led military forces to immediately withdraw from the country, saying their swift departure would make Iraq more secure and decrease sectarian violence, according to new polls by the State Department and independent researchers. In Baghdad, for example, nearly three-quarters of residents polled said they would feel safer if U.S. and other foreign forces left Iraq, with 65 percent of those asked favoring an immediate pullout." The University of Maryland Program on International Policy Attitudes will announce on Wednesday "that 71 percent of Iraqis questioned want the Iraqi government to ask foreign forces to depart within a year. By large margins, though, Iraqis believed that the U.S. government would refuse the request, with 77 percent of those polled saying the United States intends to keep permanent military bases in the country." The "stark" poll results, "among the most negative attitudes toward U.S.-led forces since they invaded Iraq in 2003, contrast sharply with views expressed by the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki."

Saddam Removed From Courtroom. McClatchy (9/27, Brunswick) reports, "For the second time in as many days in his genocide and war crimes trial, former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was ordered tossed from the courtroom on Tuesday, sparking an eruption from the other defendants and briefly shutting down the court. … Two other defendants were led out of the courtroom after Saddam, who barely concealed a smile on his face as he made his way to the door."

The New York Times (9/27, Oppel, Mizher, 1.21M) reports that "after throwing Saddam Hussein out of court again, the judge hearing the deposed dictator's genocide trial abruptly postponed the case until Oct. 9, so Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants could consult with lawyers who are boycotting the trial or find new ones."

Oil-For-Food Inquiry Finds Australian Wheat Exporter Was Warned. The AP (9/27) reports Australian wheat exporter AWB Ltd. was "repeatedly warned" by lawyers that funneling money to Saddam Hussein's regime "could be illegal and breach U.N. sanctions on Iraq," according to evidence released by a government-commissioned inquiry Tuesday. The documents "contradicted" testimony by company executives that the monopoly exporter, formerly the government-owned Australian Wheat Board, "did not knowingly pay $222 million in bribes to the Iraq government under the corruption-riddled U.N. oil-for-food program." The documents are among 900 that AWB fought to withhold from the inquiry, but were ordered to be turned over last week by Australia's Federal Court.

West Point Buries First Female Graduate To Die In Iraq. The Washington Post (9/27, Partlow, Parker, 748K) reports in a front page article on the funeral at West Point of Emily Perez, "the first female graduate…to die in Iraq. Perez, a platoon leader, was killed while patrolling southern Iraq near Najaf on Sept. 12 when a roadside bomb exploded under her Humvee." Perez was mentioned in a Sunday New York Times piece on the increasing number of women killed in combat. The article quotes people who knew her and chronicles the funeral.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Prison. CBS Evening News (9/26, story 5, 0:15, Couric) reported, "It will be six years in prison for Andrew Fastow for masterminding the financial fraud at Enron. The former CFO could have faced ten years but the judge opted for leniency. Thousands of employees lost their jobs and pensions and many stockholders lost their life savings when Enron collapsed in 2001."

DOJ_NMG_0069609

The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Hart) reports that due to Fastow's cooperation with the investigation, US District Judge Kenneth Hoyt stopped short of sentencing him to the maximum term. In 2004, Fastow "had agreed to serve as long as 10 years in exchange for testifying against the former top executives of the fallen energy company." The Times adds, "Hoyt imposed no fine in meting out his sentence to Fastow, noting that under terms of the plea agreement he had already forfeited $23.8 million and pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy. Hoyt sentenced Fastow to two years of supervised release upon completing his prison term. The judge recommended a minimum-security prison for Fastow, as well as drug treatment for the anti-anxiety medication he has been taking."

The Washington Post (9/27, D1, Johnson) reports that Hoyt said that Fastow "had been 'the subject of great persecution,' including threats and religious slurs, as the primary scapegoat for an accounting fraud that cost thousands of employees of the Houston energy company their jobs and retirement savings."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Emshwiller, Biers) reports, "Some found the reduced sentence for Mr. Fastow troubling. 'I was very surprised,' said Leslie Caldwell, the original director of the special Justice Department task force that investigated the Enron scandal. Ms. Caldwell, who is currently a partner with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius in New York, said the 10-year sentence included in the 2004 plea deal contemplated that he would provide full cooperation."

USA Today (9/27, Krantz) reports, "Fastow, 44, who also is barred from serving as an officer or director of a public company, could shave a year from his prison term by joining a drug-treatment program. The judge recommended Fastow to serve at the federal prison in Bastrop, Texas, followed by a two-year probation."

The New York Times (9/27, Murphy) reports, "Although Mr. Fastow's lawyers and government prosecutors asked that he be allowed to surrender voluntarily after the Yom Kippur holiday on Monday, Judge Hoyt refused. Mr. Fastow was allowed to briefly embrace his wife before U.S. Marshals escorted him from the courtroom in handcuffs. … 'We're very disappointed he was remanded into custody,' said Chris Patti, counsel for the University of California, which is a plaintiff in pending shareholder litigation. 'I'm not sure what this will mean for us.' … Mr. Patti and other lawyers involved in Enron civil cases had asked the judge at today's hearing to allow Mr. Fastow to remain free until at least October 23, the date they hoped to conclude his deposition. October 23 is also the date Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey Skilling, will be sentenced." The Times adds, "Another lawyer representing shareholders, Lawrence Irving, testified that Mr. Fastow was 'critical' to their case. Referring to Mr. Fastow's testimony in the trials against his former bosses Mr. Skilling and Kenneth Lay, Mr. Irving said, 'I have never seen a more impressive witness.' Mr. Lay died of a heart attack in July before serving any jail time. … United States Attorney John Hueston testified that the cases against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay were weak until Mr. Fastow agreed to help the Justice Department's Enron Task Force: 'He allowed the U.S. government to bring jurors inside the executive suite.'"

The AP (9/27, Lozano) reports, "Fastow was originally indicted on 98 counts, including fraud, insider trading and money laundering. He pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy, admitting to running various schemes to hide Enron debt and inflate profits while enriching himself. He also surrendered nearly $30 million in cash and property. … At their trial, Fastow testified Lay and Skilling were aware of fraudulent financial structures engineered by Fastow and his staff."

Fastow Accuses Investment Banks Of Aiding Enron Fraud. Fastow has accused 10 investment banks of helping Enron falsify its books in exchange for large advisory fees. The Financial Times (9/27, White, McNulty) reports, "The accusations came in a 24-page legal declaration filed by Mr Fastow in support of a class action lawsuit against the banks brought on behalf of Enron's shareholders." Fastow's declaration "could put new pressure on banks that have not yet settled in the class-action case. … Mr Fastow singled out Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, RBS and Barclays as especially involved with creating what he described as deceptive structures."

The Texas Lawyer (9/27, Jeffreys) reports, "Tuesday, lawyers in the shareholder securities suit, In Re: Enron Corp. Securities Litigation filed a declaration from Fastow in connection with the civil litigation. In that declaration, Fastow alleges that some of the banks that did business with Enron when he was CFO 'understood that some of the transactions were done primarily for generating certain accounting benefits and financial-reporting objections for Enron, including higher funds flow from operations, lower debt and increased [current period] income.' … G. Paul Howes, a lawyer for the lead plaintiff in the securities litigation, told Hoyt during the hearing that Fastow has agreed to testify during the upcoming trial in the securities litigation and will provide crucial testimony to tie banks to the downfall of Enron."

DOJ_NMG_0069610

Local Television. U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt Judge decision to sentence former Enron CFO Andrew Fastow to six years in prison received reasonable coverage by Texas local newscasts. All newscasts agreed that Fastow's help in the prosecution of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling helped him receive a lenient sentence. Some examples: KHOU-TV Houston, (9/26, 10:05 p.m.) reported. "Despite what it seemed, sentencing day turned out to be a pretty good day for Andrew Fastow. He came to court facing ten years, but found Judge Kenneth Hoyt to be lenient, giving Fastow only six years in prison. Plus if he enters a drug treatment program for anxiety medication he takes, Fastow could get a year shaved off that."

WFAA-TV Dallas, (9/26, 12:14 p.m.) reported. "Judge has granted leniency for former Enron CFO Andrew Fastow. He was expecting a 10-year sentence. The sentence is reduced now and it will be six years, not ten."

WOAI-TV San Antonio, (9/26, 06:11 p.m.) reported, "Lawyers for the 44- year-old pushed for the lesser sentence after he testified in the trials of Enron founder Kenneth lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling."

KHWB-TV Houston, (9/26, 9:04 p.m.) reported. "Today U.S. District Judge Ken Hoyt granted his attorney's request for leniency citing his cooperation in the investigation. Hoyt says Fastow's family has suffered enough, and that Fastow has been persecuted as the scapegoat in the Enron collapse."

KXAN-TV Austin, (9/26, 10:00 p.m.) reported. "Fastow will also face 2-years of court supervision when he is released."

KPRC-TV Houston, (9/26, 06:02 p.m.) reported. "Andrew Fastow's leverage in pending Enron cases spared him four long years behind bars."

KPRC-TV Houston, (9/26, 04:01 p.m.) reported. "One person who was happy to see a lighter sentence for Fastow was whistle blower Sherron Watkins. She helped shed light on the problems. She went to Fastow during her time and says that the work he has done since the plea deal earned a lighter sentence."

Ebbers Reports To Prison. Former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers reported yesterday to a medium security federal prison in Louisiana to begin serving a 25 year sentence, USA Today (9/27) reports. Ebbers was "convicted in 2005 for his role in the company's $11 billion accounting fraud, the biggest in corporate history."

The Washington Post (9/27, D1, Masters, Joyce) reports, "Ebbers will spend at least the next 21 years in prison. The federal system does not have parole, but inmates can receive up to 15 percent off their sentences for good behavior. Ebbers is appealing his conviction and sentence to the Supreme Court."

Attorneys To Discuss Scrushy Request For A New Trial. US District Court Judge Mark Fuller has ordered prosecutors and defense attorneys to a non conference call today to discuss former HealthSouth Chief Executive Richard Scrushy's request for a new trial on political corruption charges. The Wall Street Journal (9/27) reports, "Attorneys for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman say their June convictions should be thrown out because some jury members may have communicated with one another via email outside the courtroom before and during deliberations. Defense attorneys also say the jurors improperly viewed articles and information on the Internet during deliberations."

Jenkins Says H-P Scandal Is "Devoid Of Larger Meaning." Holman Jenkins Jr. writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/27) that the Hewlett-Packard saga "is devoid of larger meaning, but the snafu now has its own consequences, hence the unusual suspense, and unusual stakes, of tomorrow's spectacle before a House committee concerned with data privacy. The questions only begin with which executives will invoke the Fifth (likely only those directly involved in the record filching). Will [board chair Patricia] Dunn take full responsibility for driving the investigation or seek to share it with CEO Mark Hurd? … Another element of suspense is Congress. Will it confine itself to what the H-P saga has to say about 'pretexting' -- the scamming of phone companies and others into allowing unauthorized access to records? This subject was on the committee's radar screen already. Or will H-P become an excuse to become even more prescriptive on corporate governance along the lines of the poorly considered Sarbanes-Oxley law in the wake of Enron?"

Pegoraro Says Consumer Punishment Of H-P Won't Deter Other Corporate Criminals. Rob Pegoraro writes in the Washington Post (9/27, D1) that "HP awaits your judgment the next time you walk into any computer or electronics store. What do you do? … Do you give HP your business or not? Does its vile conduct outweigh the finer points of its products?" Pegoraro adds, "The brain trust at HP let its megalomania outweigh any other considerations, like common decency or simply the desire not to look like felons when the whole sorry operation inevitably came to light. If this doesn't affect HP's bottom line, how much lower does a company have to sink before its customers rebel? … Go ahead, make HP your punching bag the next time you shop for a printer or a computer. Just don't overestimate the deterrent effect that might have on the rest of corporate America."

DOJ_NMG_0069611

Options Probes Hit Investors In Bottom Line. Bloomberg (9/27, Green) reports, "The scandal over backdating stock options, used by companies to reward top executives with shares granted at below-market prices, has so far cost investors at least $7.9 billion in market value." Bloomberg continues, "More than two-thirds of 117 companies that announced investigations into their options grants by Aug. 31 fell in the stock market the next day, data compiled by Bloomberg show. The declines sliced an average 2.6 percent from their market value, 2.5 percentage points more than the average return on the same day for Standard & Poor's and Bloomberg indexes of similar companies." Bloomberg adds, "The losses add grist to 220 investor lawsuits against 70 companies, including Apple Computer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., which demand restitution and damages. The inquiry into backdating and fortuitous timing of option grants rivals the probe three years ago into improper mutual-fund trading, which led to $4.3 billion in penalties. … Companies grant options to give executives an incentive to boost the stock price. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department are looking at whether the companies backdated grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low, giving recipients a built-in profit, and cases where they may have failed to properly account for awards."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Plame Probe Has Cost $1.4 Million So Far. The New York Times/AP (9/27, Press) reports, "Prosecutors said Tuesday that they had spent $1.44 million investigating the leak of a Central Intelligence Agency officer's identity in 2003. Because the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and other lawyers in the case were already on the government payroll, most of the costs were covered as a 'paper transfer' from one government account to another, Mr. Fitzgerald's office said." The AP adds, "The only additional cost to taxpayers was $333,000, mostly for travel and contractual services like research and court recorders. Investigators did not rent office space here, eliminating an expense that drove up costs for other investigations of top officials."

The Washington Post (9/28, A12, Leonnig, 748K) headlines its story "CIA Leak Probe Relatively Inexpensive," saying the $1.4 million figure "establishes him as remarkably frugal in the ranks of recent special investigators." Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr's "investigations of President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky and his ties to the failed Whitewater land investment cost $71.5 million and took eight years. Independent Counsel David M. Barrett's examination of Clinton housing secretary Henry G. Cisneros over an extramarital affair and potential illegal payments cost $21 million and lasted 10 years."

Judge To Consider "Crucial Issue" For Libby Trial. The AP (9/27, Apuzzo) reports, "A closed-door hearing beginning Wednesday will deal with a crucial issue in the trial of a former White House aide: whether President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other sensitive documents should be disclosed in the CIA leak case." The hearing, "which could last several days, will help establish what classified information is relevant to the case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby." Libby "wants to use the daily intelligence briefings and terrorism threat assessments as evidence to show he had important things on his mind and honestly didn't remember details about his conversations with reporters." Prosecutors "have said Libby is trying to sabotage the case by requesting so much classified information that the government will be forced to withhold it and let the case be dismissed. It's a legal tactic known as 'graymail.'"

Gotti Jurors Tell Judge They Are Deadlocked. The New York Times (9/27, Williams) reports, "The federal jury in the racketeering conspiracy trial of John A. Gotti sent a note to the judge this afternoon saying they were deadlocked and unable to reach a unanimous verdict." The Times continues, "Judge Shira A. Scheindlin read the panel the Allen charge, an instruction meant to encourage juries to continue working until they reach a verdict, and sent them back to continue deliberating. … It is unclear how long the jurors — seven women and five men — will continue to deliberate, but Judge Scheindlin told them if they felt they were close to reaching a verdict by later this afternoon that the court would pay for dinner and give them rides home." The Times adds, "If the jury is unable to reach a verdict, it would be the third mistrial on the racketeering charges in the past year for Mr. Gotti. This is the sixth day of this jury's deliberations. In Mr. Gotti's first trial, the jury deliberated for eight days. In the second, the deliberations lasted one and a half days. … The jurors did say that of the four counts Mr. Gotti is facing, they had been able to reach a decision on only part of one of the racketeering conspiracy charges: the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio talk show host. … The jury's note did not say what decision it had reached on that count."

DOJ_NMG_0069612

The AP (9/27, Neumeister) reports, "From the start, the jury has sought evidence aimed at deciding whether Gotti quit the Gambino crime family before July 1991, as he claims. If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004. … The jury was in its sixth day of deliberations. It had asked for some evidence to be read back as it deliberated over the last week, but the panel has not been particularly noisy in a courthouse where jurors can sometimes be heard shouting at one another." The AP adds that Judge Scheindlin "encouraged the jurors to give it another try, saying the case would likely have to be tried again and it was unlikely that another jury would be better able to judge the evidence. Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials."

Local Television. Only a few local newscasts reported that the jury in the third racketeering trial of John Gotti is unable to agree on a verdict. WSMH-TV Flint, (9/26, 10:24 p.m.) reported, "The jury in the third racketeering trial of John 'junior' Gotti is deadlocked just like the two prior trials. A New York federal judge is telling jurors to keep trying."

WLUK-TV Green Bay, (9/26, 05:36 p.m.) reported, "The jury in John Gotti's latest trial is deadlocked – just like the first two juries. The judge in the case told jurors to keep trying. Gotti has already had two mistrials because of hung juries. If convicted, he faces 30 years in prison on racketeering charges."

WANE-TV Ft. Wayne, (9/26, 11:13 p.m.) reported, "Six days of deliberations and jurors are deadlocked in the third racketeering trial of John 'junior' Gotti. The federal judge trying the case is urging jurors to keep trying. She says if they can't come to a decision there will probably be another trial."

WABC-TV New York, (9/26, 05:04 p.m.) reported, "Another day of deliberations for a jury deciding the fate of John Jr. Gotti. This is Gotti's third trial on racketeering charges in the last year. … The jury must decide if Gotti quit the Gambino crime family as he claimed, if so a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before the charges were filed."

Senate To Cooperate With DOJ On Probe Of Former FDA Head. Roll Call (9/27, Bresnahan) reports the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee "has agreed to turn over documents and allow three staffers to provide testimony to the Justice Department as part of the federal investigation into Lester Crawford, the former head of the Food and Drug Administration." The US Attorney's office "in the District of Columbia is conducting a probe into Crawford's statements about his financial holdings during confirmation hearings before the panel in 2005."

Former Westinghouse Electric Nuclear Engineer Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges. Under the headline, "Nuclear Engineer Guilty Of Conspiracy, Tax Evasion," the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/26, Ward, 241K) reported, "A nuclear engineer who formerly worked for Westinghouse Electric Corp. pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to conspiracy and tax evasion. Initially, Mark M. Kaushansky, 55, of Monroeville, was charged with helping Russia's former atomic energy minister steal more than $9 million in aid money from the US Department of Energy. But the plea before Senior US District Judge Maurice B. Cohill included just nine of the original 20 counts against him, and they all related to tax evasion." The Post-Gazette added that according to the US attorney's office, Mr. Kaushansky and Dr. Adamov began working together" and "incorporated two businesses, one in Pennsylvania and another in Delaware, and used two shell investment companies, with accounts in the United States, France and Monaco, to divert some of the money earmarked for NIKIET, a Russian nuclear research institute headed by Dr. Adamov."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/26, Cato) reported that Kaushansky "will try to prove during a four-day hearing in February that he owes significantly less than the $5 million prosecutors say he owes. That could earn him significantly less time in prison than the approximately five years he faces if the government is right. In pleading guilty to nine counts of conspiracy and tax evasion, Kaushansky avoided more serious offenses of money laundering and interstate transportation of stolen property. He maintains his long-standing argument that he was not involved in an international scheme to rip off the United States with Adamov." Prosecutors say "Kaushansky and Adamov routed $15 million provided by the United States and other countries to bank accounts in Pittsburgh, Delaware and Monaco between 1993 and 2003."

DOJ_NMG_0069613

The AP (9/26, Nephin) reported, "US Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said in a statement that the indictment alleges Adamov was primarily responsible for diverting the money, but that Kaushansky 'was most directly involved with the concealment and expenditure of those funds.' US prosecutors wanted to try Adamov here, but Russian officials said he should face trial in his home country. He has denied the charges against him and awaits trial in Russia."

Stevens Reveals FBI Made Second Search Of Alaska Office. The Anchorage Daily News (9/26, Mauer, Demer) reported, "FBI agents returned last week to the legislative office of Senate President Ben Stevens and seized more evidence, including a copy of a sworn statement that implicated Stevens in an alleged payment scheme involving fisheries legislation brought by his father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. Word of the second search, and what was taken by the FBI, came from Ben Stevens himself, who disclosed the information in a letter to the Daily News dated Sept. 22. In his letter, Stevens denied a request by the newspaper for a copy of any FBI search warrants which may have been served on him or his office," but he did provide "what he said was a 'complete listing of what was obtained from my legislative offices.'" The Daily News noted, "Though much has been made of the FBI's apparent interest in the relationship between legislators and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco…Stevens listed only a single Veco document taken by the FBI: an undated memo to Veco president Pete Leathard."

Judge Sentences Ailing Gambino Capo To 12 Years In Prison. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/27, Neumeister) reports, "An ailing 74-year-old Gambino crime family captain who once recommended an undercover FBI agent for mob membership asked a judge for leniency Tuesday but received more than 12 years in prison instead. 'Give me one more shot,' Gregory DePalma…asked U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein," but the judge replied, "If you were in my shoes, I don't think you would." Hellerstein, "calling DePalma 'a man thoroughly immersed in criminal activity,' said he could not be lenient because leniency toward DePalma in the past had not led him to avoid crime when he was out of prison." The New York Daily News (9/27, Zambito, 729K) notes, "In addition to the prison time, Hellerstein ordered DePalma to pay some $70,000 in restitution to two extortion victims. 'How much?' DePalma asked. 'Can I give them my Social Security check?' DePalma's motor-mouth was intercepted by a bug the FBI placed in his cell phone with the help of undercover agent Joaquin Garcia, who so deeply infiltrated the mob that DePalma was ready to sponsor his Mafia induction."

Lawmakers Seek Data Retention By Web Hosts. CNET News (9/27, Broache) reports, "Politicians on Tuesday urged domain name registries and Web hosting companies to do more to keep illicit child pornography off the Internet and indicated mandatory retention of user records is an option under consideration." CNET continues, "At a hearing here convened by a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee on oversight and investigations, Michigan Rep. Bart Stupak, the panel's top-ranking Democrat, asked company representatives how they would feel about being subject to a law in the works that would require Internet service providers to retain customer records for one year. … 'If we do compel data retention, is there any reason Web hosting sites should be treated differently than ISPs?' Stupak asked the general counsel for GoDaddy.com, which bills itself as the largest domain name registrar in the world, and the CEO of Blue Gravity Communications, a New Jersey-based Web hosting firm. Both executives were participants on a panel at the latest in a series of hearings on the topic of online child exploitation. … 'A year might be a little long,' replied Thomas Krwawecz, Blue Gravity's CEO, later adding: 'It would be something we would definitely be open to if there were some guidelines for maintaining that data for a specific period of time.'" CNET adds, "Christine Jones, general counsel for GoDaddy, said requirements to maintain particular customer data for hosting companies and ISPs alike would be 'productive' for law enforcement. But the data, she added, should be limited to identifying information about subscribers, such as IP addresses and credit card numbers, and should not include the content of their communications.

DOJ_NMG_0069614

… Privacy and industry groups have generally voiced opposition to calls for mandatory data retention, which have become a fixture on the congressional agenda ever since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the practice's necessity earlier this year."

Police Seize Electronics From Home Where DC Attorney Was Killed. The Legal Times (9/27, Schwartz) reports, "Police have seized computers and other electronics from the Dupont Circle home in Northwest Washington where lawyer Robert Wone was stabbed to death Aug. 2, according to an affidavit in a search warrant for the house that was recently made public." The Times continues, "The evidence, which included two laptops, a desktop computer, diskettes and USB drives, was among the material police confiscated during their monthlong search of the home at 1509 Swann St. N.W." The Times adds, "Wone, 32, who was the general counsel for Radio Free Asia, was found shortly before midnight "showing no signs of life" in the second-floor bedroom of the house, owned by his college friend Joseph Price, a partner at Arent Fox, according to the Aug. 4 affidavit by Detective William Xanten III. Price's partner, Victor Zaborsky, a marketing manager at the International Dairy Foods Association, co-owns the house. A third man, Dylan Ward, also lived there. All three were home the night of the murder."

SCOTUS To Consider Appeal In Arizona Death Penalty Case. The AP (9/27) reports, "The Supreme Court accepted an appeal Tuesday from Arizona, which wants to execute a twice-convicted killer who says his lawyer didn't do enough to ward off a death sentence." The AP continues, "Justices said they would review a decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said a lower court should consider Jeffrey Landrigan's claims that his lawyer was ineffective." The AP adds, "Landrigan escaped from an Oklahoma prison in 1989, where he was serving a 20-year term for murdering an acquaintance. A month later, he killed Chester Dyer, who picked up men on the Phoenix streets by flashing large sums of money. … As Landrigan and the man were drinking beer in the victim's Phoenix apartment, Landrigan strangled Dyer with an electrical cord and repeatedly punctured him with a screwdriver. He was convicted of killing Dyer and sentenced to death. .. Dale Baich, who represents Landrigan in his appeals, said his client might have won a life term instead of a death sentence if his trial lawyer had submitted evidence that he was predisposed to violence and suffered brain damage that made him unable to appreciate his crimes. … The Arizona Supreme Court, a federal district judge and a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit all rejected Landrigan's claims before the full appellate decided otherwise in March."

Biker Brawlers Go On Trial In Law Vegas. The AP (9/27, Ritter) reports, "Videotape images show rival motorcycle gang members wielding guns, knives, wrenches and chairs in a brawl that killed three and injured at least a dozen in a southern Nevada casino in 2002." The AP continues, "The footage is among hundreds of hours of videotape jurors may view during the trial of 11 Hells Angels charged in the deadly casino brawl." The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors are expected on Tuesday to tell jurors that the bikers plotted to attack the rival Mongols gang at the Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino after years of friction erupted into violence at a crowded motorcycle rally. … They are the first of 42 men - from California, Washington, Arizona, Alaska and Nevada, and ranging in age from 28 to 63 - to stand trial in the brawl. All face the possibility of life in prison if convicted of the most serious charge, racketeering-attempted murder." The AP notes, "Each has pleaded not guilty, and defense lawyers say the men will argue they were attacked first. … 'The tapes are going to reveal clearly that the Hells Angels were threatened and were engaged in lawful self-defense,' said lawyer David Chesnoff, who represents defendant Calvin Schaefer of Chandler, Ariz. … Chesnoff has argued previously that police knew trouble was brewing and federal agents missed a chance to prevent violence at the 2002 Laughlin rally, an annual event that draws tens of thousands of motorcycle enthusiasts to the Colorado River resort town about 100 miles southeast of Las Vegas."

Many Business Web Sites Vulnerable To Cyber Crime. The New York Times (9/27, Strom, 1.21M) reports, "When Ralph Nader wrote 'Unsafe at Any Speed' in 1965, he exposed how certain design decisions had made some automobiles inherently unsafe. Much the same can be said for Web sites these days. Many sites contain inherent design flaws that leave them ripe for exploitation. Unlike lack of seat belts in cars, these flaws are not immediately obvious and the fixes are not simple. … 'A business owner has risks even if they aren't doing e-commerce and if they just have a Web site,' said Shena Crowe, an agent in the F.B.I.'s San Francisco field office who has helped prosecute cybercriminals who used Google hacks and other techniques. 'Once you are plugged into the Web, your backyard can become open, and it is easy to have your information taken from you.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069615

Analyst Finds Few Cases Of ID Theft Despite Surge In Data Losses. The New York Times (9/27, Lohr, 1.21M) reports, "In the last 12 months alone, the personal records of nearly 73 million people, from Social Security numbers to credit-card accounts, have been lost or stolen, in reported incidents compiled by ID Analytics, a San Diego company that provides fraud-detection services to banks, cellphone operators and other companies. … But while high-profile data breaches are common, there is no evidence of a surge in identity theft or financial fraud as a result. In fact, there is scant evidence that identity theft and financial fraud have increased at all. … 'The threat of identity theft from data losses is being greatly exaggerated,' said Fred H. Cate, the director of the Center for Applied Cybersecurity Research at Indiana University in Bloomington. 'And that's because a lot of people have fallen into the trap of equating data loss with identity theft.'"

US Seeks Death Penalty For Two In DC Drug Conspiracy. The Washington Times (9/27, Mcelhatton) reports, "Federal prosecutors have filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty against two D.C. men charged with running a violent drug gang in Southeast." The Times continues, "The men, Antwuan Ball and David Wilson, reportedly led the Congress Park Crew, which authorities say dealt hundreds of kilograms of crack cocaine in Southeast for more than a decade. The gang resorted to homicide, assault and armed robbery, authorities said." The Times adds, "The move to seek the death penalty marks the second time in a year that the U.S. Department of Justice has declared it will seek capital punishment in the District. … In the other case, Larry Gooch, described as an enforcer in the M Street Crew in Northeast, has been charged in five killings and is expected to go to trial in January. … Only two capital murder cases have gone to trial in the District since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976. The District has no statute for the death penalty, but capital punishment can be pursued in federal cases if authorized by the U.S. attorney general. … However, there are questions about whether the move to seek the death penalty against Ball and Wilson came too late. … Last week, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts issued a ruling barring the death penalty in the case." The Times notes, "Judge Roberts wrote that the Justice Department did not comply with his order setting a Sept. 15 deadline for a decision on whether to seek capital punishment. On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office filed the notice to seek the death penalty and asked Judge Roberts to reconsider. … 'The process took as long as it did not because the government was insensitive to the speedy trial rights of the defendants, but because we were giving additional and extra careful consideration to defendants' interests,' Assistant U.S. Attorneys Glenn S. Leon and Ann H. Petalas told Judge Roberts in a memo."

Gambling Companies Warned Not To Accept Bets In Louisiana. The Financial Times (9/27, Ward, Blitz) reports, "Louisiana police have warned all online gambling companies to stop accepting bets in the state or risk having their executives and directors arrested if they visit the US. The police official responsible for the arrest of Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet, on a Louisiana warrant in New York three weeks ago, said the state was pressing ahead with its clampdown, in spite of what appears to be a rethink about the case in other political jurisdictions." The Times adds, "It is understood Louisiana has sealed warrants against more than 50 people working or connected to at least a dozen online gambling or related companies. … Louisiana is one of several US states that has its own laws prohibiting internet gambling."

Conspiracy Trial Begins For Two Alleged MS-13 Members. The Baltimore Sun (9/27, Dolan) reports that the racketeering conspiracy trial of two alleged members of La Mara Salvatrucha, a violent street gang known as MS-13, began Tuesday with allegations that the two men, Edgar Alberto Ayala, known as "Pony," and Oscar Ramos Velasquez, known as "Casper" "participated in a well-oiled criminal organization responsible for at least six homicides and five attempted killings." The Sun adds, "Formed in California by Salvadoran immigrants who have spread eastward, MS-13 'is without any doubt a criminal enterprise,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson told jurors Tuesday. 'The objective of this gang is to kill people.' Dubbed one of the nation's most violent and fastest-growing gangs, MS-13 has a relatively low profile outside of the Washington suburbs. But experts say its strength is growing throughout Maryland as the overall Hispanic population expands its reach beyond Prince George's and Montgomery counties."

DOJ_NMG_0069616

The Washington Post (9/27, B7, Castaneda) reports that MS-13 "has rules that include a standing edict to kill rival gang members, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson said in her opening statement in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. … Prosecutors said in court papers that the gang has 10,000 members in 10 states and the District, as well as in El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico. Wilkinson said MS-13 has many cliques, which she compared to business franchises. … MS-13 gang members have conspired to commit murder, rape, kidnapping and robbery and to obstruct justice by attacking or intimidating witnesses, federal prosecutors allege in their original indictment and two superseding indictments."

Murders Of Three Teens Raises Alarms Across DC. The Washington Post (9/27, B1, Klein, Weil) reports that the murders of three teenagers in a 24 hour period in DC has raised "alarm across the city. DC police said none of the three cases appears to be related, but all three are homicides. That raises to 15 the number of slayings of victims in the city this year who were younger than 18. In all of last year there were 12. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said last night that a man, about 50, had been taken into custody in the death of the 15-year-old, Dominick A. Dixon. Ramsey said the man had made a statement about the killing to police. No arrests have been reported in the other two killings. Police said last night that Dixon's death was a homicide. But they did not say how he was slain, and autopsy results had not been released."

Thieves Killed Cutting Into Power Lines For Copper. USA Today (9/27, Koch) reports, "At least seven men in five states have been fatally electrocuted since July while hacking through power lines to steal wire made of copper, which has been commanding near-record prices, police say. … Nationwide, police report copper thieves stealing wires from air conditioning units, exposed pipes from underneath homes, vases from graveyards in Sumter, S.C., and bells from a church in Yonkers, N.Y." USA adds, "Police have reported three deaths since July in Fort Worth, Pineville, W.Va., and Aurora, Colo. There are no national figures, but the number of copper thefts and related deaths is 'probably at the highest level it's ever been,' says Kenneth Geremia, spokesman for the Copper Development Association, a trade group. He says copper is completely recyclable and can sell for $3 a pound at scrap yards."

Philadelphia Man Charged With Defrauding Victim-Assistance Program. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/27, Shiffman, 399K) reports, "A Philadelphia man was charged yesterday with staging fake armed robberies in scams that netted $385,000 from the state's victim-assistance program." David Toomer "is accused of staging robberies from 2000 to 2002, then enlisting the help of a former accomplice, an unnamed chiropractor, to help him stage fake accidents this year." The Inquirer notes, "Toomer was arrested by the FBI on April 28 in the parking lot of the Holiday Inn on Packer Avenue as he allegedly conspired with an unnamed chiropractor to stage a fake accident. By then, the chiropractor had begun cooperating with authorities, according to an affidavit by FBI Agent Therese Nestor, and had been audiotaped and videotaped discussing the scam." The Philadelphia Daily Mail (9/27, Hinkelman) adds, "Toomer, who used at least two aliases during the alleged scheme, was charged with mail fraud and health-care fraud. His attorney said yesterday that Toomer plans to plead guilty. … Authorities said the investigation is continuing. Toomer is out on bail."

Seven In Three States Indicted On Katrina Aid Fraud Charges. The Detroit News (9/27, Egan) reports, "Five Detroit-area women, an Indiana man and a Mississippi woman fraudulently obtained nearly $30,000 in relief money intended for Hurricane Katrina victims and used the cash to buy cars, narcotics and other items, the federal government alleged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday. … None was directly affected by the…storm," but "each obtained between $2,000 and $12,750 in Federal Emergency Management Agency aid, mainly by falsely claiming they lived in New Orleans when the storm hit, according to complaints filed in U.S. District Court." Defendants Pamela Reason and Curtisine Ingram "told investigators they used some of the Katrina money to buy narcotics," and "other items allegedly purchased with the $28,182 include two cars, clothing, eyeglasses and food." The AP (9/27) also reports on the indictments.

Paper Executive Sentenced To 15 Years In Prison For $300-Million Fraud. Newsday (9/26, Kessler) reported, "The former head of a Hauppauge-based national paper manufacturing conglomerate was sentenced" Monday "to 15 years in prison for a $300-million fraud involving his firm, American Tissue, which was once the nation's fourth-largest producer of paper towels, tissues and toilet paper." Iranian immigrant "Mehdi Gabayzadeh, 62, of Great Neck also was ordered to make restitution of $65 million and serve five years' supervised release by U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert in Central Islip." Newsday notes that "a drop in paper prices resulted in sharp financial losses that Gabayzadeh attempted to cover up by lying to lenders, and then to creditors after the company was forced into bankruptcy." The Manchester Union-Leader (9/26, Colquhoun) reports that in addition to prison, Gabayzadeh "must make $65 million in restitution and will be on probation for five years after he serves his prison term. … 'It's not enough time, but we have to put it behind us and move on,' said Gorham [NH] Town Manager Bill Jackson. 'It was more than I expected him to get, but it wasn't enough,' said Berlin [NH] Mayor Bob Danderson. … 'He exemplifies the worst of American greed.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069617

The AP (9/27, Eltman) reports, "In seeking a stiff sentence, prosecutors had compared Mehdi Gabayzadeh's misdeeds to those of better-known white-collar corporate criminals, including Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas and former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers. 'The purpose of this sentence is to demonstrate that white-collar crime hurts just as much as blue-collar crime,' said U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert. … Prosecutors estimated 2,700 people across the country, including Wisconsin, Vermont and Tennessee, lost their jobs" when American Tissue bankrupted. The New York Times/Bloomberg (9/27) also briefly reported on Gabayzadeh's sentencing.

New York Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Prison For Investment Fraud. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (9/22, Busse) reported, "A New York man will serve one year and eight months in prison for his role in an investment scheme that bilked a Lynchburg resident out of more than $385,000." Dennis Testa "was convicted in March of conspiracy to commit money laundering. He was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court in Charlottesville." The News & Advance noted co-conspirator Nicholas Lanza "was sentenced Sept. 1 to 2½ years in prison and ordered to pay $30,000 in restitution. … The Lynchburg resident was the biggest victim of the scam. In all, the pair took more than $400,000 from seven people in five states."

New York's Local Courts Survive Despite A Century Of Criticism. The New York Times (9/27, Glaberson) reports that over the last century, at least nine commissions other state bodies have denounced New York State's town and village courts. The Times adds, "Although they are key institutions of justice in more than 1,000 small towns and suburbs across New York, trying misdemeanor cases and lawsuits, a vast majority of the justices who run them are not lawyers, and receive only a few days' legal training. The justices are often elected in low-turnout races, keep few records and operate largely without supervision — leaving a long trail of injustices and mangled rulings. Yet these justice courts, as they are known, remain essentially as they were when New Yorkers started complaining nearly a century ago."

Officials Use Forensic Techniques To Diagnose Elder Abuse. The New York Times (9/27, Gross) reports that public health and law enforcement officials "are learning to speak the same language and using the same forensic techniques as those popularized on the three C.S.I. television series to diagnose elder abuse and neglect. For decades, the techniques have been the state-of-the-art approach for investigating child abuse and domestic violence. But elder abuse has lagged far behind, suffering from a lack of financing, research and data. Now change is in the air, and forensic techniques are just one of many new initiatives nationwide to protect the elderly." The Times adds, "Congress is also expected to consider, before the October recess, the Elder Justice Act of 2006, which would create the first nationwide database on elder abuse, replacing inconsistent or unavailable data. The legislation, which has bipartisan support, also assigns a federal official to coordinate projects and technical assistance."

Internet Revives Land Scams. USA Today (9/27, El Nasser) reports that the Internet "is reviving a grand old American tradition: land scams. Thousands of lots in phantom subdivisions that were sold decades ago to people who hoped to build retirement homes in warm states are reappearing on online sites such as the Internet giant eBay. The new wave of land scams has the potential to snooker millions more around the world because of the Internet's broad and instantaneous reach. Many of the lots being sold have never been developed because they are on swampland in Florida or isolated desert ranchland in Texas and Arizona. There is no road access, water or power. The land might be developed someday, but county officials who are busy processing a surge in deed transfers are skeptical."

DOJ_NMG_0069618

"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Enters Guilty Plea. The Washington Times (9/27, Seper) reports that Jospeh Francis, founder of the "Girls Gone Wild" video series "has pleaded guilty to charges of failing to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in his sexually explicit films." Francis "entered the guilty plea Monday before U.S. District Judge Margaret Morrow in Los Angeles. Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Francis pleaded guilty to two counts filed under a law passed by Congress to prevent sexual exploitation of children. … Under the agreements, she said, Francis agreed to pay the maximum fine of $500,000 and his two companies agreed to pay an additional $1.6 million in fines and restitution."

Tennessee Man Sentenced For Removing Classified Data. The Knoxville (TN) News-Sentinel (9/27, Satterfield) reports, "Retired U.S. Navy man Everett Ashley Blauvelt Jr. had no intention of betraying his country when he played fast and loose with 'secret restricted data' at the Y-12 National Security Complex in Oak Ridge, defense attorney Tom Dillard said Tuesday. … 'It was just a bad mistake,' Dillard said." The News-Sentinel continues, "Blauvelt, 61, pleaded guilty before U.S. Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton to a misdemeanor charge he removed classified information from Y-12, where components for the country's nuclear weapons arsenal are made, while working there as an employee of contractor BWXT in 2000. … Guyton sentenced Blauvelt to a one-year probationary term." The News-Sentinel adds, "According to documents filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court by Assistant U.S. Attorney David Dake, Blauvelt worked for BWXT as a 'shift technical adviser' and 'held secret and Q-security clearances.' … His job gave him access to classified information including documents labeled 'secret restricted data' because of references to nuclear weapon making and the potential to cause 'serious damage' to national security, Dake told Guyton. … The exact nature of the information at issue in Blauvelt's case was not disclosed in court records, although some of it apparently involved data on fellow employees. … At some point in late 2000, an allegation was made to Blauvelt's bosses that he had 'compiled a database containing detailed personal and sensitive information about co-workers,' Dake wrote. … It's not clear why Blauvelt broke the security rules, but Dillard insisted -- and the Justice Department agreed in allowing a misdemeanor plea -- that there is no proof that Blauvelt intended to market the classified information."

Resolution Of San Diego Pension Fund Scandal Criticized. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) says in an editorial that San Diego "is approaching the bitter end-game on its pension-fund scandal, with the Securities and Exchange Commission expected to release its own report on the city council's decade-long bender of overpromising benefits and underfunding its pension fund. The SEC is likely to require the city's government to take steps to ensure that the fiasco isn't repeated, allowing it to re-enter the municipal-bond market." But the "nightmare won't end there for San Diego taxpayers, who are left holding the bag for the misfeasance of the city council. For them, two big issues remain: Will the extravagant promises to city employees be honored without regard to their cost or the improprieties involved in making those promises? Second, will the city council be held accountable for creating this mess?"

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Rule On Use Of Union Dues For Political Activity. The Washington Post (9/27, A8, Lane, 748K) reports that the Supreme Court has announced that it will decide "whether states may require organized labor to ask some workers for permission to spend their union fees on political activity. The case addresses the agency fees that some states require workers to pay to labor organizations for representation, even if they chose not to join the unions. The court said it would review a Washington state Supreme Court ruling that struck down a state law barring the use of those fees for political purposes without workers' consent. … The law had been adopted by Washington voters as part of a referendum on campaign finance reform." But "the state's high court ruled 6 to 3 earlier this year that the law violated unions' First Amendment rights because it presumes workers would object to labor leaders' spending choices."

The Washington Times (9/27, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The dispute actually involves two cases. One is an appeal by the state's attorney general defending the law, and the other is an appeal on behalf of teachers." Stefan Gleason, vice president of the Fairfax-based National Right to Work Foundation, "which is working on behalf of the teachers, said the case has big stakes because the state court's ruling could be seen to create a right to collect money even from nonunion teachers."

DOJ_NMG_0069619

The New York Times (9/27, Greenhouse, 1.21M) reports, "From the labor unions' point of view, the difference between permitting nonmembers to 'opt out' and requiring them to 'opt in' is substantial." They "argue that it is burdensome to have to seek permission from nonmembers, and that nonmembers who do not exercise their opt-out rights should be seen as acquiescing in the expenditures."

LATimes Criticizes Class Action Light Cigarette Lawsuit. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, 918K) says in an editorial that an appeals court "must decide whether, as a matter of law, a federal judge in Brooklyn erred in refusing to block a class-action racketeering lawsuit against tobacco companies on behalf of millions of smokers of 'light' cigarettes. But lay people are likely to scratch their heads over District Judge Jack B. Weinstein's decision to let this lawsuit proceed — especially when they learn that the damage supposedly caused by the tobacco industry was to smokers' wallets, not their lungs." If Weinstein "isn't overruled, his decision will be a windfall for lawyers, a disaster for tobacco companies — which already have agreed to pay out billions of dollars as part of a settlement with state attorneys general — and a travesty for the cause of due process."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Rohrabacher Asks For DOJ Probe Of Border Agents' Prosecution. The Washington Times (9/27, Seper) reports, "Rep. Dana Rohrabacher yesterday asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate what he called 'the exceedingly harsh prosecution' of two U.S. Border Patrol agents now facing 20 years in prison for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks. … 'This proceeding has garnered national attention calling into question the administration's commitment to secure our borders,' said Mr. Rohrabacher, adding that the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean – 'were simply doing their jobs to guard our homeland by attempting to apprehend an illegal drug smuggler.'" The Times continues, "The California Republican's letter also called for the agents' sentencing next month to be postponed 'due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding' their prosecution. … Mr. Rohrabacher joins a growing list of Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill who have asked for congressional hearings and reviews by the White House and Justice Department into the prosecution. … 'It appears the facts do not add up or justify the length of the sentences for these agents, let alone their conviction on multiple counts,' Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said in a letter last month to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, requesting a full hearing into the matter. … 'Undue prosecution of Border Patrol agents could have a chilling effect on their ability to carry out their duties,' she said."

Boston Police Officer Charged With Violating Civil Rights Of Prostitute. The Boston Globe (9/27, Murphy, 425K) reports, "A 19-year-old prostitute feared that no one would believe her if she said an off-duty Boston police officer kept forcing her to perform sex in his car. So one night, she fled his car with a key piece of evidence: his badge," and "when Officer Michael LoPriore called the woman to get his badge back, the FBI was listening, too. LoPriore, 37, of Everett, was charged in federal court yesterday with depriving the woman of her rights by using his position as a police officer to coerce her to perform sex in September 2004. According to a plea agreement filed with the court by the US attorney's public corruption unit, LoPriore, a 12-year Boston police veteran, will plead guilty, resign from the department, and never seek another job as a police officer in Massachusetts." The Boston Herald (927, Sweet, McPhee, 203K) notes acting Boston police Commissioner Albert Goslin said, "Getting rid of characters of his ilk can't be done quick enough. We don't make excuses for anybody." The AP (9/27) also reports on the charges against Lopriore.

Missouri Ice Cream Company Managers Indicted On Human Trafficking Charges. The Kansas City Star (9/21, Rizzo, 278K) reported, "Two managers of a Kansas City ice cream company were indicted…on new charges related to the alleged forced labor of Russian students who drove ice cream trucks." David L. Carslake and David H. Mackintosh "were among five men charged…in U.S. District Court in Kansas City with violating federal human trafficking laws," then "a grand jury in Springfield indicted Carslake and Mackintosh on a charge of document servitude for allegedly confiscating the passports and other identification documents of the eight young Russian men identified as victims in the human trafficking case. Carslake was also indicted on a charge of visa fraud for allegedly making false statements in federal immigration documents concerning the status of the Russian students."

DOJ_NMG_0069620

The AP (9/21) noted, "Authorities said the men collaborated to force the students to work for Frosty Treats ice cream truck company of Kansas City by telling them they would be seriously harmed if they refused. All five are charged with aiding and abetting each other from Jan. 1 to Sept. 17 to obtain forced labor. … The eight students from Voronozh, Russia, were recruited under a summer work program run by the Russian company InterAir, according to an affidavit filed in support of the case."

Cambodia Cracks Down On Child Sex Trade. The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Piore) reports that Cambodia is cracking down on the child sex trade. This year, officials "have arrested at least 12 foreigners on charges of sexually abusing children - more than twice the amount snagged all of last year. In addition to three Americans, they've caught four Germans, an elderly Swiss man, a Belgium national, and at least three Vietnamese nationals who helped the foreigners procure children." The Monitor adds, "It's a trend that's been in the offing since at least 2000, when Cambodia first launched a major initiative funded by foreign donors aimed at targeting the exploitation of women and children and set up a hotline to receive tips."

Racist Graffiti Forces Charles County To Confront Race Relations Problem. The Washington Post (9/27, B1, Rucker, Wan) reports, "A wave of offensive graffiti and vandalism in the past seven weeks" is forcing Charles County, Maryland to confront "what some residents say has existed for years: a race relations problem. As Charles transforms from a land of sprawling tobacco farms to a far-flung exurb of Washington, few have spoken openly about what one black resident calls 'the browning of Charles County' -- the movement of large numbers of middle-class black families to an area that not long ago was predominantly white." The Post adds, "At least 10 incidences of racist graffiti or vandalism, all classified as hate crimes, have occurred in Charles since mid-August. … FBI agents are planning to join authorities in their search for the vandals at the request of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the House Democratic whip, whose district includes Southern Maryland."

Judge Says Louisiana Parish Schools On Target For Release From Federal Oversight. The Baton Rouge Advocate (9/27, Burgess) reports, "The St. Landry Parish school system is on track to be released from federal oversight by the end of next year, the federal judge handling the parish's desegregation case said Tuesday." The Advocate continues, "U.S. District Judge Tucker Melancon made the comments during a quarterly meeting in Lafayette with St. Landry Parish school system officials and School Board members. … 'My intention in this case is to get it over as soon as possible,' Melancon said. '… Barring some unforeseen circumstance, it's going to happen next December (2007).'" The Advocate adds, "Melancon said he hopes to convene court in Opelousas — the St. Landry Parish seat — for the formal hearing to declare the school system "unitary," or free from discrimination. … Several legal hurdles remain. … To be freed from federal oversight, school officials must show discrimination has been eliminated in six areas. … Melancon ruled last year that three areas were unitary: transportation, faculty assignment and extracurricular activities. … The school system still must show discrimination does not affect decisions on the quality of education offered to students, the quality of facilities and student assignment." The Advocate notes, "A hearing was set for Tuesday on a motion by the School Board for unitary status in the area of quality of education. … That hearing was delayed to allow Justice Department attorneys time to review a forthcoming report from the state with information about racial balance in special-education programs, an issue raised in St. Landry Parish."

House Passes Parental Notification Bill. The New York Times/AP (9/27) reports, "Accompanying a minor across a state line to obtain an abortion and avoid parental notification in the girl's home state would become a federal crime under a bill the House passed Tuesday on a vote of 264 to 153." Supporters of the legislation "argued that it made no sense that minors who need parental permission to get an aspirin at school or to go on field trips can get an abortion without telling their parents." The bill's sponsor, GOP Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, said, "It protects minors from exploitation from the abortion industry, it promotes strong family ties and it helps foster respect for state laws."

DOJ_NMG_0069621

Opponents "argued that it would result in the arrests of grandparents and others who were trying to shield girls from abusive parents." The AP adds, "Chances are slim that the House and the Senate, which approved a more limited version of the bill in July, will devise a compromise they can send to the president before the end of this session of Congress. But the House vote gives conservatives something to showcase when they return home next week to campaign for the midterm elections."

The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Levey, 918K) says that "in a mark of the majority party's struggles with its 'values' agenda, Senate Republicans may run out of time to vote on the measure before lawmakers leave town at the end of the week." That "would leave Republicans with few trophies to show their socially conservative base as they try to motivate voters in the final six weeks of the fiercely contested 2006 campaign." The Times adds, "Some strategists fear that failure to win final passage of the bill could hamper efforts to spur turnout of a reliably Republican voting bloc — which might mean the difference in key races around the country." The bill "that the House passed Tuesday by a vote of 264 to 153 was the latest initiative in a more than decade-long campaign to chip away at abortion rights." But "aides to senior Senate Republicans said Tuesday that they could not be sure the measure would make it to the floor for a vote."

The Washington Times (9/27, Fagan, Bellantoni, 88K) notes the House action is a story titled "GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation," in which it says Senate Democrats "have blocked the final negotiations, seeking, among other things, changes to limit the notification rights of fathers who rape their daughters. It was not clear yesterday whether the Senate would act on the bill this week, but if it does, the bill would likely pass and could then go on to President Bush, supporters said."

House Approves Bill On Religious Lawsuits. The AP (9/27, Abrams) reports, "House Republicans, carrying out their election-year values agenda, on Tuesday pushed through legislation cutting off financial awards for lawsuits successfully filed against expressions of religion such as Christmas displays on government grounds." The bill, "passed 244-173, denies the awarding of attorney's fees or monetary damages to a party that wins a court case based on the establishment clause in the Constitution that is used to argue a separation of church and state." The AP adds, "There is no companion Senate bill and little chance the Senate would consider it in the waning days of this session, but the House vote was a reminder to the GOP's conservative base that their issues are not being ignored."

The Washington Post (9/27, A4, Cooperman, 748K) reports, "Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office, said the measure is 'election-year red meat for the Christian right, because they've been complaining they haven't gotten enough from this Congress.'" The American Legion, the Southern Baptist Convention "and other conservative groups began pushing for the legislation after a Pennsylvania judge awarded $2 million to the ACLU of Pennsylvania and Americans United for Separation of Church and State. The two groups had successfully sued the school board in Dover, Pa., for requiring science teachers to teach "intelligent design" alongside evolution. The award was later reduced to $1 million." The Washington Times (9/27, Fagan, Bellantoni, 88K) notes the House action is a story titled "GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation," in which it says "if the Public Expression of Religion Act were to become law, groups like the American Civil Liberties Union would be barred from receiving legal fees if they prevail in a court battle."

Texas Court Case Tests Limits Of Legal Intervention In Church Affairs. The New York Times (9/27, Blumenthal, 1.21M) reports Peggy Lee Penley of Fort Worth, Texas sought marriage counseling from her pastor, C.L. Westbrook, Jr., who "disclosed her 'biblically inappropriate relationship'" with another man "to church elders" and eventually "the full congregation of the church." In 2001, Ms. Penley "sued her pastor for defamation and negligence, saying he had violated his responsibilities as a professional counselor. Her lawsuit has attracted considerable attention from church groups trying to prevent court intervention in religious matters. The case went before the Texas Supreme Court on Tuesday, and the outcome will once again help define the evolving line between church and state." While courts "have long held that religious practices and discipline are immune from court review under a legal doctrine known as 'ecclesiastical abstention,' secular misconduct by religious figures is not automatically protected." Church groups "have leapt into the case, submitting briefs that warn of growing attacks on religious autonomy."

DOJ_NMG_0069622

ANTITRUST:

Wright Bill Backers Press For Compromise. The Dallas Morning News (9/27, Reddy) reports, "Legislation to lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field could come down to the wire to clear both the House and Senate before a pre-election recess." The News continues, "Finding a procedural path for the Wright legislation has proven elusive on both sides of the Capitol as congressional leaders try to rush through major legislation before returning home Saturday to campaign for the November elections. … Still, lawmakers from North Texas weren't conceding Tuesday that the issue would have to fall into the lame-duck session. … Getting the bill cleared Friday or early Saturday remained a possibility. … 'It's not dead for this week, but it's still in flux,' said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth." The News adds, "The legislation would implement a June compromise to repeal the 1979 Wright amendment. … The bill needs to be enacted by the end of the year, or the agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport will expire. … The House is awaiting action on an original version of the legislation and one amended by the House Judiciary Committee that removes an exemption from antitrust laws."

Bill Faces More Opposition. The Dallas Business Journal (9/27) reports, "Opposition to the Wright Amendment compromise bill continues to mount locally, as a new study says the bill will cost consumers billions, and two consumer groups have written House Democratic leaders to protest the bill." The Journal continues, "The study was conducted by Steven A. Morrison, a member of the Department of Economics at Northeastern University and editor in chief of the Journal of Transport Economics and Policy. The study was solicited by the law firm of Bickel & Brewer, which represents Love Terminal Partners, which has filed a lawsuit over the local agreement that the Wright compromise bill is based on. … In the report, Morrison looked at U.S. Department of Transportation data on airline fares and passenger volume to estimate the effects on consumers of full repeal versus the proposed agreement. … He said by fully repealing the bill consumers would recognize $726 million annually, compared to between $117 million and $383 million annually from through ticketing."

Johnson & Johnson Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Deal. The AP (9/27, Johnson) reports, "Months after Johnson & Johnson lost a bidding war for medical-device maker Guidant, J&J is suing the winner, Boston Scientific, and Abbott Laboratories, alleging the two companies induced Guidant to breach its agreement with J&J." The AP continues, New Brunswick.-based Johnson & Johnson is seeking $5.5 billion in damages, according to the lawsuit, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in New York. The lawsuit also seeks reimbursement for court costs, attorney fees and interest." The AP adds, "The suit asks the court to rule that Indianapolis-based Guidant Corp. breached the companies' merger agreement and that Boston Scientific Corp. and Abbott Laboratories Inc. intentionally interfered with the deal and induced Guidant to breach it. … Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific trumped Johnson & Johnson's final $24.2 billion offer with a $27.2 billion bid to acquire Guidant and its portfolio of stents, defibrillators, pacemakers and other medical devices. … Guidant paid Johnson & Johnson a $705 million breakup fee after it opted to accept Boston Scientific's offer in late January. To eliminate possible antitrust snags, Boston Scientific agreed to sell Guidant's stent and vascular business to Abbott for $4.1 billion and a $900 million loan."

UPI (9/27) reports, "Johnson & Johnson alleges in its New York federal lawsuit, which also names Abbott Laboratories, that Boston Scientific prevailed 'only because Guidant leaked confidential information to a third party, Abbott, for the purpose of arranging a prepackaged divestiture of significant Guidant businesses to Abbott,' Boston Business Journal said. … Once Guidant had done so, Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific, 'which allowed Boston Scientific to make an offer for Guidant that would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review,' the suit says."

Bloomberg (9/27, Glovin, Goldstein) reports, "Since defeating J&J, Boston Scientific has been buffeted by product recalls, falling sales, profit warnings, analyst downgrades and growing legal risks, driving the company's market value down to $21.8 billion from $31.2 billion in less than five months. … J&J lost the deal in January, when Abbott made financing agreement that enabled Boston Scientific to snatch Guidant, the lawsuit said. Guidant accepted the bid as superior to J&J's offer, and J&J promptly received a $705 million termination fee from Guidant."

DOJ_NMG_0069623

Judge Dismisses Part Of AMD's Claim Against Intel. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Clark) reports, "A federal judge dismissed major portions of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s high-profile antitrust suit against Intel Corp., accepting Intel's argument that many of AMD's claims are beyond the reach of U.S. law." AMD "accuses Intel of illegally maintaining a monopoly in the market for microprocessor chips that act as the brains in most personal computers. Its suit, filed in June 2005 in federal court in Delaware, questions Intel's business tactics in several countries, including Britain, Germany and Japan. Intel, of Santa Clara, Calif., asked the judge to dismiss AMD claims that are based on the foreign effect of Intel's alleged tactics. … US District Judge Joseph Farnan sided with Intel. He ruled that AMD 'has not demonstrated that the alleged foreign conduct of Intel has direct, substantial and foreseeable effects in the United States which gives rise to its claim.'"

DeCode Genetics Sues Former Employees For Stealing Trade Secrets. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Regalado) reports that Icelandic gene hunting company DeCode Genetics Inc. is suing five ex-employees for stealing trade secrets and breach of contract. The Journal reports that the case "may threaten a major US project to study the DNA of children." Four of the five former employees of DeCode Genetics Inc. "now work for Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, which in June announced a high-profile plan to collect and study DNA from some 100,000 children. … In its suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, DeCode asked the court to prevent CHOP or its former employees from using any of its trade secrets. In a statement, CHOP officials said the 'hospital believes that the claims against its researchers are without merit and that they will prevail in the lawsuit.' The hospital said it would 'vigorously' defend its employees and its own research program."

Think Tank Director Says Microsoft Can't Be Guilty Of A Crime Before It Commits It. Alberto Mingardi, director general of Istituto Bruno Leoni, a Milan-based free-market think tank, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/27), "Quarrels between the European Commission and Microsoft seem to be the daily bread in Brussels. … Since March, the Commission has expressed concerns about Vista, the new version of Windows, ready to be released in a few months but waiting for an informal greenlight from Brussels. … The new operating system's alleged future dominance is merely a prediction, albeit a reasonable one based on the history of previous iterations of Windows. Still, there can be no evidence of the size of Vista's market share until it is released and sold." Mingardi adds, "You cannot be 'guilty' of any crime before you have committed it and been accused, much less proven, of having committed it. This is a basic tenant of legal certainty as we know it. Why should it not continue to apply to competition policy?"

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Regent Radio Station Buy. The AP (9/27) reports, "Radio broadcasting company Regent Communications Inc. received antitrust approval from the Federal Trade Commission to buy five radio stations serving the Buffalo, N.Y., market from CBS Corp. for $125 million in cash." The AP continues, "The FTC on Monday granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law, according to the agency's Web site." The AP adds, "Cincinnati-based Regent announced on Sept. 5 that it planned to operate the Buffalo stations -- WBLK-FM, WBUF-FM, WJYE-FM, WYRK-FM and WECK-AM -- through a local marketing agreement starting in October. … After the deal closes, Regent will own and operate 19 radio stations in the Upstate New York region including stations in the Buffalo, Albany, Utica/Rome and Watertown markets."

Kroes Claims US Lobbied Her Over Microsoft Fine. CNET News (9/27, Thurston) reports, "The U.S. government sought to influence the European Commission over Microsoft's antitrust case, according to Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes." CNET continues, "Kroes said the U.S. Embassy in Brussels, Belgium, had asked her to be 'nicer' to Microsoft ahead of her decision to fine the software giant 280 million euros ($357 million) in July. … The commissioner criticized the approach. 'This is of course an intervention which is not possible,' Kroes told Dutch newspaper Financieele Dagblad this week." CNET adds, "When asked if she was annoyed by the embassy's approach, she said: 'In my work, I cannot have a preference. I have, however, a personal opinion, but that is for Saturday night.' … Kroes' representative added in an e-mail to CNET News.com's sister site ZDNet UK on Tuesday: 'We can confirm that she was lobbied and that she did not appreciate it.'" CNET notes, "Microsoft declined to comment on Kroes' claims, but an insider insisted that the company had not tried to influence discussions between the U.S. government and the EC. … The U.S. Embassy had not responded to requests for comment at the time of writing."

DOJ_NMG_0069624

New Jersey MLS Withdraws Display Policy. Inman News (9/27, Roberts) reports, "The New Jersey Multiple Listing Service, a regional MLS in Northern New Jersey that is owned and operated by two local Realtor organizations, has withdrawn a policy that prevented some property listings from reaching Realtor.com and several other home-search Web sites." Inman continues, "While New Jersey MLS officials were reportedly contacted by representatives for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission -- an agency that has been investigating similar policies at more than a dozen other MLSs across the country -- MLS officials stated in a communication to members this month that the decision to rescind the rule was in response to the practices of neighboring MLSs. … National Association of Realtors general counsel Laurie Janik announced earlier this year that 14 separate government investigations had been launched over MLS policies that prevent some property listings information from being publicly displayed on some public Web sites. The Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin MLS changed its restrictions relating to the public display of some property listings in late August after an FTC investigation." Inman notes, "The Northern New England Real Estate Network and Austin Board of Realtors in Texas also lifted similar restrictions, and both of these groups announced agreements with the FTC in response to investigations."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Allows California Auto Emissions Suit To Proceed. The AP (9/27, Thompson) reports, "Automakers can continue their lawsuit seeking to block strict vehicle emission standards adopted two years ago by California regulators, a federal judge ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii sided preliminarily with a coalition of automakers on their three major arguments against the state law, which was passed in 2002 and adopted two years later by the state air board. In a ruling Monday,Ishii threw out two lesser arguments, but ruled the suit should go to trial Jan. 30." The AP adds, "The tailpipe standards adopted by the California Air Resources Board were designed to cut greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks by 25 percent and from sport utility vehicles by 18 percent starting in 2009. Ten other U.S. states have since adopted the California standard. … The automobile industry sued in U.S. District Court in Fresno, California, arguing that the state law amounts to an attempt to set new fuel-economy standards, something it says can be done only by the federal government. .. . The judge ruled that automakers can continue with their argument that allowing states to set their own emission standards would violate two federal laws that reserve that power to the federal government. Ishii also allowed an argument by the automakers that California's regulations would undermine the federal government's ability to conduct a uniform foreign policy."

NOAA Researchers Accuse White House Of Blocking Warming Report. USA Today/AP (9/27) reports, "The Bush administration has blocked release of a report that suggests global warming is contributing to the frequency and strength of hurricanes, the journal Nature reported Tuesday. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration disputed the Nature article, saying there was not a report but a two-page fact sheet about the topic. The information was to be included in a press kit to be distributed in May as the annual hurricane season approached but wasn't ready." NOAA spokesman Jordan St. John said, responding to the Nature article, "The White House never saw it, so they didn't block it."

Seattle Law Firm Represents 76 Clients In Tainted Spinach Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Tesoriero, Lattman) reports on the Seattle law firm Marler Clark which had filed its first bad spinach lawsuit before health officials warned the public about possibly tainted spinach. As "word of the bacteria outbreak began to spread this month, lawyers at the firm posted messages on the firm's E. coli blog, www.ecoliblog.com1. They reached out to reporters and waited for the calls and emails to stream in. Now Marler Clark is representing 76 clients. Bill Marler, a 49-year-old partner in the firm, tracks them with Post-it Notes on a US map hanging in his office." The Journal adds, "A tiny firm with six attorneys, a staff epidemiologist and a nurse, Marler Clark has in the past eight years established itself as the go-to place for victims of food-borne illnesses. The firm's niche practice requires it to connect quickly with new, often widely dispersed clients as an outbreak unfolds, making effective marketing paramount. The firm has pursued an aggressive brand-building campaign, including speaking engagements, media interviews and an extensive Internet presence."

DOJ_NMG_0069625

Ohio Town Has Been A Test Lab On Air Pollution Since 1970's. The New York Times (9/27, Barringer) reports that since the 1970's residents of Steubenville, Ohio have been providing "details about their lung function and cardiac rhythms, about the manner of their lives and the cause of their deaths, to the science on which 21st-century air pollution policies are built. Data from Steubenville have played a central role in many decisions by the Environmental Protection Agency on air pollution regulations, including two of the more controversial — one in 2005 setting the first limits on mercury emissions, and another last week to tighten one but not both of the standards for lethal fine soot particles." The Post adds, "Three decades ago, Steubenville's reputation for having the country's foulest air made it a magnet for researchers in the young field of environmental epidemiology. … Much of that pollution, along with a noxious odor that seemed part burnt toast and part burnt metal, has disappeared along with the jobs at the larger steel plant, across the river in Weirton, W.Va. As the pollution receded, mortality rates declined."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Cali Cartel Leaders Get 30-Year Prison Sentences. There are more than 400 media references to the guilty pleas and sentencing of two reputed leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities say supplied most of the cocaine in the U.S. in the 1990s. Some examples: USA Today (9/27, Johnson) reports the surviving leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities "say once supplied up to 80% of the cocaine in the USA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to trafficking charges as the government took steps to seize an estimated $2.1 billion in cartel assets." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced to 30 years in prison, effectively ending a 20-year period in which they were key players in Colombia's violent drug trade." While they were sentenced in Miami, 28 other family members "reached a separate pact with the government to surrender their worldwide assets. … 'It doesn't get any bigger than today,' said…Karen Tandy. She said the guilty pleas represented the 'last nail in the coffin of the Cali cartel.'"

The Washington Post (9/27, Eggen, A8) notes that because of the plea agreement, half a dozen of the brothers' relatives "will not face prosecution. In addition, U.S. officials said, 28 people with ties to the pair will have a chance to be removed from a Treasury Department list that freezes the assets of 'specially designated narcotics traffickers' if they relinquish property tainted by drug money."

Bloomberg (9/26) reports Gonzales said the two men "were responsible for importing more than 200 tons of cocaine into the U.S."

The AP (9/26) reports John Walters said the cartel "had operated by terrorizing Colombian society and killing prosecutors, judges and political candidates and was responsible for 'the torture and murder of more than 100 people' whose bodies were dumped in a Colombian river to keep others downstream in fear of the gang."

In Miami, the AP (9/27) also reports the brothers "agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two probably made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. Neither brother is required to cooperate in any current or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement." A version of the AP story was used by MSNBC, Forbes, the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Gainesville Sun, Seattle Times, and other newspapers.

The New York Times (9/26) reports Walters "praised President Uribe for his 'courage' in helping to bring down the two formidable drug kingpins. 'People in the past talked about the Cali cartel as the peaceful cartel, but their reign of terror and blood, their war with Pablo Escobar in the early 90's, still haunts the collective memory of many in Colombia and many in this country that worked against them,' he said. 'The Cali cartel was one of the most powerful criminal organizations ever, seeking to buy or kill anybody that got in their way.'"

The Miami Herald (9/27) reports that on Tuesday, the Rodríguez Orejuela brothers "pleaded guilty to conspiring to smuggle tons of cocaine into the United States. The brothers also agreed to plead guilty to a separate indictment filed in New York that charged them with conspiring to launder their drug profits."

The Washington Times/UPI (9/26) cites the Miami Herald story and also reports that both brothers "are in their 60s and the sentences mean they are likely to die in federal prison."

DOJ_NMG_0069626

On its Web site, CBS News/AP (9/26) reports, "It's estimated the Orejuelas controlled 80 percent of the cocaine market in the 1990s largely because of the corporate mentality of the two brothers and the ingenious ways in which they hid drugs, such as in frozen broccoli. The Drug Enforcement Administration believes the successor organizations are fractured and will never have the clout of Cali."

BBC News (9/27) reports the brothers "were accused of organizing drug trafficking and money laundering from the Colombian prison in which they had been held since 1995." McClatchy Newspapers (9/27, Blum) also reports this story.

Significant "Drug War" Challenges Remain. ABC News (9/26) reports on its Web site that despite the latest developments in the Cali cartel case, "significant challenges remain in the drug war and the Colombian government's efforts against the FARC narco-terrorist rebel group. … According to the DEA, the FARC rebels…control large parts of the coca production areas in Colombia and are responsible for supplying more than 50 percent of the world's cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine that enters the United States."

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (9/26, story 4, 0:15, Couric) reported, "It's being called a major blow to the world's biggest supplier of cocaine. Two brothers struck a deal with U.S. prosecutors. They will forfeit $2 billion in drug money and likely spend the rest of their lives in prison, but their families won't be prosecuted."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (9/26, 3:00 p.m.) reported, "While the men, who are in their 60s, have agreed to plea deals that will likely keep them behind bars for the rest of their lives; a side deal protects half a dozen of their relatives in Colombia from facing charges. The Cali cartel once was responsible for up to 80% of the cocaine smuggled into the U.S."

FOX News (9/26, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Anyone who bought cocaine on the streets of the United States in the 1990's was likely buying it from the two men who were in court…in Miami today -- two Colombian brothers head of the Cali cartel and today after a 15 year effort, U.S. Justice Department officials brought them to justice. They got terms of 30 years in prison. They got to payback $2 billion in cocaine profits as part of their deal."

CBC Evening News (9/26, 6:35 p.m.) reported, "It's being called a major blow to the world's biggest supplier of cocaine. Two brothers, who once headed the Cali cartel in Columbia, struck a deal with U.S. Prosecutors. They will forfeit $2 billion in drug money and likely spend the rest of their lives in prison, but their families won't be prosecuted."

Local TV Coverage. WTVT-TV, Tampa-St Petersburg-Sarasota (9/26, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Both men are in their 60's and will get sentences that will most likely keep them in prison for life. The Cali cartel was once responsible for as much as 80% of the cocaine smuggled into America."

WINK-TV, Ft. Myers-Naples (9/26, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Drug kingpins pled guilty to charges in Miami. The brothers are accused of building Colombia's Cali cartel into the world's top cocaine supplier during the 1990s. Today's plea agreement was reached after months of negotiations with several U.S. agencies."

KJRH-TV TULSA, (9/26, 5:01 p.m.) reported, "A major milestone in the U.S. government's war on drugs. Two Colombians, who headed the powerful Cali cocaine cartel, pleaded guilty in Miami today to drug trafficking and money laundering charges. A federal judge immediately sentenced Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez- Orejuela to 30- years in prison. The brothers also agreed to forfeit billions of dollars in drug money. The Cali cartel was once responsible for as much as 80-percent of the cocaine smuggled into the U.S."

WBRE-TV Wilkes Barre, (9/26, 11:19 p.m.) reported, "Two Colombian drug kingpins appeared in a Miami courtroom today. Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, founders of the Cali drug cartel, pleaded guilty to charges of drug trafficking and money laundering. The brothers, who are in their 60's, were each sentenced to 30 years in a U.S prison. As part of a complex deal, the brothers agreed to turn over billions of dollars in assets connected to their drug business."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles, (9/26, 4:33 p.m.) reported, "There is no doubt that if these two brother drug lords were legitimate, they would had been in the top tier of the Forbes list of the richest people in this world."

WBFS-TV Miami, (9/26, 10:10 p.m.) reported, "In Washington, a cartel of cabinet level brass declared today's plea bargain a victory. These criminals rank as the highest level drug figures to ever occupy a U.S. jail cell. The brothers admitted to supplying most of the coke that was consumed in the U.S. in the 1990s. At its zenith, their cocaine network was shipping nearly five tons of the white powder every month most of it through south Florida, inside fence posts, shipments of ceramic tiles but all that is history now."

DOJ_NMG_0069627

KTSM-TV El Paso, (9/26, 5:13 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal a final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel."

WCIV-TV Charleston, (9/26, 11:20 p.m.) reported, "Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, ages 67 and 63, each… are two of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited to the U.S. from Columbia as part of a 1997 treaty."

Pakistani Man Gets 18-Year Sentence In Drugs-For-Weapons Scheme. The Los Angeles Times (9/26) reports a Pakistani man "was sentenced Monday to an 18-year federal prison term for his role in an international drugs-for-weapons scheme foiled by undercover U.S. agents. Syed Mustajab Shah, 55, admitted conspiring with two co-defendants to trade 5 tons of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin for four Stinger antiaircraft missiles, which they intended to sell to the Taliban. He was arrested in Hong Kong in 2002."

Beheadings Seen As Mexican Drug Cartels' New Method Of Intimidation. The San Antonio Express-News (9/26) reports Mexican drug cartels are adopting a method of intimidation made notorious by Middle Eastern terrorist groups. Already this year, at least 26 people have been decapitated in Mexico, with heads stuck on fences, dumped in trash piles and -- most recently -- tossed onto a nightclub dance floor. … In Mexico, as crime bosses fall and turf shifts, the pattern of killing is changing. The infamous Gulf and Sinaloa cartels and their smaller offshoots are fighting for control of smuggling routes from the southern border with Guatemala to the northern border with the United States."

President-elect Says Violence Fueled By Drug Smuggling Overwhelms Key Areas. The AP (9/26) reports Mexico's president-elect "says murder and mayhem fueled by drug smuggling have overwhelmed the governments of the nation's capital and key states across the country. Felipe Calderon said the wave of bloodshed knows no politics; it is ravaging state governments controlled by each of Mexico's three major parties." Calderon "will take office Dec. 1. … Authorities say more than 1,500 people have died in Mexican drug violence so far this year."

Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team. The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Harman) reports on what it calls the "calculated massacre of one of Colombia's best counternarcotics police teams." The Monitor says seven of the men on the team were members of a group of about 200 police trained by the DEA. According to the Monitor, the investigation of last May's killings in Jamundí "suggests the reach that Colombia's drug lords maintain today, and has shaken officials in Washington and Bogotá. The US Congress has temporarily frozen funding for Plan Colombia…and a chorus of disappointed and angry voices in both capitals is demanding an honest evaluation of the US' most expensive foreign aid program outside of the Middle East, six years after it set out to win the war on drugs." USA Today has posted this story on its Web site.

House Approves New Gun Show Rules. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (9/27, Hardin) reports, "The House of Representatives yesterday passed a bill to revamp federal enforcement rules for gun dealers, born in part from complaints about agents' tactics at Richmond-area gun shows." The Times-Dispatch continues, "The bipartisan bill would give the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives more tools to punish federally licensed gun dealers who break U.S. firearm-sale rules. It was passed on a vote of 277-131." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Its chief proponents, including Virginia Rep. Robert C. Scott, D-3rd, labeled the bill a balanced approach to provide needed intermediate penalties, including civil penalties or a license suspension, that fall short of revoking a dealer's license. … Warnings and revocation of licenses are the only punishments for dealers under current law." The Times-Dispatch notes, "As many as 98 percent of gun dealers' federal violations now result in nothing more than a letter of reprimand, or a meeting with ATF officials in their offices, Scott said during debate of the bill Monday."

ATF Seeks Creation Of Gang Field Office In Seattle Area. The AP (9/27) reports, "The local head of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives says he hopes to establish a permanent gang investigation field office here, part of a growing law enforcement response to gang activity statewide." The AP continues, "Kelvin Crenshaw, special agent in charge of the ATF's Seattle office, told The Seattle Times he plans to ask his bosses in Washington, D.C., this fall for permission to establish the gang office, which he said would mean more agents and funding for complex investigations." The AP adds,

DOJ_NMG_0069628

"The plan is part of a response to what law enforcement officials see as a recent increase in gang activity. In Seattle, a regional hub of such crime, 101 cases were referred to the police department's gang unit between Jan. 1 and Aug. 31 of this year - more than the 94 cases in all of 2005. … The ATF has been compiling a regional database of gang members, and last year formed a violent gang task force with members from the FBI, Seattle Police and the King County sheriff's office. Crenshaw's second-in-command, Doug Dawson, said the database will also help officials determine what cases meet the threshold for federal prosecution, determined in part by firearm use and the amount of drugs involved."

IMMIGRATION:

High Court To Consider California Immigrant Car Theft Case. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Savage) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to hear a California case to decide whether immigrants convicted of stealing a car must be deported." The Times continues, "A strict federal immigration reform law passed in 1996 says that immigrants, including permanent residents, who commit an 'aggravated felony' in the U.S. must be sent home, regardless of how long they have lived here or whether they have a family and a job. … But the Justice Department and some lower courts have disagreed on which crimes, including auto theft, are aggravated felonies." The Times adds, "Next week, the Supreme Court will take up a separate South Dakota case to determine whether immigrants who are convicted of drug possession can be deported as felons. The outcome is expected to affect tens of thousands of immigrants across the country." The Times notes, "The case before the court involves a California law on auto thefts, but government lawyers said all 50 states have similar measures. … Four years ago, Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez, a native of Peru who became a legal U.S. resident, pleaded guilty to stealing a 2002 Honda Accord in Marin County, near San Francisco, and was sentenced to three years in prison. Federal authorities took him into custody for deportation. … The 1996 law has a list of aggravated felonies that lead to deportation, including any theft that carries a prison sentence of more than a year. … Government lawyers contend that any immigrant convicted of auto theft in California should be deported under that law. … But earlier this year, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed. The court ruled that the California law is too broad to fit the definition of theft in the federal law because it includes accomplices to auto theft. … The government counters that all states have laws that allow accomplices to be charged with auto theft. … In their appeal on behalf of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, government lawyers said the 9th Circuit was wrong on two points. First, Duenas-Alvarez stole the car and therefore was a thief. And second, Congress meant to include accomplices to the crime when it wrote the federal law."

Fort Bragg ID Sweep Nets 28 Detentions. The Fayetteville (NC) Observer (9/27, Willett) reports, "Fort Bragg officials this morning detained 28 people, mostly construction workers, as they tried to enter post with false or fraudulently obtained identification." The Observer continues, "The operation — the second this year — was conducted at the All American Freeway access-control point between 6 and 8 a.m. … In July, 58 people were detained at the Knox Street and Randolph Street entrances to Fort Bragg." The Observer adds, "Tom McCollum, a Fort Bragg spokesman, said the 28 were taken to a immigration detention center in Cary. … People caught in the sweep could be charged with presenting a false or fraudulently obtained federal or state identification and criminal trespassing, according to a statement about today's operation. … Following the July 18 sweep, all but 10 of the 58 people detained were charged with illegal entry into the United States. Six people received federal jail sentences in August, and the other 42 each pleaded guilty to a single charge related to their illegal status. … Agencies involved in today's sweep included: Fort Bragg's Directorate of Security and Emergency Services, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, U.S. Marshals, the Defense Criminal Investigation Service, the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Raleigh."

Judge Orders Deportation Of Three Egyptian Students. The AP (9/27, Ross) reports from Omaha, NE, "Three Egyptian students who sparked a nationwide search when they failed to show up for a university exchange program last month were ordered deported Monday." The AP continues, "The students - Mohamed Ibrahim El Sayed El Moghazy, 20; Ahmed Refaat Saad El Moghazi El Laket, 19; and Moustafa Wagdy Moustafa El Gafary, 18 - had admitted they violated U.S. immigration laws and asked Judge James Fujimoto to allow them to return home voluntarily." The AP adds, "Fujimoto, who presided over the hearing via teleconference from Chicago, denied the request and ordered the three deported, citing their brief time in the United States, lack of long-term and family ties here and decision to flee immediately upon entering the country. … In the future, the three will need special permission to ever re-enter the U.S., which they would not have needed if they were allowed to leave voluntarily. … The three were among 17 students from Mansoura University in Egypt invited to a monthlong exchange program at Montana State University. Only six students showed up to the program, prompting U.S. authorities to issue a nationwide search for the remaining 11 students. All were detained, but none were considered a terrorism risk."

DOJ_NMG_0069629

McCain Says He Is Inclined To Vote For Narrower Immigration Bill. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Blitzer) reported that Sen. John McCain "joined with some Senate colleagues today to make a final likely futile push for comprehensive [immigration] reform this year. But later McCain told CNN he is inclined to vote for a far narrower bill now before the Senate to build a 700-mile security fence along the US-Mexico border. A short while ago, Democrat Ted Kennedy went to the Senate floor to blast that security fence bill. McCain and Kennedy are sponsors of a farther reaching bill that has been stalled in the Senate because of opposition to a key position -- a path to citizenship for many illegal immigrants."

The New York Times (9/27, Swarns, 1.21M) reports McCain and Sens. Arlen Specter and Lindsey Graham "said they supported border security, including a measure to add fencing to the border with Mexico. But they said that such measures alone would fail to deal with the illegal residence in this country of about 11 million immigrants as well as labor shortages in particular industries."

Meanwhile, USA Today/AP (9/27, Gamboa) reports, "A senior GOP senator blocked Republican leaders Tuesday in their efforts to add immigration, handgun and Internet gambling measures to a defense bill." Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, "rejected requests from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert to add the items to his bill on military pay." Warner "said in a memo to Frist he is 'firmly opposed' to including unrelated measures in the defense bill."

Supreme Court To Examine Provision In 1996 Reform. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Savage, 918K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to hear a California case to decide whether immigrants convicted of stealing a car must be deported." A "strict federal immigration reform law passed in 1996" says that "immigrants, including permanent residents, who commit an 'aggravated felony' in the US must be sent home, regardless of how long they have lived here or whether they have a family and a job." But "the Justice Department and some lower courts have disagreed on which crimes, including auto theft, are aggravated felonies."

States, Municipalities Now Enforcing Immigration Laws. The Washington Post (9/27, A1, Whoriskey, 748K) reports from Charlotte, NC, "Police here operated for years under what amounts to a 'don't ask, don't tell' policy toward illegal immigrants. As elsewhere in the United States, law enforcement officers did not check the immigration status of people they came into contact with, and in the vast majority of cases, a run-in with the law carried little threat of deportation." But "that accommodation for the burgeoning illegal population ended abruptly in April, when the Mecklenburg County sheriff's office began to enforce immigration law, placing more than 100 people a month into deportation proceedings. Some of them had been charged with violent crimes, others with traffic infractions." The Post adds, "Besides Mecklenburg, six other state and local law enforcement agencies have started similar programs in recent years. A dozen more are being worked out with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. And in the past three months, hundreds of state and local departments have inquired about similar efforts, said Robert J. Hines, who heads the program for the ICE."

Rohrabacher Asks Gonzales To Reassess Prosecution Of Border Patrol Agents. The Washington Times (9/27, Seper, 88K) reports, "Rep. Dana Rohrabacher yesterday asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate what he called 'the exceedingly harsh prosecution' of two US Border Patrol agents now facing 20 years in prison for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks." Said the lawmaker, "This proceeding has garnered national attention calling into question the administration's commitment to secure our borders. He added that "the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean – 'were simply doing their jobs to guard our homeland by attempting to apprehend an illegal drug smuggler.'" The California Republican's letter also "called for the agents' sentencing next month to be postponed 'due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding' their prosecution."

DOJ_NMG_0069630

TAX:

Rangel Says Eliminating Tax Cuts Is On Table. The Washington Times (9/27, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said yesterday he wouldn't rule out killing any of President Bush's tax cuts in order to alleviate the dreaded Alternative Minimum Tax and balance the budget, Congress Daily reported. Mr. Rangel stipulated that 'everything has to be on the table' when considering which tax cuts must go, and when asked if he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum, he answered, 'No question about it.' His remarks caused an immediate outburst among Republicans, claiming the Democrat had just admitted his party will indeed raise taxes if it comes to power in November."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Poised To Approve $448 Billion Defense Budget. The AP (9/27, Taylor) reports, "Just days before leaving Washington to campaign, Congress is moving to provide $70 billion more for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as part of a record $448 billion Pentagon budget. With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of funds will be needed next spring." After final passage (the Senate has not acted yet), "Congress will have approved $507 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and heightened security at overseas military bases since the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago, according to the Congressional Research Service. The growing price tag of the Iraq conflict is partly driven by the need to repair and replace military equipment worn out in harsh, dusty conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan or destroyed in battle. ... While the measure enjoys sweeping support, the brief debate sparked partisan exchanges over the Iraq war." House Democrat Jerrold Nadler and House Republican Tom Cole are quoted. The Washington Post/AP (9/27) runs a shorter version of this article.

Senate Democrats Seek To Block GOP Legislative Priorities. The Washington Times (9/27, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senate Democrats are blocking Republicans from passing several of their top legislative priorities this week, including new border fencing, two of the Bush administration's key counterterrorism programs and a drastic reduction in the estate tax. 'The legislative corner they've painted themselves in is very difficult,' Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, told reporters yesterday." Democrats, "while accusing Republicans of presiding over a 'do-nothing' Congress, are slow-walking legislation but appear unlikely to kill outright any of the security measures as elections approach." Asked yesterday "whether Democrats will take advantage of Senate rules that allow lawmakers to demand 30 hours of debate on each bill, Mr. Reid replied: 'Well, unless there's some agreement, we're going to go ahead and do the 30 hours.'" Roll Call (9/27, Billings) says Reid "is looking ahead to the next session, when he expects to have a stronger hand to play and share more in common with his Republican counterpart." In "a wide-ranging interview," Reid "said he has high expectations for both the upcoming midterm elections and the 110th Congress itself. He also expressed optimism about working with the man all but certain to be the next Senate Republican leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.)."

Mann, Ornstein Criticize 109th Congress. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (9/27), Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution and Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute say, "Even those of us with strong stomachs are getting indigestion from the farcical end of the 109th Congress, slated for early Saturday. This Congress hit the ground stumbling and has not lifted itself into an upright position. With few accomplishments and an overloaded agenda, it is set to finish its tenure with the fewest number of days in session in our lifetimes, falling well below 100 days this year." This "part-time Congress has other parallels to the famous 'Do-Nothing 80th Congress' that Harry Truman ran against successfully in 1948. The output of the 109th is pathetic measured against its predecessors and considering its priorities, which included a comprehensive immigration bill, tax reform and the research and development tax credit, lobbying and ethics reform, healthcare costs and insurance coverage, trade agreements, procedures for the detention and trial of suspected terrorists, and regulations for the oversight of domestic wiretaps, among many others. With just days to go before Congress adjourns and the fiscal year begins, not a single one of the 11 appropriations bills that make up the range of government programs has been enacted into law." But the "big problem with this Congress is not what it didn't do, it is what it did, and did badly. As of Tuesday, there were three must-pass pieces of legislation pending: defense and homeland security appropriations and the annual Department of Defense authorization."

DOJ_NMG_0069631

Bush Signs Bill Creating Online Database Of Federal Spending. USA Today (9/27, 2.27M) says "President Bush yesterday "signed legislation to create an online database for tracking about $1 trillion in government spending on grants and contracts. The law is intended to prevent wasteful spending by opening the federal budget to greater scrutiny." The AP (9/27, Pickler) reports Bush said in his signing statement, "Information on earmarks will no longer be hidden deep in the pages of a federal budget bill, but just a few clicks away. … This legislation will give the American people a new tool to hold their government accountable for spending decisions. When those decisions are made in broad daylight, they will be wiser and they will be more restrained."

The Washington Times (9/27, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Written by Sens. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, and Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, the legislation creates a database available to the public through a Web site. It will list every entity receiving federal funds, along with information about the amount and purpose of the spending." Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the White House Office of Management and Budget, "said the information already exists, but now the administration must collect and compile it into a consistent format."

Johanns Says Bush Administration Wants Say In Next Farm Bill. The Dow Jones Newswire (9/27) reports Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns Tuesday said the Bush Administration wants to "have an impact" on how the next farm bill is written in 2007. While acknowledging that Congress will write the next farm bill, Johanns "stressed that it'll be President George W. Bush who either approves or vetoes it." The USDA will publish its proposal for the next farm bill in January, and Johanns told a farm group luncheon that "first on his list" is the "fair" distribution of farm subsidies and the reform of "inequities" in the system. Johanns said US farm policy needs to be "beyond challenge" by member countries of the World Trade Organization. However, Dow Jones says the Bush administration's positions have placed it at odds with some of the largest farm organizations. Farm Bureau President Bob Stallman said, "For the short term, and until we get a WTO negotiation…we ought to forgo major changes to our farm policy."

Spellings Outlines Higher Education Reforms. U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings received widespread coverage for her National Press Club address on a report by the Commission on the Future of Higher Education. Coverage focused on proposals for increasing the Pell Grant, establishing a student database and testing at colleges. The AP (9/27, Feller) reports, "Handed a plan to shake up college life in America, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings is endorsing some of its key ideas and promising to get moving on them. Her overarching theme is to make everything about college -- choosing one, affording one, succeeding in one -- easier for families."

McClatchy (9/27, Douglas) says the Bush administration is "looking to extend its education policies into America's colleges and universities." But "some higher-education officials fear" the plans "will lead to standardized testing at the collegiate level and trample on students' privacy." The proposals would "extend to colleges the principles from President Bush's No Child Left Behind program." And "even before Spellings spoke, several higher-education officials had blasted the proposals, saying they menace student privacy, potentially offer a one-size-fits-all approach to testing and don't sufficiently address student financial aid."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Chaker, 2.03M) reports the proposals would "impose tighter standards on colleges and universities" while trying to make "the college process simpler for families" and "colleges more accountable for the services they provide. That causes some in the higher-education community to bristle." The proposals are "prompting questions about the scope of a federal department's authority" and "may prompt conflict with Congress."

The New York Times (9/27, Dillon, 1.21M) reports Spellings "hoped to jolt American higher education out of a dangerous complacency." Spellings called the proposals "the beginning of a process of long-overdue reform." But "many educators opposed the testing proposal, calling it misguided."

The Washington Post (9/27, A8, Romano, 748K) reports Spellings "called yesterday for greater fiscal and academic accountability in higher education and endorsed a controversial plan to keep long-term records on students that would track performance from the time they enter the system in grade school to show how their educations progress." Yet Spellings "largely sidestepped the commission's bold proposal for a substantial increase in need-based Pell Grants."

DOJ_NMG_0069632

USA Today (9/27, Marklein, 2.27M) reports Spellings "called Tuesday for greater accountability by colleges and universities, including the creation of a national database to track how well students learn." The proposed "database has been among the commission's most controversial proposals, mostly because of concerns about student privacy."

Bloomberg (9/27, Basken) reports Spellings "called on the nation's 3,700 colleges to cut costs while doing a better job of proving how well they teach." She "also promised to ask Congress for more aid for low-income students, without endorsing the panel's specific suggestion of a 50 percent increase." Colleges "have resisted the idea of standardized tests, saying school provides an experience too diverse to be measured by any uniform means."

Swagel Nominated To Be Assistant Treasury Secretary. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) reports, "The White House nominated Phillip Swagel, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute, to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for economic policy." Swagel, "a former chief of staff at the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, was tapped as part of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's personnel makeover. … If confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Swagel would succeed Mark Warshawsky, who left Treasury this year to join consulting firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide."

GAO Criticizes DOD Travel Booking System. The Washington Post (9/27, Williamson, 748K) reports, "After a decade and more than $500 million in costs, the Defense Department's new travel booking system doesn't work, it doesn't save money, and most staff members don't use it," according to the GAO. The GAO said "that defense officials offered a credit card company news release as sole proof for its claim that the system saves millions of dollars each year." Senator Tom Coburn complained of "very effective lobbying by the contractor," Northrop Grumman. Senator Norm Coleman is also quoted complaining of "unconscionable waste," while Undersecretary David S. C. Chu "strongly objected to criticism of the Pentagon's estimates of personnel cost savings

Cheney's Helicopter Left Sitting On Tarmac As Bush's Takes Off First. The Washington Post (9/27, A25, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that there may now be a new rule for Washington Residents "Never get in the way of President Bush heading for his soft down pillow. Seems Vice President Cheney , in Grand Rapids, Mich., on Monday, landed at Andrews Air Force Base at 8:10 p.m. -- a full two minutes before Air Force One touched down. But being president means never having to wait your turn. So Bush bounded down the steps, our colleague Peter Baker reports, and onto his chopper before Cheney's entourage even realized what was happening. Marine One quickly powered up, forcing Marine Two to sit on the tarmac until the top bird lifted off."

Website Publishing Congressional Aide Salary Information. The Washington Post (9/27, A25, Goldfarb, 748K) reports a Website "documenting the salaries of the roughly 20,000 Capitol Hill employees went live last week -- and almost as soon came crashing down." By law, "the salaries of Hill staffers have long been available in thick books in the offices of the House and Senate clerks. The site came down because of the rush of traffic from computers housed in Congress -- and elsewhere." It was "a sign of the intense interest percolating on Capitol Hill and political blogs about the just-launched LegiStorm (http://www.legistorm.com). The site quickly went back online, offering a window for Hill staff and strangers alike into what everyone -- from senior senators' chiefs of staff to the House barber -- earns per year." The LegiStorm data "show that slightly more than 200 Senate staffers earn $150,000 per year. Close to 300 House staffers make that amount, many of them on the House Appropriations Committee. Most employees seem to make about $50,000 to $60,000 per year. Many paid interns -- which Hill aides often start their careers as -- take home barely $200 per month."

O'Connor Criticizes Atmosphere Of Judicial Intimidation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (9/27), former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor sys, "In November, South Dakotans will vote on a state constitutional amendment being advocated by a national group called 'JAIL 4 Judges.' If the amendment passes, it would eliminate judicial immunity, and enable a special grand jury to censure judges for their official legal determinations." Although the amendment's supporters "claim they seek a 'judicial accountability initiative law' (JAIL), they aspire to something far more sinister -- judicial intimidation. Indeed, the national Web site of JAIL 4 Judges boasts with striking candor that the organization 'has that intimidation factor flowing through the judicial system.'" While it is "tempting to dismiss this proposed amendment as merely an isolated bout of anti-judge angst," it is "far from alone in expressing skepticism of the judiciary. In addition to South Dakota, this election cycle has witnessed efforts in at least three other states that are designed to rein in judges who have supposedly 'run amok.'" Congress has "also has engaged in recent efforts to police the judiciary." But "all of society has a keen interest in countering threats to judicial independence. Judges who are afraid -- whether they fear for their jobs or fear for their lives -- cannot adequately fulfill the considerable responsibilities that the position demands."

DOJ_NMG_0069633

Congress Urged To Pass Bill Aiding Disadvantaged Youth. In a Washington Times op-ed (9/27), Karen Burke Morison, former staff director for the White House Task Force for Disadvantaged Youth, says, "Congress has an opportunity to fix some costly problems that affect the hundreds of federal programs that target disadvantaged youth, by passing the Federal Youth Coordination Act. These problems were aptly identified by the White House Task Force for Disadvantaged Youth, a group created by President Bush in late 2002." The task force "reported that there were more than 300 such programs scattered throughout 12 agencies. They also found the total spending for these programs was significant ($223.5 billion in fiscal 2003), about one-tenth of the federal budget." Coordination should "be mandatory with children's programs, because it's about what services an agency offers as well as who receives them." The Federal Youth Coordination Act (H.R. 856/S. 409) "was passed by the House in late 2005 with a strong bipartisan majority. But the bill, which recently received the endorsement of the American Bar Association, has been stalled in the Senate. There is no good reason not to pass this bill, which could put some sanity into the process."

OTHER NEWS:

Consumer Confidence Up. The Financial Times (9/27, Pimlott) reports, "US consumer confidence recovered from August's nine-month low to post a stronger than expected gain this month as prices at petrol pumps fell sharply." The consumer confidence index "rose to 104.5, up from 100.2 in August. September's data came in above economists' expectations, according to Bloomberg, that this month's figure would stand at 103. Consumers told researchers that there were more jobs available and that they expected to earn more in the coming months."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, McAuley, 2.03M) reports, "Consumer expectations for the state of economic activity over the next six months increased to 89.0 from 84.4 in August." The Conference Board "noted in the report that respondents who assess economic conditions as 'good' increased to 27.4% in September from 26.2%, while those who termed current conditions as 'bad' slipped to 15.4% from the 16.6% who held that view in August."

USA Today (9/27, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) says that though consumer confidence "rebounded from a nine-month low in September," it is "still hovering near one of the lowest levels of the year, according to Tuesday reports indicating moderate economic growth."

World Economic Forum Ranks US As Sixth-Most Competitive Economy. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Walker, 2.03M) reports, "The US's huge budget deficit threatens to make the country's economy less competitive, according to a study by the World Economic Forum, an institute in Switzerland. The institute's annual study of global competitiveness says the US economy is the sixth most-competitive in the world, slipping from first place in last year's ranking, a result of mediocre scores for its public finances." Switzerland "ranks No. 1 in this year's survey, thanks to what the forum sees as a combination of efficient public administration and flexible markets. Three Nordic countries -- Finland, Sweden and Denmark -- come next, followed by Singapore and the US."

Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (9/27, D1, 748K), "The predictable response from the business community will be to use these studies to warn of impending economic ruin unless the government adopts the Republican agenda of less regulation, lower taxes, tort reform, and relieving companies of health-care and pension costs. Don't be fooled. These reports speak to the embarrassing failure of a decade of Republican rule in improving US competitiveness." Business taxes, "as a percentage of anything you want to measure, are at their lowest level in decades. The Bush White House has subjected new regulations to rigorous cost-benefit analysis. Several reforms make it less attractive for shareholders, workers and consumers to file frivolous lawsuits, but not necessarily for businesses. And in case you hadn't noticed, businesses have already made tremendous strides in shifting health-care and pension costs to workers."

DOJ_NMG_0069634

Stocks Up; Dow At Second-Highest Closing Ever. ABC World News (9/26, story 5, 0:10, Gibson) reported, "Wall Street's powerful September rally kept going today, pushing the Dow Jones Industrial Average to their second-highest close ever. The Dow pushed up 93 points to 11,669. That's just 54 points below its all-time high. Rising consumer confidence also held the NASDAQ, which gained 12 points." The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Browning, 2.03M) says "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished at a 5½-year high of 1336.34, up 0.8%, or 9.97 points. It is up 7.1% this year and 5.2% so far this quarter."

NBC Nightly News (9/26, story 4, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) showed Maria Bartiromo of CNBC saying, "There really is a growing sense of optimism among investors. It has so much to do with the price of oil. Had you look at gasoline it is way down from the more than $3 a gallon we saw just a couple of months ago across the country. Oil prices, crude oil, close to $80 a barrel just a few months ago. Now they're down at $61 a barrel. I think people are looking at that drop-off in oil and thinking, well, this economy is growing. It is not too hot but it is growing and going into the last quarter of the year where we have the important holiday shopping season, people do have the ability to spend money because they don't have that pressure from the price of oil and that will certainly bode well for corporate profits. That was really behind it."

Hillary Clinton Defends Husband's Fox Interview Performance. ABC World News (9/26, story 2, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "The battle over terrorism and national security has also become a political scrap between the Clintons, both Mr. and Mrs., and the Bush Administration, over who deserves more blame for not preventing the 9/11 attacks. In recent days, the words have become more bitter, more personal." ABC (Tapper) added, "Republicans have won the last two elections on national security issues. The question is, can Democrats fighting back so aggressively break that streak? Or does it just bring attention to what's been a losing issue for them?"

NBC Nightly News (9/26, story 2, 3:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's not as if we can bring anyone back who was lost on 9/11, but suddenly, both sides are debating over which president did what to try to kill or capture Osama bin Laden and head off the al Qaeda threat. Today Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York praised heir husband's performance in that combative TV interview over the weekend, defending his record on terrorism and pursuing Osama bin Laden. Then she took her own swing at the Bush Administration."

The AP (9/26, Humbert) reports ex-President Clinton's "angry response to questions about Osama bin Laden has partisans of every persuasion certain it will energize voters in the elections and affect a possible presidential bid by his wife." Conservatives "immediately labeled the interview a prime example of the soap opera that would run daily should another Democrat -- say, for example, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton -- win the White House." But Democrats "argued the former president's feisty dressing-down of Fox News' Chris Wallace is just the wake-up call the party's liberal base needed six weeks before the election, a pointed criticism of the Bush administration's bungled search for bin Laden. Either way, don't expect the furor to subside any time soon."

The AP (9/26) reports Sen. Clinton "hit back at Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday as the political fighting escalated over which president -- Bill Clinton or George W. Bush -- missed more opportunities to prevent the Sept. 11 attacks." Sen. Clinton said, "I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks. I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined To Attack Inside the United States' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team." CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Blitzer) reported Sen. Clinton "is praising her husband's performance in that feisty television interview."

The New York Times (9/27, Hernandez, 1.21M) says the "war of words between the Bush administration and the Clintons intensified on Tuesday" as Sen. Clinton "suggested that her husband would have reacted differently as president if he had heard the same warnings." In "unusually blunt terms," she "questioned the current administration's response" to the Bin Laden Attack intelligence briefing, and "ratcheted up an already bitter exchange of charges between the Bush and Clinton camps over how the two administrations responded to the threat posed by Al Qaeda before the attacks." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/27, A12, Baker, 748K) reports Bush "complained yesterday that Clinton was engaging in 'finger-pointing' by attacking the current administration's actions before the hijackings. 'I don't have enough time to finger-point,' Bush said."

DOJ_NMG_0069635

More Commentary. In her New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Hillary is morphing from workhorse back to show horse, paving the way for her historic presidential race with a series of big policy speeches. And she is taking on the other dynasty more energetically" with her defense of her husband.

In a Wall Street Journal (9/27, A18, 2.03M) op-ed, Richard Minister of the Hudson Institute writes, "Bill Clinton's outburst on Fox News was something of a public service, launching a debate about the antiterror policies of his administration. This is important because every George W. Bush policy that arouses the ire of Democrats -- the Patriot Act, extraordinary rendition, detention without trial, pre-emptive war -- is a departure from his predecessor. Where policies overlap -- air attacks on infrastructure, secret presidential orders to kill terrorists, intelligence sharing with allies, freezing bank accounts, using police to arrest terror suspects -- there is little friction. The question, then, is whether America should return to Mr. Clinton's policies or soldier on with Mr. Bush's. … While it is easy to look back in hindsight and blame Bill Clinton, the full scale and nature of the terrorist threat was not widely appreciated until 9/11. Still: Bill Clinton did not fully grasp that he was at war. Nor did he intuit that war requires overcoming bureaucratic objections and a democracy's natural reluctance to use force. That is a hard lesson. But it is better to learn it from studying the Clinton years than reliving them."

Midterm Election Ads Seen As "Most Toxic" In Memory. The New York Times (9/27, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports Republicans and Democrats "began showing at least 30 new campaign advertisements in contested House and Senate districts across the country on Tuesday. Of those, three were positive." For Republicans, "it was the leading edge of a wave of negative advertisements against Democratic candidates, the product of more than a year of research into the personal and professional backgrounds of Democratic challengers." For Democrats, it "was part of a barrage intended to tie Republican incumbents to an unpopular Congress, criticize their voting records, portray them as captives to special interests and highlight embarrassing moments from their business histories." The "result of the dueling accusations has been what both sides described on Tuesday as the most toxic midterm campaign environment in memory." Democratic and Republican strategists "said they expected over 90 percent of the advertisements to be broadcast by Nov. 7 to be negative."

Some Conservatives Prefer Democratic Congressional Majority. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A4, Dreazen, 2.03M) reports a "small but vocal band of conservative iconoclasts say they would prefer to see their own party lose" control of Congress in the midterm elections. The "array of former members of Congress and officials from Republican administrations dating to the 1970s are using opinion articles, speeches and interviews to make the surprising -- and, to many of their friends and colleagues, near-heretical -- argument that it would be better for the country if their party lost." The Republican "rebels say the modern Republican Party has so abandoned its conservative beliefs that it deserves to be defeated by the Democrats." The WSJ identifies "three factors" that "are driving the conservative backlash." Fiscal hawks "are furious about the growth of the federal government. Conservative lawyers such as Bruce Fein, who worked in the Nixon Justice Department and Reagan Federal Communications Commission, are upset that Congress allowed President Bush to claim expansive powers to eavesdrop on American citizens and detain suspected militants without trial. Others say the war in Iraq is a costly diversion from the war on terror." Other Republicans "couch their desire for Republican losses in political terms, arguing that Democratic control of Congress for at least two years would increase the chances of Republicans retaining the presidency in 2008."

Marriage "Gap" Could Play Role In House Elections. USA Today (9/27, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports a USA TODAY analysis of 2005 Census data shows "House districts held by Republicans are full of married people. Democratic districts are stacked with people who have never married. This 'marriage gap' could play a role in the Nov. 7 congressional elections." Twenty-seven "of the 38 Republican-held districts with seats considered vulnerable by independent political analysts have fewer married people than found in the average GOP district." The USA TODAY analysis also shows that Republicans "control 49 of the 50 districts with the highest rates of married people." Democrats "represent all 50 districts that have the highest rates of adults who have never married." The "political tug-of-war is between people who are married and those who have never been. The 'never married' group covers a variety of groups who form the Democratic base: young people, those who marry late in life, single parents, gays, and heterosexuals who live together."

DOJ_NMG_0069636

USA Today (9/27, Cauchon, 2.27M) also runs an extended analysis of the "marriage gap" phenomenon, noting GOP Congress members "represent 39.2 million children younger than 18, about 7 million more than Democrats. Republicans average 7,000 more children per district." Democratic districts "that have large numbers of children tend to be predominantly Hispanic or, to a lesser extent, African-American. This 'fertility gap' is crucial to understanding the differences between liberals and conservatives, says Arthur Brooks, a professor of public administration at Syracuse University. These childbearing patterns shape divisions over issues such as welfare, education and child tax credits, he says." Brooks says, "Republicans are congenial to traditional families, which is clearly the best way for kids to grow up. But there are some kids who don't have that advantage, and Democrats are very concerned with helping those kids."

Cheney Attends His 100th Fundraiser Of Midterm Cycle. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Roberts) reported, "The Vice President hit a milestone this week, his 100th fund-raiser of the midterm election cycle -- not far behind, President Bush, with just under 70 now. In total, Republican candidates and campaign committees have so far raised more than $870 million."

Democrats Seek Lobbyist Contributions. The Hill (9/27, Bolton) reports House Democrats "are making an intense final push to raise inside-the-Beltway money before Congress adjourns, collecting most of it from the lobbying industry they have distanced themselves from this election cycle." Lobbyists "representing corporate clients are an important source of political contributions — funding that is vital to their chances of capturing the chamber. At the same time, Democrats have spent a lot of time and effort asserting that Republican rule has created a 'Culture of Corruption' because of close ties between the GOP and certain special interests." The "dynamic has created awkwardness for some Democrats." Democratic leaders "asked their entire caucus to come into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) headquarters" on Tuesday and Thursday "to make fundraising calls." On Tuesday night, "the DCCC held a fundraiser at Bistro Bis, a high-end restaurant a short walk from the Capitol, featuring lawmakers poised to take over as the chairmen of House committees." Apart from "the event held by the party fundraising committee, the Democratic ranking members of committees and subcommittees have been raised money aggressively. Several senior Democrats have held multiple fundraisers since Labor Day, collecting money for their party and Democratic candidates but also giving lobbyists and representatives of the business community opportunities to renew old acquaintances or forge new ones."

Challenger Seeks Investigation Of Murtha's Links To Lobbying Firms. Roll Call (9/27, Bresnahan) reports the Republican challenger "to Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Murtha traded appropriations earmarks for hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from the clients of lobbying firms with close ties to the veteran lawmaker, including one where his brother works." Washington County Commissioner Diana Irey, "Murtha's GOP opponent, delivered a letter to Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania, requesting that Justice begin a probe of Murtha immediately." A Murtha spokesman "denied Irey's accusations, calling it a political stunt by a long-shot challenger." Roll Call adds the "allegations about Murtha's relationship with the PMA Group and KSA Consulting — a lobbying firm that employs Murtha's brother, Kit Murtha, as well as a former aide — were first reported by the Los Angeles Times in June 2005." Since then, "some House Republicans have called publicly for an ethics probe of Murtha, although no GOP lawmakers have stepped forward to officially file a complaint against him. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington recently included Murtha on a list of the most corrupt Members of Congress."

Third Acquaintance Claims Allen Used Racist Slur. The New York Times (9/27, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports, "Another acquaintance of Senator George Allen," Ellen G. Hawkins, said "she heard him use a racial slur in 1976, contradicting a statement he made Monday in an effort to tamp down similar accusations." Allen campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, "called the account by" Hawkins "another false accusation." Hawkins, who "described herself as a rural Virginia housewife and an active Democrat, said in an interview Tuesday that she heard Mr. Allen use the slur repeatedly at a party on election night in 1976." She said Allen "used the term while deprecating the intelligence of the black players on the Washington Redskins football team, which Mr. Allen's father coached. Recalling remarks about its star running back, Larry Brown, Mrs. Hawkins said that Mr. Allen 'started in effect bad-mouthing him, saying what a shiftless you-know-what' he was." She said "she remembered the conversation because she was a big fan of the team and was shocked. She said Mr. Allen's statement on Monday was 'just plain a lie.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069637

CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Blitzer) reported, "For the third time in recent weeks," Allen "is getting a crash course in damage control. The embattled Virginia Republican is vehemently denying that he has used racial slurs against blacks or that he's a racist. But today the allegations persist." CNN (Franken) added the "poisonous drum beat has transformed what was supposed to be an easy reelection for Allen. One of his top campaign officials tells CNN this race is competitive now. At their behest, other teammates have stepped forward to vigorously deny Allen was ever racist."

MSNBC's Hardball (9/26, Shuster) reported that Allen "is now facing a political death by a thousand cuts. The latest came today in the New York Times and Washington Post. On the heels of a story first written by Salon.com, the papers reported that three former classmates of Allen at the University of Virginia say he used the N-word to refer to blacks in the early 1970s. Allen denies the charge," but "noted political scientist, Larry Sabato, who went to college with Allen, said Allen's accusers are telling the truth."

Webb Campaign Said To Be Surging. MSNBC's Hardball (9/26, Shuster) reported that "the campaign of Democratic challenger Jim Webb is surging, raising more than $1 million last month alone. Webb has had his own challenges but he seems to be handling them far better than Allen. When Webb was asked about an article he wrote 27 years ago calling for women to be kept out of the service academies, Webb took responsibility immediately and apologized."

Webb Declines To Say If He Used Racist Slur. The AP (9/27, Espo) reports Democrat Jim Webb "declined to say definitively Tuesday whether he had ever used a common derogatory term to describe blacks, stepping carefully after watching his campaign rival confront charges of racism." Webb said, "I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time or another in their life." The AP adds Webb "referred to his novel, 'Fields of Fire,' which aides said includes occurrences of the n-word as part of character dialogue. But he added: 'I have never issued a racial or ethnic slur.'" Asked for "clarification of his original answer, spokeswoman Jessica Smith quoted Webb as saying, 'I have never used that word in my general vocabulary or in any derogatory way.'"

Virginia Republicans Want Allen To Focus On Accomplishments. The Washington Times (9/27, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Virginia Republicans say Allen's "floundering campaign" should "concentrate more on his accomplishments than on attacking his opponent or responding to charges of ethnic insensitivity." House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith said, "He really rewrote Virginia history with welfare reform, education reform, the abolition of parole -- those are three big items."

Steele Quickly Responds To First Negative DSCC Ad. The Washington Times (9/27, Ward, 88K) reports, "National Democrats yesterday ran their first TV ad against Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's U.S. Senate bid, prompting an immediate response ad from Mr. Steele." The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) ad "says Mr. Steele 'likes puppies, but he loves President Bush,' showing a picture of Mr. Steele and Mr. Bush in a heart-shaped frame." Steele "responded by releasing an ad that criticizes his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, for taking money from drug companies and voting against the importation of prescription drugs from Canada." The DSCC's "mention of puppies refers to an ad Mr. Steele released earlier this month warning of negative campaign ads from 'the Washington crowd.' Saying that he will be accused of 'hating puppies,' Mr. Steele says, 'For the record, I love puppies,' in the ad."

The Washington Post (9/27, B5, Marimow, 748K) reports Democrats "began airing an ad that called such puppy talk a diversion from Steele's relationship with President Bush and his position on issues such as abortion and stem cell research. Steele, and the growling puppy, were on the air hours later, decrying the Democratic spot as the work of Washington insiders, particularly his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D)." The DSCC ad "is a direct jab at Steele's much-talked-about spot that cast the lieutenant governor as a different kind of politician. In that ad, Steele, looking more like a talk show host than a politician, warns viewers of forthcoming negative ads." Steele's "quick retort yesterday labels the Democratic spots as 'nasty ads from the Washington crowd.' He brings back the puppy, which growls in agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0069638

Chafee Criticized For Supporting GOP Leaders. In his Washington Post column (9/27, A27), Harold Meyerson says Sen. Lincoln Chafee "is seeking reelection in his heavily Democratic state by insisting he's not really a Republican, or at least not part of the gang responsible for the decade's debacles." But "big deal. It matters not a damn whom Lincoln Chafee chose to support for president." The election "in which his vote did matter was that for majority leader of the Senate. There, he was one of just 100 electors, in a Senate nearly evenly divided. After this November's elections, control of the Senate may well hang by a single vote. And if Chafee truly wished to alter the course of his party and his country in the spirit of his vote for Poppy Bush, he would, if reelected, cast his vote for majority leader when the new Senate convenes for Bob Dole or Howard Baker -- former Republican leaders who showed a decent respect for reality and an interest in doing the nation's business. Rather than support an administration lapdog such as Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, the Republican whip, whom his party will probably put forth to run the Senate next January, Chafee would vote for some old-school GOP pol." Meyerson continues to criticize "moderate" Republicans such as Olympia Snowe and Mike DeWine, who also would probably vote for McConnell in the leadership elections.

RNC Devoting One-Third Of Fall Ad Budget To Three Senate Races. Roll Call (9/27, Kane) reports the Republican National Committee "already has devoted close to a third of its advertising budget this fall to just three critical Senate races, with all indications that the committee hopes to build a firewall around those states to ensure the chamber's GOP majority." The RNC is "focusing its nearly $30 million advertising war chest on the battleground Senate races in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, according to Federal Election Commission records and interviews with a handful of top Republican operatives." While aides "warned that the state of play could change in the final six weeks of the campaign, several GOP strategists said that the current plan was for the RNC to continue focusing its television campaign on those three states." FEC records "bear out that plan so far, with the RNC showering more than $3.8 million in independent expenditures in those states in recent weeks — $2.8 million of that aimed at Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who is trying to unseat Sen. Mike DeWine (R)." Democratic sources "involved in media purchases" also said "the RNC also has reserved another $4.7 million worth of ads in Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee, devoting more than $8.5 million worth of independent expenditures reserved for just those states so far."

NRCC Wades Into MN6 To Bash Wetterling. Roll Call (9/27, Duran) reports Republicans "believe Minnesota's 6th Congressional district is solid GOP turf, but given the unfavorable political climate they have endured this cycle, they are not taking it for granted." The National Republican Congressional Committee "paid more than $310,000 to begin running ads Monday in the suburban and exurban Twin Cities district to bash Democratic nominee Patty Wetterling." Wetterling, who "gained national prominence as a child safety advocate after her son was kidnapped in 1989, lost to Rep. Mark Kennedy (R) 54 percent to 46 percent in 2004." Despite the "drubbing Kennedy gave Wetterling and Republicans' public confidence in their nominee to replace him, state Sen. Michele Bachmann, the NRCC has spent almost $500,000 on ads and direct-mail pieces hammering Wetterling since mid-August." The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "has yet to run independent ads or drop mail pieces in the district." EMILY's List, the "pro-abortion rights political action committee backing Wetterling, is releasing a survey it commissioned on the race today, presumably finding Wetterling hot on Bachmann's heels if not leading."

Padgett Gets Welcome Boost From First Lady In OH18. The Washington Post (9/27, A3, VandeHei, Cillizza, 748K) reports that in Ohio's 18th CD, Republican Joy Padgett, who is running to replace convicted Rep. Bob Ney, "has been in a jam when it comes to finding a big-name Republican who could come to town and bring more than trouble." This "helps explains Padgett's excitement Tuesday as her lunchtime guest of honor took to the podium outside the historic Granville Inn. It was first lady Laura Bush. The president's approval ratings may be in the drain, but the first lady still regularly scores in the high sixties." Democrats are "pressing the scandal issue relentlessly, and it appears to be working with some voters." In a year "when Republicans are battling low poll numbers nationally, there are few places where the GOP brand is more scuffed than in Ohio, where, since President Bush's election-night triumph here two years ago, national and local scandals have polluted the political atmosphere for GOP candidates."

DOJ_NMG_0069639

Ohio Hosts Key House, Senate Races. Time.com (9/27, Bacon) reports Gov. Bob Taft's low approval ratings and Rep. Bob Ney's guilty plea in the Abramoff scandal are "not all the problems for the G.O.P. in Ohio." Peter Brown, who surveys Ohio races for the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute, said, "You've got a national anti-Republican, anti-incumbent sentiment that wasn't there two years ago." Voters "aren't happy about the economy, Iraq or President Bush here either." Time adds Democratic chances "of winning key races here are so high that top officials are trying to guard against activists getting complacent." And Democrats "remain worried that the G.O.P. will outperform them at getting voters to the polls, much as the Republican turnout operation helped defy the oddsmakers in 2004. Both Democrats and Republicans say a ballot initiative to allow slot machine casino gambling in the state may help to turn out conservatives who would oppose it, although liberals may show up to support a proposed minimum wage increase also on the ballot." The Ohio races "are critical. Democrats need 15 seats to win back the House, and three of their best chances are in Ohio. In the Senate, where they need six seats, this is a place where they could win one." In the 15th CD, Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce faces Democrat Mary Joe Kilroy. If Kilroy, "a Franklin County Commissioner, wins this race, it would be the biggest individual victory for the House Democrats on election night, because Pryce, as the chairman of the House Republicans, is the No. 4 member of the leadership team." In the 1st CD, Republican Rep. Steve Chabot faces Democrat John Cranley, who is "trying to keep voters focused on the problems at hand, running ads blaming Chabot for high gas prices and linking his opponent with voters' frustrations on other issues such as the increasing national debt."

Hospital Officials Defend Salary Increase For Obama's Wife. The Chicago Tribune (9/27, Dorning, 623K) reports officials "at the University of Chicago Hospitals on Tuesday explained a large salary jump for Sen. Barack Obama's wife shortly after he took office as a normal promotion that reflected expanded duties in her job as a liaison with the South Side community surrounding the medical center." Michelle Obama "was promoted to vice president for external affairs in March 2005, two months after her husband took office in the Senate. According to a tax return released by the senator this week, the promotion nearly tripled her income from the hospitals from $121,910 in 2004 to $316,962 in 2005." Hospitals spokesman John Easton "said Obama's salary was in line with the compensation received by the not-for-profit medical center's 16 other vice presidents." Easton said "the hospitals' management had discussed a promotion to vice president with Obama previously but that she had been reluctant to undertake the commitment until her husband's Senate campaign was finished. In part, she wanted to wait until her family had made a decision on whether to maintain their primary residence in Illinois, which they did, and she had a better sense of the demands on her time as a senator's wife, he said."

Democrats Propose Reimbursing States For Backup Paper Ballots. The New York Times (9/27, Urbina, 1.21M) reports three Senate Democrats "proposed emergency legislation on Tuesday to reimburse states for printing paper ballots in case of problems with electronic voting machines on Nov. 7." The proposal "is a response to grass-roots pressures and growing concern by local and state officials about touch-screen machines. An estimated 40 percent of voters will use those machines in the election." Sen. Barbra Boxer, who is co-sponsoring the measure with Sens. Christopher Dodd and Russell Feingold, said, "If someone asks for a paper ballot, they ought to be able to have it." The Times adds Republican leadership aides were skeptical about the prospects for the measure. It would have to advance without opposition from any senator and then make it through the House in the short time available before Election Day."

Ensign To Chair NRSC. Roll Call (9/27, Bresnahan, Billings) reports Sen. John Ensign "will take the helm of the National Republican Senatorial Committee at the start of the 110th Congress, putting the Nevada Republican on the front line of what is certain to be a difficult election cycle for the GOP." Republican leaders "have been scrambling for nearly two months to recruit the next NRSC chairman after Sen. John Thune (S.D.), who was expected to assume the post, opted against a bid. Thune shocked the GOP Conference in early August when he announced he wasn't interested in the position, citing the travel burden and family commitments."

DOJ_NMG_0069640

Ensign, "who also declined the NRSC post when initially approached by party leaders, said he changed his mind after consulting with friends, colleagues, and his wife, Darlene." Twenty-one Republican Senators "are up for re-election in 2008, versus just 12 Democrats. When combined with the certain competition for donor dollars from a presidential campaign and a renewed battle for the House, the NRSC's ability to raise money and elect its candidates will be tested severely."

Richardson Hints At 2008 Campaign. McClatchy (9/27, Thomma) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "insists that he's focused only on helping Democrats win elections this year and won't decide until next year whether to run for president. But over scrambled eggs and sausage Tuesday morning, he gave reporters a preview of the distinctive campaign he'd run - and how much he'd differ from likely rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York." Richardson "boasts a decidedly different resume. He's arguably more candid. And he's definitely funnier." In his remarks, Richardson "ticked off the changes in the Democratic presidential primary calendar and how Western states could play a bigger role in picking the 2008 nominee - states that happen to be in his backyard." Asked if he was "already mapping his campaign? 'I'm just kind of observing how it happens,' he said, his smile giving way to a knowing laugh." Richardson "came to Washington to talk about his work as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association and the prospects for this year's 36 gubernatorial elections," and he himself is "coasting toward re-election to a second term." Richardson "acknowledged that, if the election were held today, Democrats would pick up governors' offices in states such as Colorado, Massachusetts, New York and Ohio, but fall short in such states as California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Minnesota, South Carolina and Texas."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Cook, 58K) reports that at the Monitor breakfast, Richardson "talked up his party's prospects in the 36 statehouse races that will be decided this November." Richardson said, "I believe we will win the House of Representatives, the Senate probably [is] a little more difficult. I can honestly say I believe we will win a majority of governorships this year.... We will win in New York. We will win in Massachusetts. We will win in Colorado. We will win in Ohio. We will win in Arkansas. We have some very competitive toss ups in Nevada [and] Florida. We will win in Maryland. I would put Maryland in the 'feel confident' [category]." The Monitor adds Richardson was "also in Washington as someone pondering a move from the state house to the White House. The governor told reporters at the breakfast that he 'will make a decision early next year' on whether to run for president. But he is already clearly preparing for a presidential run."

Bass Aide Resigns After Posing As Liberal Blogger. Roll Call (9/27, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "A top aide to Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) was forced to resign Tuesday for using Congressional office computers to pose as a liberal on political blogs, in an apparent attempt to undermine Bass' Democratic challenger. Bass asked longtime aide Tad Furtado to resign after HOH revealed Monday that the operators of two liberal blogs in New Hampshire had traced the suspicious poster's Internet protocol address to the House of Representatives' computer server." House ethics rules prohibit employees from using government resources to engage in campaign activity. Furtado "posted blog comments under the pseudonym 'IndyNH' and 'IndieNH.' He pretended to be a liberal who didn't think Bass' opponent, Paul Hodes, could win."

Iraq War Protesters Arrested At Hart Senate Building. The Washington Post (9/27, A14, Boorstein, 748K) reports, "The quiet, sunny atrium of the Hart Senate Office Building was transformed into a chaotic scene yesterday when dozens of war protesters filed into the lobby, formed a prayer circle, shouted Scripture and eventually were arrested as Senate staffers hung over railings and crammed glass-walled offices to watch." The Post adds, "Employees in the building and longtime area activists said they had never seen police allow such a demonstration in a government office building, with activists one and two stories up reading the names of the Iraq war dead, civilian and military."

Justices To Examine Links Between Credit Ratings, Insurance Rates. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Anderson, 2.03M) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed to decide whether insurance companies must tell consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher rates for coverage." Insurance companies "have faced a wave of class-action lawsuits alleging they violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act by not telling consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher quotes for insurance coverage."

DOJ_NMG_0069641

Surveys Find Health Premiums Rising Twice As Fast As Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A2, Fuhrmans, 2.03M) reports two nationwide surveys by Kaiser Family Foundation and the Health Research and Educational Trust show that "the health-care premiums of employers and their workers have climbed twice as fast as wages and inflation in 2006 -- to nearly double their cost in 2000 -- and they look to rise at a similar clip next year." That said, "the pace of increase is about half what it was just a few years ago." According to the surveys, "the average family premium rose 7.7% in 2006. That compared with a 3.8% rise in wages and inflation of around 3.5%. Even so, the 7.7% increase marks the third year that employer health-care cost increases have decelerated since soaring nearly 14% in 2003."

USA Today (9/27, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "High-deductible health insurance policies coupled with savings accounts — touted by proponents as an answer to rising medical costs — did not grow in popularity among employers this year, even as premiums for insurance continued to rise. … Despite those policies being the biggest buzz among benefit consultants," the Foundation "found that only 7% of employers offered them this year, a percentage statistically unchanged since 2005." Drew Altman, president of the non-profit research group, noted, "This shows that the debate in the media and in Washington health policy circles is way out in front of the reality."

In addition, the Washington Post (9/27, D2, Day, 748K) quotes Altman as stating, "Nobody's celebrating, and nobody should be celebrating. … A modest reduction in an already high rate of increase hardly looks like salvation to working people and businesses, who have been getting hammered by high health-care costs year after year." The Post adds, "About 61 percent of companies questioned offer health-care coverage to at least some employees, about the same as last year. And workers at bigger companies continued to fare better: The study found that while nearly all companies with 200 or more workers offered coverage, fewer than half of the smallest companies surveyed did, those with from three to nine workers."

The New York Times (9/27, Freudenheim, 1.21M) notes, "'It's slightly good news,' said Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health, a large employers' research and trade group in Washington. 'It could have been worse but we certainly haven't solved all the problems.'" She added, "The workers of the United States continue to give their pay raises to the health system." Still, "some business leaders took a more upbeat view of the survey results." Katie Mahoney, health policy director of the United States Chamber of Commerce, said, "It's a very positive sign that the increases were lower than the previous year."

"Piggyback Laws" Fail To Address Health Care Crisis. In an editorial, the New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) writes, "Many middle-class young adults are staying on their parents' health insurance long after college these days." So "the troubled American health-insurance system finds itself in a vicious circle as a result. The higher premiums climb (twice as fast as wages this year, according to a new study), the less likely the young and healthy are to participate. That, in turn, skews the pool of the insured even older and more infirm, making coverage still more expensive and less appealing to those who bet they can do without." The "piggyback laws" just make "life easier for those who have the most political influence and resources, reduce elected officials' incentive to do what is really needed and find a more comprehensive national solution."

WSJournal Celebrates Possible South Carolina Move Toward School Choice. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) writes in an editorial, "Fed-up South Carolina Democrats are blowing the whistle on the state's public-school system, one of the nation's worst." But "the good news is that the Palmetto State may be reaching a tipping point." Gov. Mark Sanford (R) "is already a supporter of broad-based school choice. The problem has been the Republican-controlled legislature." But "that is starting to change." In June, "three incumbent state legislators were defeated in primaries for opposing school choice" and "in November reformers could pick up the seats they need in the house to pass education scholarships and tax credits for parents with kids in failing schools."

Russia Will Begin Nuclear Fuel Shipments To Iran In March. The New York Times/AP (9/27) notes Moscow media reports that "Russia will ship fuel to a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran by March under an agreement signed by the two countries on Tuesday." The deal "represents a small victory for Iran, but seems certain to inflame Western anxiety over Iran's nuclear ambitions." It was "signed by Sergei Shmatko, head of Russia's state-run company Atomstroiexport, and Mahmoud Hanatian, vice president of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization. An additional protocol sets out a time frame for starting up an $800 million plant in Bushehr, which will be Iran's first." The AP notes "the fuel could be enriched to create weapons-grade material," and adds, "To try to ease Western concerns over Bushehr, Russia has agreed with Iran that Tehran will ship spent fuel back to Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0069642

Iran Denies Reports It's Negotiating Secret Uranium-Enrichment Suspension. The Washington Times (9/27, Gertz, 88K) reports, "Iran yesterday said it is not negotiating a secret temporary shutdown of its uranium-enrichment program as part of ongoing talks with the European Union, rebutting Bush administration sources who told The Washington Times that such a deal is being discussed." Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, when asked about the report in The Times, "said chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani and chief European Union negotiator Javier Solana will discuss what has been proposed already."

Jailed Former Iranian Lawmaker Says He IS Being Tortured. The Washington Post (9/27, A20, Boustany, 748K) reports, "Ali Akbar Mousavi Khoini, a former Iranian lawmaker who has been jailed without charges in Tehran for more than 100 days, was briefly released from detention last Thursday to attend a memorial service, where he shouted out allegations of torture and other harsh treatment, according to his lawyers and other witnesses quoted by a human rights organization." He said, "For the past 20 days, prison officials have chained my hands and feet. I am being tortured. … I am held in solitary confinement and interrogated four times a day. … They wake me up in the middle of the night to interrogate me. They are trying to turn me to a mental patient.." The Post adds, "Calls to the Iranian mission to the United Nations in New York, seeking comment, were not returned."

Rice Eyes Trip To Northeast Asia, Says Pyongyang's Time Running Out. AFP (9/27) reports Secretary Rice "said she would travel to Asia in the next six weeks to see whether to make 'one last push' to convince North Korea to return to multilateral negotiations on ending its nuclear weapons program." She "said in an interview released Monday that time was running out to bring North Korea back to the negotiating table." Rice added that, "in light of North Korea's continued refusal to return to the negotiating table, further action was needed." She "said that in the meantime, Washington would continue its financial measures 'because they do relate to illicit North Korean activities.'" Rice "also sought to counter suggestions of a growing rift between the United States and South Korea over how to approach the crisis, with Seoul seen as favoring more diplomacy rather than threats of sanctions against its volatile neighbor. … She said South Korea had told allies…of efforts it was making to put pressure on the North, including cutting back badly needed food assistance and fertilizer supplies. She said those measures could be intensified and threaten overall North-South economic ties if North Korea goes ahead with the rumored nuclear weapons test."

IDF Expects To Withdraw From Lebanon Before Sunday. The New York Times (9/27, Erlanger, 1.21M) reports IDF forces "are expected to be out of Lebanon before the Jewish holy day of Yom Kippur begins on Sunday night." Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz "told Parliament that Israel hoped to complete its withdrawal from Lebanon under a United Nations resolution 'during this week or at the latest several days later," while UNIFIL Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini is quoted saying, "It is my belief that with the necessary cooperation by both parties we should see the I.D.F. leave south Lebanon by the end of this month." However, "Israeli officials suggested that some of [related] issues remained unresolved, including how to deal with protests along the border and whether [UNIFIL] would act against Hezbollah if necessary or simply inform the Lebanese Army about violations." The Times notes the IDF "had said it wanted to leave Lebanon by the end of last week, before the Jewish New Year, but delayed, saying [UNIFIL was] not up to strength."

Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact. AFP (9/27) reports President George W. Bush Tuesday signed the US-Oman Free Trade Agreement, the fifth such pact with a Middle Eastern country since he took office. US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said in a statement that the accord was "good news for the United States, Oman, and our efforts to promote economic opportunity in the Middle East." Schwab also touted the agreement as "a milestone in strengthening ties and promoting freedom in the Middle East."

Korean Seen As Leading Candidate To Replace Annan. The Washington Times (9/27, Pisik, 88K) reports, "The race for United Nations secretary-general is moving into its final weeks with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon well in front, but the late entry of Latvian

DOJ_NMG_0069643

President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who would be the first woman in the post, muddles the odds." Seven declared candidates "are now in the running to succeed Kofi Annan in January, and more could enter. They include a UN official who writes novels, the deputy prime minister of a recently deposed government, an ambassador with a passion for disarmament, a prince with peacekeeping experience, and a former World Bank executive from a shattered nation. All the declared candidates are from Asia -- which under an informal rotation system expects to field the next secretary-general -- except Mrs. Vike-Freiberga, whose candidacy could sink on the geographic considerations despite the fact that several nations would like to see a woman in the post." China "signaled early that it would not accept a candidate from a country outside Asia."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, LaFranchi, 58K), meanwhile, says that "while candidates are already campaigning for the post, no consensus has formed around any one of them -- in part because UN members, in particular on the powerful Security Council, have different views of what is most needed for the job."

Japan To Continue Push For Permanent UNSC Seat. AFP (9/27) reports Tokyo "has vowed to pursue its campaign for reform of the [UNSC] from which it hopes to secure a permanent seat on the key body despite opposition from some of its neighbours." Representative Kenzo Oshima "said the Security Council risked seeing its credibility further damaged if it did not change." Oshima "added that most countries wanted change 'with a sense of urgency' and 'Japan is determined to continue to take the initiative in this critical endeavour.'" AFP says Tokyo, Berlin and Brasilia "have pressed to become permanent members but opposition has come from" Washington and Beijing.

Major newspapers reported extensively on Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's first day in office. The New York Times (9/27, Fackler, 1.21M) says Abe "seeks a Japan with muscle and a voice," adding that he "has vowed to make Japan more assertive globally" and "appointed a cabinet on Tuesday packed with social conservatives and foreign-policy hawks." Abe's "ascension appears to be a changing of the guard in a country that has kept a low profile in international affairs since its defeat in 1945. He enters office riding a crest of popularity, as his message of renewed national pride has found followers amid the resurgence of Japan's long dormant economy." The Financial Times (9/27, Pilling) says Abe's cabinet picks "reflected an independent streak," while the Wall Street Journal (9/27, Hayashi, 2.03, 2.03M) said they "indicated he would follow many of the policies of his predecessor." Abe "pledged to speed up fiscal overhauls to keep the country's economic recovery on track, and to improve ties with China." In addition, he reappointed Foreign Minister Taro Aso.

Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team. The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Harman, 58K) reports on what it calls the "calculated massacre of one of Colombia's best counternarcotics police teams." The Monitor says seven of the men on the team were members of a group of about 200 police trained by the DEA. According to the Monitor, the investigation of last May's killings in Jamundí "suggests the reach that Colombia's drug lords maintain today, and has shaken officials in Washington and Bogotá. The US Congress has temporarily frozen funding for Plan Colombia…and a chorus of disappointed and angry voices in both capitals is demanding an honest evaluation of the US' most expensive foreign aid program outside of the Middle East, six years after it set out to win the war on drugs."

Reputed Cali Drug Cartel Leaders Get 30-Year Prison Sentences. There are more than 400 media references this morning to the guilty pleas and sentencing of two reputed leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities say supplied most of the cocaine in the U.S. in the 1990s. For example, USA Today (9/27, Johnson, 2.27M) reports the surviving leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities "say once supplied up to 80% of the cocaine in the USA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to trafficking charges as the government took steps to seize an estimated $2.1 billion in cartel assets." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced to 30 years in prison, effectively ending a 20-year period in which they were key players in Colombia's violent drug trade." While they were sentenced in Miami, 28 other family members "reached a separate pact with the government to surrender their worldwide assets."

In Labor Address, Blair Does Not Clarify Departure Date. The New York Times (9/27, Cowell, 1.21M) notes, "With some wisecracks and familiar rhetorical flourishes, Prime Minister Tony Blair delivered his final speech as Labor leader to the party's annual conference on Tuesday," in which he "offered no formal endorsement of his presumptive heir, Gordon Brown, …and did not set a date for his own departure, suggesting that he would pursue a Middle East peace initiative and other projects for 'months' to come." The Times says Blair and Brown were "politically bruised" by Labor infighting three weeks ago, and yesterday's "speech was closely watched for signs that they had reached some kind of peace, particularly since Mr. Brown offered Mr. Blair fulsome praise in a similarly scrutinized speech on Monday." The Times adds, "Mr. Blair's deft handling of the Labor crowd — drawn from a party that supposedly wants to be rid of him — showed the extent to which Labor has relied on his oratory as a vote winner."

DOJ_NMG_0069644

The Financial Times (9/27, Blitz) describes Blair's speech as "tough but tender," noting he declared "he loved his party – but that it must not retreat into a leftwing 'comfort zone' of politics after he is gone." In "a dazzling final address to the Labour conference that left many delegates in tears," Blair "said he wanted to heal the divisions with Gordon Brown, the chancellor, whom he praised as 'a remarkable man, a remarkable servant to this country.'"

USA Today/AP (9/27) reports Blair "noted Tuesday that the domestic issues that once dominated the agenda had been replaced by global challenges such as climate change, organized crime and religious extremism. 'We used to feel we could shut our front doors on the problems and conflicts of the wider world. Not anymore. The British people today are reluctant global citizens. We have to make them confident ones.'"

The Washington Times/AP (9/27, Quinn) says Brown is "a man who is much admired for his policy acumen but now seems fated to struggle to replace Blair and may ultimately even watch the post slip through his fingers." The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Stobart, 918K) and Washington Post (9/27, Jordan, 748K) run similar stories.

New Conservative Party Examined. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Patrick, 2.03M) analyzes changes within the Conservative Party under David Cameron's leadership. "By concentrating on social and environmental issues, Mr. Cameron hopes to shed the image of Conservatives as right-wingers determined to lower taxes for the wealthy and cut welfare. He reasons that by shifting the party to the center of the political spectrum, he will pick up swing voters who previously supported" Blair. "While elections are as long as three years away, it looks like Mr. Cameron, 39 years old, has the best chance in a decade to put the party of Margaret Thatcher back in government." His "decision to rework the Conservative Party's image came in response to surveys showing the party was seen as out of touch." Those "efforts with British voters are paying dividends, putting his party consistently ahead of Labour in opinion polls for the first time in more than a decade."

Senate Vote On China Tariffs May Be Delayed. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/26, 2.03M) reported, "Leading China critics in the Senate said they may again delay action on a bill to slap a big tariff on Chinese-made goods, signaling a willingness to avoid a confrontation over a long simmering currency dispute. … Lead sponsors of the legislation, Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), had been pointing toward a vote this week, raising alarms in the Bush administration that the US's free-trade credentials abroad could be undermined. But after meeting with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the senators suggested they would be willing to put off action, pending further discussions with Treasury over the next day or two about the administration's new strategy engagement with China on economic issues." The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Hitt, 2.03M) runs a similar report on its print edition.

Calpers Considers Investing In China. The Financial Times (9/27, Gangahar, Guerrera) reports, "The California Public Employees Retirement System, the largest US public pension fund, is considering investing for the first time in Chinese companies, aiming both to capitalise on the country's booming economy and to raise its exposure to emerging markets." The Times adds, "Such a move by Calpers, which has not invested any of its $208bn (€164bn) portfolio in Chinese companies because of poor corporate governance standards, could have a ripple effect on other US public pension funds and increase demand for Chinese shares." In an interview with the Financial Times, "Russell Read, Calpers' recently appointed chief investment officer, indicated that the fund could begin by investing in Chinese companies with US or international listings through American Depository Receipts and Global Depository Receipts."

German Opera House Cancels Mozart Opera That Could Be Offensive To Muslims. The New York Times (9/27, Dempsey, Landler, 1.21M) reports, "A leading German opera house has canceled performances of a Mozart opera because of security fears stirred by a scene that depicts the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad, prompting a storm of protest here about what many see as the surrender of artistic freedom." The Deutsche Oper Berlin "said Tuesday that it had pulled 'Idomeneo' from its fall schedule after the police warned of an 'incalculable risk' to the performers and the audience." The company's director, Kirsten Harms, "said she regretted the decision but felt she had no choice. She said she was told in August that the police had received an anonymous threat, but she acted only after extensive deliberations." The Times adds, "Political and cultural figures throughout Germany condemned the cancellation. Some said it recalled the decision of European newspapers not to reprint satirical cartoons about Muhammad, after their publication in Denmark generated a furor among Muslims."

DOJ_NMG_0069645

The Washington Times (9/27, Sands, 88K) reports, "The 1781 original told the tale of a king of Crete at the time of the Trojan War, but the production by director Hans Neuenfels inserts a scene in which the severed heads of Muhammad, Jesus and Buddha are placed on chairs alongside the head of the Greek sea god Poseidon." The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Fleishman, 918K) and Washington Post (9/27, Whitlock, 748K) also report the story.

Bulgaria, Romania Will Join EU. The Washington Times (9/27, Kralev, 88K) reports, "The European Union will welcome Bulgaria and Romania, two of Washington's strongest allies on the Continent, as full members on Jan. 1, but the strings attached to their accession will be the toughest in the organization's history, EU officials said yesterday." The officials also "indicated that further enlargement will have to wait until member states find a compromise on the EU constitution, whose adoption last year was derailed by French and Dutch rejection in high-profile referendums." The Bush Administration "praised the decision on Bulgaria and Romania, which joined NATO in 2004, but State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged 'the EU to continue to keep open a European horizon for a number of states, including those in the Balkans, and Turkey as well.'" The Washington Post (9/27, A21, Anderson, 748K) also reports the story.

Photographer Chronicles Darfur Genocide. A front page story in USA Today (9/27, Hampson, 2.27M) reports on Brian Steidle, a former US representative on an African Union observation team to Darfur. Steidle "has become the most vivid chronicler of one of the world's worst humanitarian catastrophes. His photographs…have helped make Americans care about a complex crisis in a faraway place of little economic or strategic value." USA adds, "He applied for a job monitoring Darfur's shaky cease-fire under the auspices of the African Union, the association of African nations whose mission in Darfur receives financial support from the United States and other nations. He'd have no power or authority to stop the violence, not even a sidearm. But Steidle did not go unarmed. Photography had been his hobby; now he bought the best digital camera he could afford: a professional-grade Canon EOS 1D Mark II. In Darfur, it would prove more powerful, and more dangerous, than a gun."

Many Cubans Say They Haven't Seen US' Anti-Castro Broadcasts. The New York Times (4/27, Goodnough, 1.21M) reports that soon after Fidel Castro announced his illness in July, the Bush Administration "stepped up its anti-Castro television broadcasts to Cuba with a new $10 million system. For the last two months, a twin-engine plane has beamed the signal of the American broadcast, called TV Martí, toward the island from over the Straits of Florida for four hours a day, six days a week, up from four hours of transmission from an Air Force plane on Saturdays. … But in interviews in the past two weeks, many Cubans said they still saw just snowy interference where the TV Martí broadcasts should be. About a dozen people in Havana said they still had never glimpsed the station even after the expanded airborne broadcasts began, raising questions about the usefulness of the $10 million expenditure. Some said they would not watch the station even if they could, because they assumed that it would be biased."

Estranged Couple Face In Battle For Brazilian Congressional Seat. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/27, A1, Moffett, 2.03M) reports that Maria Christina Mendes Caldeira and Valdemar Costa Neto married in 2003, but "the union soon flamed out. In July of 2004, Mr. Costa had the water and electricity cut off in the mansion they had shared in Brasilia to force Ms. Caldeira to move out, which she eventually did." Caldeira "found a way to strike back, personally and politically. During nationally televised congressional hearings last year about an alleged political slush fund, she stepped forward to testify that she had seen Mr. Costa stowing big stacks of cash in a secret safe. Facing possible impeachment and a ban on holding office,

DOJ_NMG_0069646

Mr. Costa resigned his seat." The pair are now running against each other in Sunday's election approaches. Costa is seeking a new four-year congressional term. Caldeira "has become his chief opponent as candidate of the Green Party." The Journal adds, "More than just a story of romance gone sour, the contest between the estranged couple goes to the heart of the big question looming over Brazil's election: How much do voters really care about political corruption?"

Freidman Says Bush Has Done Nothing To Stop "Petro-Authoritarianism." Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's speech to the UN, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's US trip and China's UN ambassador, Wang Guangya, effort to block a UN resolution calling for the deployment of peacekeeping troops to Sudan have in common "today's most infectious geopolitical disease: petro-authoritarianism." As oil "has moved to $60 to $70 a barrel, it has fostered a counterwave — a wave of authoritarian leaders who are not only able to ensconce themselves in power because of huge oil profits but also to use their oil wealth to poison the global system." Chávez, Ahmadinejad "and all their petrolist pals think we are weak and will never bite the bullet. … They know that Mr. Bush is a phony — that he always presents himself as this guy ready to make the 'tough' calls, but in reality he has not asked his party, the Congress, the people, or US industry to do one single hard thing to reduce our dependence on foreign oil." Friedman concludes that the Bush years will be remembered as "the moment when petro-authoritarianism — not freedom and democracy — spread like a wildfire and he did nothing serious to stop it."

Links To Kazakhstan Called US' Most Promising Relations With Muslim World. S. Frederick Starr, chairman of the Central Asia-Caucasus Institute at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, writes in the Washington Post (9/27, A27, 748K) that Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbayev will mark his country's 15th year of independence with a visit to the US next week. But whereas "the State Department sees Kazakhstan as a successful "corridor of reform," critics claim that it's just another corrupt petro-state and Nazarbayev himself a repressive, authoritarian ruler. The fact that Vice President Cheney recently visited the Kazakh capital of Astana only confirms their darkest suspicions: It's all about oil, and probably about Halliburton as well." Starr adds that US "links with Kazakhstan are among this country's most promising relations in the Muslim world. Developed over 15 years under both Democratic and Republican administrations, they are the fruit of hard work by US agencies, businesses, educational institutions and scores of nongovernmental organizations. They are creating a successful model of economic and social development for majority-Muslim societies. What a contrast to what we see daily in the Arab world."

NYTimes Says Abe Should Men Japan's Relations With China. The New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) editorializes, "If Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, hopes to be as popular and successful as his departing predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, he needs to be equally daring in breaking with failed policies of the past. The obvious place to start is by rebuilding Japan's badly damaged relations with China. … The first step should be declaring that he will not continue Mr. Koizumi's provocative practice of visiting the Yasukuni Shrine, where the spirits of convicted war criminals are honored. The shrine controversy, and the failure of Japanese textbooks to deal honestly with the wartime behavior of Japanese troops, complicate the nation's ability to handle contemporary military issues, like the emerging debate over amending the pacifist constitution that America imposed on it after World War II. There is no reason Japan should not be able to make that change. But unless it first comes to terms with its history and its neighbors, such a step would be poorly received by other Asian nations."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Bush Goes Public With Terror Study."
"Sorry, Cupcake, You're Not Welcome In Class."
"Rap's Captive Audience."
"Drug Offenders To Be Banned From Skid Row."
"Security Shaping Campaign."
"Abortion Vote In House May Be Too Late To Boost GOP."
"Germans Jeering Opera's Bow To Islamic Extremists."

USA Today:

"College Overhaul Called 'Overdue.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069647

"Through Lens In Darfur, 'I Was A Witness To Genocide.'"
"Marriage Gap Could Sway Elections."

New York Times:

"Backing Policy, President Issues Terror Estimate."
"How A Reviled Court System Has Outlasted Many Critics."
"New York City Plans Sharp Limits On Restaurants' Use Of Trans Fats."
"New Campaign Ads Have A Theme: Don't Be Nice."
"Opera Canceled Over A Depiction Of Muhammad."
"Forensic Skills Seek To Uncover Hidden Patterns Of Elder Abuse."

Washington Post:

"Part Of Iraq Intelligence report Is Released."
"West Point Mourns A Font Of Energy, Laid To Rest By War."
"States, Counties Begin To Enforce Immigration Law."
"Distrust Breaks The Bonds Of A Baghdad Neighborhood."
"Deaths Of 3 D.C. Teens In 24 Hours Shock City
"Teens' T-Shirts Make Educators Squirm."

Detroit Free Press:

"Stockholders Rise Up, Push GM Changes."
"Partying Like Hell."
"Doctor Charged In Wife's 1968 Death."
"Hard To Hide."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Germans Gripe: This Bud's Not For Us."
"Details Of Plot Shock Canada."
"Stopping To Help? Be Careful."
"Boy, 9, Hacked To Death; Was Right Man Shot?"
"Fragile Digital Data In Danger Of Fading Past History's Reach."

Houston Chronicle:

"Gang Attack Kills Teen Rival In Park."
"Schools Might Get To Make The Call On Cell Phones."
"First-Class Night Down In Class A."
"Baby's Body At The Center Of Alleged Corpse Scam."
"Report: Storms Left New Human Landscape."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: NIE Report; Blame For Al Qaeda; Afghanistan Violence; Health Care Cost; Stock Market; Race Car Crash; The Mona Lisa; Byron Nelson Obit; World War I Soldier Buried.

CBS: NIE Report; NIE Report Analysis; Afghanistan Violence; Cocaine Suppliers Forfeit $2 Million; Fastow Goes To Prison; Heating Bills Going Down; Student Loans; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Natan Sharansky-Opinion; Byron Nelson Obit; World War I Burial-Arlington.

NBC: NIE Report; Clinton Vs Bush-Al Qaeda Blame; Afghanistan Violence; Stock Market; Fastow & Ebbers Now in Prison; New Orleans Clean Up; California Wildfires; Hood Blimp Crash; Immigration Debate-Colorado; World War I Burial-Arlington.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Bush Declassifies NIE; CA-Wildfire.

CBS: Bush Declassifies NIE; Nelson Obit.; Fastow Sentenced; Ebbers Reports To Prison; Wall Street; CA-Wildfire; Hilton Charged With Drunk Driving.

NPR: Bush Declassifies NIE; Talabani-Washington Visit; Rumsfeld-Albania Visit; US Nuclear Reprocessing Factory Project; Fastow Sentenced; Ebbers Reports To Prison.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends Bob Corker for US Senate and Tennessee Republican Party luncheon, Private residence, Memphis; Meets with President Musharraf of Pakistan and Afghan President Karzai.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Subcommittee. Hearing on U.S. policy and practice on the use of riot control agents by the armed forces. Assistant Defense Secretary Peter Flory; Rear Adm. Anthony Winns, vice director for operations, J-3, Joint Staff. Location: Room 232A, Russell. Notes: Closed session follows in Room 222, Russell.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Meeting on pending nominations and legislation. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on development of an artificial pancreas. Griffin Rogers, Acting Director, National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases; Chris Dudley, Dudley Foundation; Arnold Donald, Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation

DOJ_NMG_0069648

International; Caroline Sweeney, Gray, Maine. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nomination of Robert Howard to be Assistant VAD Secretary. Location: Room 418, Russell. Notes: Markup of the nomination following the first roll call vote after Noon in the Reception Room off the Senate floor.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Bioterrorism and Public Health Preparedness Subcommittee. Hearing on improvement to emergency medical care. Frederick Blum, president, American College of Emergency Physicians; Margaret van Amringe, Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations; Nancy Bonalumi, President, Emergency Nurses Association; Leon Haley, Jr., Grady Health Systems; Robert Bass, President, National Association of EMS officials. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on refugee admissions and policies. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (37 bills): 1) H.R. 6138 - To temporarily extend the programs under the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes; 2) H.R. 4766 - Native American Languages Preservation Act of 2006; 3) H. Res. 1009 - Supporting efforts to promote greater public awareness of effective runaway youth prevention programs and the need for safe and productive alternatives, resources, and supports for homeless youth and youth in other high-risk situations; 4) H.R. 6106 - To extend the waiver authority for the Secretary of Education under title IV, section 105, of Public Law 109-148; 5) H.Res. 295 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives supporting the establishment of September as Campus Fire Safety Month, and for other purposes; 6) H.Con.Res. 478 - Supporting the goals and ideals of ``Lights On Afterschool!", a national celebration of after-school programs; 7) H.R. 5483 - Railroad Retirement Disability Earnings Act; 8) H.R. 4981 - Dam Safety Act of 2006; 9) H.R. 5546 - Carroll A. Campbell, Jr. Federal Courthouse Designation Act; 10) H.R. 5606 - William M. Steger Federal Building and United States Courthouse Designation Act; 11) H.R. 5026 - Andres Toro Building Designation Act; 12) H.R. 6051 - John F. Seiberling Federal Building Designation Act; 13) H.R. 1556 - Clyde S. Cahill Memorial Park Designation Act; 14) H.R. 2322 - Kika de la Garza Federal Building Designation Act; 15) H.R. 5637 - Nonadmitted and Reinsurance Reform Act of 2006; 16) S. 3850 - Credit Rating Agency Reform Act of 2006; 17) H.R. 5347 - HOPE VI Reauthorization Act of 2006; 18) H.R. 6079 - Hedge Fund Study Act; 19) H.R. 5503 - FHA Multifamily Loan Limit Adjustment Act of 2006; 20) H.R. 5585 - Financial Netting Improvements Act of 2006; 21) H.R. 6062 - Community Development Investment Enhancements Act of 2006; 22) H.R. 6072 - Financial Services Regulatory Relief Amendments Act of 2006; 23) H.R. 6162 - Secure Border Initiative Financial Accountability Act of 2006; 24) H. Con. Res. 473 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Gynecologic Cancer Awareness Month; 25) H. Res. 402 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Infant Mortality Awareness Month; 26) H. Res. 748 - Recognizing the 225th anniversary of the American and French victory at Yorktown, Virginia, during the Revolutionary War; 27) H. Con. Res. 222 - Supporting the goals and ideals of National Pregnancy and Infant Loss Remembrance Day; 28) H. Res. 991 - Congratulating the Columbus Northern Little League Baseball Team from Columbus, Georgia, on its victory in the 2006 Little League World Series Championship games; 29) H.R. 5108 - Lance Corporal Robert A. Martinez Post Office Building Designation Act; 30) H.R. 6075 - Robert J. Thompson Post Office Building Designation Act; 31) H.R 6078 - Chuck Fortenberry Post Office Building Designation Act; 32) H.R. 4720 - Beverly J. Wilson Post Office Building Designation Act; 33) H. Res. 973 - Recognizing Financial Planning Week, recognizing the significant impact of sound financial planning on achieving life's goals, and honoring families and the financial planning profession for their adherence and dedication to the financial planning process; 34) H.R. 5989 - John J. Sinde Post Office Building Designation Act; 35) H.R. 5990 - Wallace W. Sykes Post Office Building Designation Act; 36) S. 3613 - Major George Quamo Post Office Building Designation Act; 37) S. 3187 - Richard L. Cevoli Post Office.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES AND VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Military Personnel Subcommittee and Economic Opportunity Subcommittee. Joint Hearing on the ``Montgomery GI Bill for Members of the Select Reserve." Michael Dominguez, Defense Department; Keith Wilson, VA; retired Vice Adm. Norbert Ryan, Military Officers Association of America; Steve Kime, Servicemembers Opportunity College. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0069649

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises and the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Joint hearing on protecting Americans from catastrophic terrorism risk. Edmund F. (Ted) Kelly, CEO, Liberty Mutual Insurance Co.; Ramani Ayer, Chairman, President, and Chief Executive Officer, Hartford Financial Services Group; Gregory C. Case, President and Chief Executive Officer, Aon Corporation; Jacques E. Dubois, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Swiss Re America Holding Company; Christopher J. Nassetta, President and Chief Executive Officer, Host Hotels and Resorts, Inc.; Sharon Emek, Partner, CBS Coverage Group, Inc.; Warren Heck, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Greater New York Mutual Insurance Company; Janice M. Abraham, President and Chief Executive Officer, United Educators Insurance; Edwin L. Harper, Senior Vice President, Assurant, Inc.; Ira Shapiro, on behalf of the Real Estate Board of New York; Jonathan W. Knipe, World Trade Center Properties LLC. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOUSE ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on the House's 10-year IT vision. Kathy Goldschmidt, Congressional Management Foundation; consultant Larry Bradley; Jim Cornell, inspector general, House of Representatives; Wilson S. Livingood, sergeant-at-arms, House of Representatives; Karen Haas, clerk, House of Representatives; Pope Barrow, legislative counsel, House of Representatives; James Eagen, chief administrative officer, House of Representatives. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Disability Assistance and Memorial Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on the pension programs operated by the VA. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10:15 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on intelligence reform. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Education Reform Subcommittee. Hearing on early childhood visitation programs. Debroah Daro, University of Chicago; Michele Ridge, Family Nurse Partnership; Anna Scovell, Lake Forest School District, Delmar, Del. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 6134 - Health Opportunity Patient Empowerment Act. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Continued hearing on Internet child pornography and exploitation. Keith Wallace, Families Thru International Adoption, Evansville, Ind.; Jeannene Smith, founder, Reaching Out Thru International Adoption, Somerdale, N.J.; Richard L. Baird, Jr., Adiago Health, Inc., Pittsburgh; Carol Eiferman, Reaching Out Thru Adoption, Mount Laurel, N.J.; Serguei Dymtchenko, Toms River, N.J.; Marlene Seamans-Conn, former Executive Director, Reaching Out Thru International Adoption, Sewell, N.J.; Hannah Druger, Reaching Out Thru International Adoption, Medford, N.J.; Jared Rolsky, Joint Council on International Children's Services, Alexandria, Va.; Trish Maskew, Ethica, Inc., Silver Spring, Md. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee. Hearing on banks in real estate and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency's December 2005 ruling. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Energy and Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on rebalancing the carbon cycle. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Hearing on improving security and commerce at the nation's ports. Philip Byrd, Sr., Bulldog Highway Express, Charleston, S.C.; Debbie Gosselin, Chesapeake Marine Tours, Annapolis, Md.; George Leavell, Wepfer Marine, Memphis; Danny Schnautz, Clark Freight Lines, Pasadena, Texas. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Aviation subcommittee. Oversight hearing on ``Next Generation Air Transportation System Financing Options." Gerald Dillingham, GAO; Acting CBO Director Donald Marron; R. John Hansman, MIT; Ellen Jewett, Goldman, Sachs and Co. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on irregular warfare. Mario Mancuso, Deputy Assistant Defense Secretary; Vice Adm. Eric Olson, U.S. Special Operations Command; Brig. Gen. O.G. Mannon, Deputy Director, Special Operations, Joint Chiefs of Staff. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0069650

2:30 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on U.S.-Republic of Korea relations. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill; Deputy Undersecretary of Defense Richard Lawless; Balbina Hwang, Heritage Foundation; L. Gordon Flake, Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation; Joshua Stanton, former judge advocate, U.S. Army. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT MUSHARRAF _ Highlights: 7:30 p.m. Meets with President Bush and Afdghan President Karzai. White House.

AFGHAN PRESIDENT HAMID KARZAI _ Highlights: 7:30 p.m. Meets with President Bush and Pakistani President Musharraf. White House.

GREEK FOREIGN MINISTER DORA BAKOYANNIS _ Highlights: 9 a.m. Meets with Energy Secretary Bodman. Energy Department. 10 a.m. Holds briefing for Greek media. At the Embassy. 11 a.m. Gives a speech on ``The Evolution of Europe and the U.S.: Synthesis or Antithesis?". Gaston Hall, Georgetown University. 3:15 p.m. Meets with Secretary of State Rice. State Department. 4:30 p.m. Meets with National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. White House. 5:30 p.m. Attends inauguration of a new chair in Hellenic studies. Healy Hall, Georgetown University.

AIR FORCE EXPO _ Air Force Association holds Air & Space Conference 2006 and Technology Exposition. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Role of Congress in Providing for the National Defense, Rep. Curt Weldon (R-PA). 11 a.m. Conference Address on the Future of Air and Space Power by General T. Michael Moseley. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, Washington.

NATIONAL SECURITY _ 9 a.m. - 2 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a program on the nation's strategic challenges and to launch the Princeton Project on National Security Report. Highlights: 10 a.m. Session on whether a new strategy is needed, with James Dobbins, RAND Corp., publisher Mortimer Zuckerman, G. John Ikenberry of Princeton University. 11 a.m. Panel on the economic dimensions of national security, with David Rubenstein of the Carlyle Group, former CBO Director Douglas holtz-Eakin, others. 12 p.m. Sen. Chuck Hagel. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon discussion on national security in the 21st century, with John Bellinger of the State Department, others. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

HEALTH CARE _ 10 a.m. The Amgen Foundation holds a symposium on improving health care. Highlights: 10:20 a.m. CMMS Administrator Mark McClellan. 12 p.m. Donald Berwick, Institute for Healthcare Improvement. Location: Jordan Conference Center, Kaiser Family Foundation, 1330 G St. NW.

BUSINESS COSTS _ 9 a.m. The National Association of Manufacturers and the Manufacturing Institute hold a news conference to release a cost study showing structural costs sharply increasing. Location: Suite 600, NAM, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

FEDERAL CONTRACTING _ 9 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce holds a federal procurement business forum, with GSA Administrator Lurita Doan. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House GOP Conference. Location: Capitol Hill Club. Notes: Stakeout at 10 a.m.

HEALTH CARE _ 9:30 a.m. AARP and the American Hospital Association hold a program with former Sen. John Breaux, Rick Pollack of AHA, John rother of AARP, others, on health care reform. Location: National Press Club.

HOUSE CANDIDATES _ 9:45 a.m. Twelve veterans running for Congress as Democrats and Rep. John Murtha discuss the administration's military policy, Democratic support for troops and veterans assistance. Location: Phoenix Hotel, 520 N. Capitol St.

COMMUNISM MEMORIAL _ 10 a.m. Groundbreaking for the Victims of Communism Memorial, with Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky as the featured speaker. Location: Massachusetts and New Jersey Aves. and G St. NW. Notes: Reception follows in room HC-5, Capitol.

LINE ITEM VETO _ 10 a.m. The Council for Citizens Against Government Waste holds a news conference in support of the line item veto, with OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: National Press Club.

PHYSICIANS RALLY _ 10 a.m. Family doctors hold a rally to call on the next Congress to fix the nation's health care system. Location: West Lawn, Capitol.

SUPREME COURT _ 10 a.m. Environmental Defense holds a telephone briefing on two clean air cases upcoming on the Supreme Court calendar this term. Notes: Callin number: 800-903-0258; passcode: Supreme Court.

DEMOCRATS-BUSH AGENDA _ 10:30 a.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, and other Democratic House and Senate Democrats hold a press briefing to say the will hold the Republican Congress accountable for what they see as its rubberstamping of the Bush Administration's ``misguided" agenda. Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0069651

NATIONAL PREPAREDNESS _ 11 a.m. George Mason University School of Law sponsors a discussion with Undersecretary of Homeland Security George Foresman on the future of critical infrastructure protection, followed by a panel discussion with Johanna Schneider of The Business Roundtable, David Eisner of the Corporation for National and Community Service, Paul Kurtz of the Cyber Security Industry Alliance, others. Location: National Press Club.

RELIGION-FOREIGN POLICY _ 11 a.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record media conference call with Walter Russell Mead discussing his article on evangelical Christians and U.S. foreign policy. Contacts: n/a, 212-434-9537. Notes: Callin number: 800-290-9461. passcode: Religion. RSVP required to NYpressRSVPcfr.org. Open to media only.

SUBURBAN BILLS _ 11:30 a.m. The Congressional Suburban Caucus unveils its ``7 Bills for 2007" agenda. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

YUCCA MOUNTAIN _ 10 a.m. Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee nuclear policy staff and counsel and E&W Appropriations staff hold a briefing on the Yucca Mountain Bill to be introduced by Senator Domenici. Location: Room 328, Senate Hart Office Building.

BABY BOOMERS _ 12 p.m. The National Association of Area Agencies on Aging and other organizations hold a press conference to release the report ``Will America Be Ready?," foucsing on the maturing of America and assessing the nation's preparedness for the aging baby boomer population. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRATS-BUDGET _ 12 p.m. Sen. Kent Conrad and Rep. John Spratt hold a news conference to discuss the GOP budget and appropriations processes. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

HEALTH INSURANCE _ 12 p.m. The Economic Policy Institute holds a telephone briefing on a report showing more Americans are going without health insurance as employers drop health plans. Contacts: Nancy Coleman, 202-775-8810.

HIGHER EDUCATION _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a forum on reform of higher education, with Charles Miller of the Secretary of Education's Commission on the Future of Higher Education, President Christopher Nelson of St. John's college, others. Location: 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

JORDAN _ 12 p.m. Linda Jordan gives the kickoff speech in the I King Jordan Lecture Series. Location: Swindells Auditorium, Kellogg Conference Hotel, Gallaudet University.

VOTER PLEDGE _ 1 p.m. National watchdog organizations hold a telephone briefing to release signers of the ``Voters First" pledge. Notes: Callin number: 888-868-9079; passcode: 7900382.

CHILD OBESITY _ 2 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, others, announce a task force Media and Childhood Obesity: Today and Tomorrow. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

TORTURE _ 2 p.m. Rep. Cynthia McKinney holds a briefing on the history, techniques, training and use of torture by the U.S. government. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

CLEAN ENERGY _ 2:30 p.m. - 4 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute hosts a congressional briefing on a recently released report from the Western Governors Association, and association of 19 states and three US-flag Pacific islands, ttitled, ``Clean Energy, a Strong Economy and a Healthy Environment." Location: Room 340, Cannon House Office Building.

ROTARY INTERNATIONAL _ 3 p.m. Rotary International President Bill Boyd addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Boyd will discuss the mobilization of Rotarians in 162 countries to promote international cooperation in addressing problems in the developing world. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

AGRICULTURE _ 3 p.m. - 5 p.m. The Institute for International Economics and the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations meets to examine US agricultural policy and present news reforms to revive the Doha Round and ensure the long-term competetiveness of the US agricultural sector. Location: 1750 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BAGHDAD ER _ 5 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a screening for the documentary, ``Baghdad ER," a look at emergency care in Baghdad. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BHATT HONORED _ 6 p.m. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton; AFL-CIO President John Sweeney; Inez McCormack, former President of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, and other leaders from the union, women's rights, international financial and academic communities will gather to honor Ela Bhatt, founder and former General Secretary of the Self-Employed Women's Association (SEWA). Location: AFL-CIO Headquarters, 815 16th St, NW.

DOJ_NMG_0069652

CONGRESSIONAL HISPANIC _ 7 p.m. The Congressional Hispanic Leadership Institute holds its 2nd annual Hispanic Heritage Month gala. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Detainee Measure Likely To Pass, But Eavesdropping Action Looks Unlikely ... 3
EU To Investigate Belgian Firm's Data-Sharing With US ... 3
US Makes Adjustments At Guantanamo For Ramadan ... 4

Homeland Response:

US Will Not Appeal Ruling On DHS Labor Rules ... 4
Chertoff, Democrats Spar Over 100% Screening At Foreign Ports ... 5
New Carry-On Rules Cause Some Confusion, Delays ... 5

War News:

Bush Declassifies Portion Of NIE, Calls War Critics "Naïve." ... 6
Gonzales Says DOJ To Follow "Standard Procedure" On NIE Leak ... 7
Bush Will Try To Mediate Between Karzai, Musharraf At White House Dinner ... 8
Suicide Bomber Kills 18 In Afghanistan ... 9
Five People Killed In Baghdad As Violence Continues ... 9
Poll Finds Most Iraqis Want Immediate US Withdrawal ... 9
Saddam Removed From Courtroom ... 10
Oil-For-Food Inquiry Finds Australian Wheat Exporter Was Warned ... 10
West Point Buries First Female Graduate To Die In Iraq ... 10

Corporate Scandals:

Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Prison ... 10
Ebbers Reports To Prison ... 11
Attorneys To Discuss Scrushy Request For A New Trial ... 11
Jenkins Says H-P Scandal Is "Devoid Of Larger Meaning." ... 12
Options Probes Hit Investors In Bottom Line ... 12

Criminal Law:

Plame Probe Has Cost $1.4 Million So Far ... 12
Gotti Jurors Tell Judge They Are Deadlocked ... 13
Senate To Cooperate With DOJ On Probe Of Former FDA Head 13
Former Westinghouse Electric Nuclear Engineer Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges ... 13
Stevens Reveals FBI Made Second Search Of Alaska Office ... 14
Judge Sentences Ailing Gambino Capo To 12 Years In Prison ... 14
Lawmakers Seek Data Retention By Web Hosts ... 14
Police Seize Electronics From Home Where DC Attorney Was Killed ... 14
SCOTUS To Consider Appeal In Arizona Death Penalty Case ... 15
Biker Brawlers Go On Trial In Law Vegas ... 15
Many Business Web Sites Vulnerable To Cyber Crime ... 15
US Seeks Death Penalty For Two In DC Drug Conspiracy ... 16
Gambling Companies Warned Not To Accept Bets In Louisiana 16
Conspiracy Trial Begins For Two Alleged MS-13 Members ... 16
Murders Of Three Teens Raises Alarms Across DC ... 16
Thieves Killed Cutting Into Power Lines For Copper ... 16
Philadelphia Man Charged With Defrauding Victim-Assistance Program ... 17
Seven In Three States Indicted On Katrina Aid Fraud Charges ... 17
Paper Executive Sentenced To 15 Years In Prison For $300-Million Fraud ... 17
New York Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Prison For Investment Fraud ... 17
New York's Local Courts Survive Despite A Century Of Criticism 18
Officials Use Forensic Techniques To Diagnose Elder Abuse ... 18
Internet Revives Land Scams ... 18
"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Enters Guilty Plea ... 18
Tennessee Man Sentenced For Removing Classified Data ... 18
Resolution Of San Diego Pension Fund Scandal Criticized ... 18

Civil Law:

High Court To Rule On Use Of Union Dues For Political Activity 19
LATimes Criticizes Class Action Light Cigarette Lawsuit ... 19

Civil Rights:

Rohrabacher Asks For DOJ Probe Of Border Agents' Prosecution ... 19
Boston Police Officer Charged With Violating Civil Rights Of Prostitute ... 19
Missouri Ice Cream Company Managers Indicted On Human Trafficking Charges ... 20
Cambodia Cracks Down On Child Sex Trade ... 20
Racist Graffiti Forces Charles County To Confront Race Relations Problem ... 20
Judge Says Louisiana Parish Schools On Target For Release From Federal Oversight ... 20
House Passes Parental Notification Bill ... 21
House Approves Bill On Religious Lawsuits ... 21
Texas Court Case Tests Limits Of Legal Intervention In Church Affairs ... 21

Antitrust:

Wright Bill Backers Press For Compromise..... 22
Johnson & Johnson Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Deal . 22
Judge Dismisses Part Of AMD's Claim Against Intel 22
DeCode Genetics Sues Former Employees For Stealing Trade Secrets 23
Think Tank Director Says Microsoft Can't Be Guilty Of A Crime Before It Commits It 23
FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Regent Radio Station Buy 23
Kroes Claims US Lobbied Her Over Microsoft Fine 23
New Jersey MLS Withdraws Display Policy 23

Environment:

Judge Allows California Auto Emissions Suit To Proceed..... 24
NOAA Researchers Accuse White House Of Blocking Warming Report 24
Seattle Law Firm Represents 76 Clients In Tainted Spinach Lawsuits 24
Ohio Town Has Been A Test Lab On Air Pollution Since 1970's 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Cali Cartel Leaders Get 30-Year Prison Sentences 24
Pakistani Man Gets 18-Year Sentence In Drugs-For-Weapons Scheme 26
Beheadings Seen As Mexican Drug Cartels' New Method Of Intimidation 26
Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team 26
House Approves New Gun Show Rules 26
ATF Seeks Creation Of Gang Field Office In Seattle Area 27

Immigration:

High Court To Consider California Immigrant Car Theft Case 27
Fort Bragg ID Sweep Nets 28 Detentions..... 27
Judge Orders Deportation Of Three Egyptian Students..... 28
McCain Says He Is Inclined To Vote For Narrower Immigration Bill 28

Tax:

Rangel Says Eliminating Tax Cuts Is On Table..... 29

Congress-Administration:

Congress Poised To Approve $448 Billion Defense Budget..... 29
Senate Democrats Seek To Block GOP Legislative Priorities 29
Bush Signs Bill Creating Online Database Of Federal Spending 29
Johanns Says Bush Administration Wants Say In Next Farm Bill30
Spellings Outlines Higher Education Reforms..... 30
Swagel Nominated To Be Assistant Treasury Secretary 30
GAO Criticizes DOD Travel Booking System 31
Cheney's Helicopter Left Sitting On Tarmac As Bush's Takes Off First 31
Website Publishing Congressional Aide Salary Information..... 31
O'Connor Criticizes Atmosphere Of Judicial Intimidation 31
Congress Urged To Pass Bill Aiding Disadvantaged Youth..... 31

Other News:

Consumer Confidence Up..... 32
Hillary Clinton Defends Husband's Fox Interview Performance .. 32
Midterm Election Ads Seen As "Most Toxic" In Memory 33
Some Conservatives Prefer Democratic Congressional Majority 33
Marriage "Gap" Could Play Role In House Elections..... 34
Cheney Attends His 100th Fundraiser Of Midterm Cycle..... 34
Democrats Seek Lobbyist Contributions..... 34
Challenger Seeks Investigation Of Murtha's Links To Lobbying Firms 34
Third Acquaintance Claims Allen Used Racist Slur..... 35
Steele Quickly Responds To First Negative DSCC Ad 35
Chafee Criticized For Supporting GOP Leaders 36
RNC Devoting One-Third Of Fall Ad Budget To Three Senate Races 36
NRCC Wades Into MN6 To Bash Wetterling..... 36
Padgett Gets Welcome Boost From First Lady In OH18..... 36
Hospital Officials Defend Salary Increase For Obama's Wife 37
Democrats Propose Reimbursing States For Backup Paper Ballots 37
Ensign To Chair NRSC 37
Richardson Hints At 2008 Campaign..... 37
Bass Aide Resigns After Posing As Liberal Blogger..... 38
Iraq War Protesters Arrested At Hart Senate Building 38
Justices To Examine Links Between Credit Ratings, Insurance Rates..... 38
Surveys Find Health Premiums Rising Twice As Fast As Inflation 38
WSJournal Celebrates Possible South Carolina Move Toward School Choice..... 39
Russia Will Begin Nuclear Fuel Shipments To Iran In March..... 39
Rice Eyes Trip To Northeast Asia, Says Pyongyang's Time Running Out..... 39
IDF Expects To Withdraw From Lebanon Before Sunday 40
Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact..... 40
Korean Seen As Leading Candidate To Replace Annan 40
Japan To Continue Push For Permanent UNSC Seat 40
Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team 40
In Labor Address, Blair Does Not Clarify Departure Date 41
Senate Vote On China Tariffs May Be Delayed 41
German Opera House Cancels Mozart Opera That Could Be Offensive To Muslims 42
Bulgaria, Romania Will Join EU 42
Photographer Chronicles Darfur Genocide..... 42
Many Cubans Say They Haven't Seen US' Anti-Castro Broadcasts 42
Estranged Couple Face In Battle For Brazilian Congressional Seat..... 42
Freidman Says Bush Has Done Nothing To Stop "Petro-Authoritarianism." 43
Links To Kazakhstan Called US' Most Promising Relations With Muslim World 43
NYTimes Says Abe Should Men Japan's Relations With China . 43

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 43

DOJ_NMG_0069655

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 44

TERRORISM NEWS:

Detainee Measure Likely To Pass, But Eavesdropping Action Looks Unlikely. The New York Times (9/27, Hulse, Zernike, 1.21M) reports Congress "was headed toward a split decision on President Bush's pre-election national security agenda, moving closer to passage of legislation on the handling of terrorism suspects while all but giving up hope of agreeing on a final bill to authorize the administration's eavesdropping program. Lawmakers in both the House and Senate said it now appeared doubtful that bills covering the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program could pass both houses and be reconciled before Congress adjourns this weekend, an outcome that would deny Republicans one of the main achievements they hoped to take into the election." CQ (9/26, Starks) reports Democrats said the NIE offered "evidence that Iraq has been a distracting and dangerous misadventure." The Washington Post (9/27, A4, Weisman, Leonnig, 748K) reports congressional Democrats said that, after November, "without the political pressure of a looming election and with a strengthened hand coming in the next Congress, Senate Democrats would probably filibuster Republican wiretapping legislation this year."

The Washington Post (9/27, A4, Smith, Babington, 748K) reports National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and Republican senators met Tuesday to continue negotiations over military trials of terrorism suspects, but "they did not resolve a dispute over whether the captives should have access to U.S. courts." The Post says the "complex measure…nonetheless appears likely to win approval by the time Congress adjourns at the end of this week. A vote is expected in the House today on a version of the legislation that the White House supports. It was unclear yesterday evening whether Republican leaders would allow any amendments to it." The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Chaddock, 58K) says Congress is "rushing to pass new legislation" on how to bring detainees "to trial -- or not. It's the 'not' -- President Bush's claim that any 'enemy combatant' can be detained indefinitely, without access to US courts -- that is the last obstacle to finishing a bill this week."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (9/27, A26, 748K) editorializes, "What's important is that any legal system approved by Congress pass the tests set by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) months ago: that the United States can be proud of it, that the world will see it as fair and humane, and that the Supreme Court can uphold it. … White House pressure may have persuaded many in Congress that the easiest course is to quickly approve the detention bill in its present form and leave town. If so, their actions almost surely will come back to haunt them. Until this country adopts a legal system for the war on terrorism that meets Mr. Warner's standard, the war itself will be unwinnable."

Human rights advocate Natan Sharansky appeared in the CBS Evening News (9/26, story 9, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) "Free Speech" segment, saying, "After nine years in the Soviet gulag, and 400 days in the cells, I know that sleep deprivation, exposure to cold, are forms of torture. Maintaining our principles in the face of terror is sometimes dangerous. Abandoning those principles would be even more dangerous. Still, I'm deeply concerned that some of those who insist that America not see the moral high ground don't recognize that America stands on the moral high ground. Those who abused at Abu Ghraib or Guantanamo Bay, accuse America of being no different than the Soviet Union or Saddam's regime have lost all sense of moral clarity. America is different because your citizens can protest without going to prison. America is different because your courts can defend rights, and your press can expose injustice. America is different because your Congress can hold hearings, and because your people can hold your leaders accountable. America is different because America is free. In standing up against torture, I hope that all Americans will remember the profound moral divide that separates the free world from the world of fear and work to advance a broad, the very principles you so rightly cherish at home."

In a USA Today (9/27, 13A, 2.27M) op-ed, Nat Hentoff, author of "The War on the Bill of Rights and the Gathering Resistance," writes, "The Constitution is being undermined, and the world still can't be assured that prisoners held by the U.S. are being humanely treated. So where are the winners? … Despite all the purported obeisance to the Geneva Conventions in this agreement that ended the McCain-Warner-Graham mutiny, there will be no way for Americans or the world to know whether these 'enemy combatants' -- many of whom might be innocent -- have been subjected to the same outrages upon personal dignity that this epic struggle by the three senators presumably prevents."

EU To Investigate Belgian Firm's Data-Sharing With US. The AP (9/26, Brand) reports the EU will investigate allegations that the Belgian company SWIFT's "sharing of confidential banking records with U.S. authorities for anti-terror probes could have violated EU laws." EU data protection officers said the "problem raised 'immediate concerns about the lack of transparency which has surrounded' a secret transfer deal between the U.S. Treasury" and SWIFT. The New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) reports EU spokesman Friso Roscam Abbing said the officials "would meet again in November and would then issue an opinion."

DOJ_NMG_0069656

Bush Exchange With Reporter Over EU Counterterror Spokesman Recounted. In a "Verbatim" item, the Washington Post (9/27, A25, 748K) details the exchange at Tuesday's news conference between President Bush and al-Arabiya's Nadia Bilbassy-Charters, who asked Bush about comments by EU "counterterrorism chief European spokesman who said today that the international support for terrorism has receded. Do you agree with that?" Bush: "First of all, I didn't -- what was this person a spokesman for?" Bilbassy-Charters: "Counterterrorism chief in Europe." Bush: "Some obscure spokesman?" Bilbassy-Charters: "No, actually, he has a name." Bush: "Okay, he's a got a name. Well, no, I don't agree with the spokesman for the obscure organization that said that the international commitment to fighting terror is declining."

US Makes Adjustments At Guantanamo For Ramadan. The AP (9/27, Melia) reports, "Muslim detainees at Guantanamo Bay entered Ramadan with traditional sweets, dates and honey — but without a military chaplain to lead them in prayer during Islam's holy month." The AP continues, "Nearly all the alleged al-Qaida and Taliban members held at the detention center in Cuba are observing Ramadan, officials said Tuesday. Meals are offered before dawn and after sunset to accommodate their fasting during daylight hours. … The adjustments for Ramadan, which began Saturday, come as the U.S. prison faces accusations of religious insensitivity." The AP adds, "A court challenge seeking the return of a full-time Muslim chaplain to the base has been filed by one detainee's attorney, who said that regular religious services would help 'preserve the sanity' of the detainees. … 'I think it would preserve order and discourage these suicides that are happening there,' attorney Gaillard Hunt said. … A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the motion, citing ongoing litigation."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Will Not Appeal Ruling On DHS Labor Rules. Government Executive (9/27, Rutzick) reports, "Government officials on Monday night passed up their last chance to seek reversal of a court decision blocking proposed labor relations reforms at the Homeland Security Department." GE continues, "The solicitor general's office, which brings cases to the Supreme Court on behalf of government agencies, let a midnight deadline pass without filing an appeal at the high court. … 'We're OK with that because it allows the department to move forward in implementing our labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in the litigation process,' said Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman." GE adds, "In June, an appeals panel unanimously upheld, and even broadened, an earlier ruling that the proposed system would illegally curtail collective bargaining rights for employees by giving management the ability to cancel negotiated agreements. DHS and Justice Department officials in August decided against challenging that decision before the full appellate court, but left open the option for a Supreme Court appeal. … A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on why the solicitor general chose not to pursue the Supreme Court appeal."

Federal Computer Week (9/27, Chan) reports, "The decision allows the agency to move forward to 'pursue labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in litigation,' Orluskie said. … 'If we go to the Supreme Court, we'd go on and on and on,' he said. 'What we're going to do is engage with our other partners, with the components, OPM, sit down with the unions and consider all available options.'"

The Federal Times (9/27, Kauffman) reports, "The government had until midnight Sept. 25 to appeal the case to the Supreme Court. … The focus now will shift to figuring out how to proceed from here, Orluskie said, adding that Homeland Security soon will meet with officials from inside the department, the Office of Personnel Management and the unions to begin those discussions." The Times adds, "The June 27 decision from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit invalidated changes the department had proposed making to the Title 5 rules governing collective bargaining, labor management procedures, and employee appeals of disciplinary actions. … The department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the reformed personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors will convert on Oct. 1, Orluskie said."

The Washington Post (9/27, D04, Barr) reports, "Administration officials declined to discuss what Clement's decision means for the Defense Department, which also has been stopped by a federal court from trying to curb union rights as part of the new National Security Personnel System. The Pentagon has appealed the court ruling, but Mark Roth , general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, said that the Defense Department 'would be smart to end this now.'" The Post adds, "Four years ago, Congress gave the Homeland Security Department a green light to overhaul how it pays, promotes and disciplines about 110,000 employees as part of the larger reorganization to strengthen homeland security and fight terrorism. But the rollout of the new system was slowed by legal setbacks in the past two years, and the department no longer has "a hard timeline," as one official put it, for completing the new personnel system. … About 4,000 supervisors and nonunion employees at Homeland Security headquarters, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center have been placed under a new performance-management system. An additional 6,700 managers and supervisors at Citizenship and Immigration Services and Customs and Border Protection will convert to the new performance system next month."

DOJ_NMG_0069657

Chertoff, Democrats Spar Over 100% Screening At Foreign Ports. The Washington Times (9/27, Hudson, 88K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "sparred" with Democratic members of the House Homeland Security Committee yesterday "over the feasibility of scanning cargo for nuclear materials at foreign ports before ships depart for the United States." Chertoff said "that total screening is unrealistic and that other measures are being implemented to protect US ports from such terrorist threats." Rep. Peter A. DeFazio argued that the US could refuse the entry of cargo from countries unwilling to have containers screened at their ports and "proposed a three-year period to implement such a strategy, but Mr. Chertoff balked and called it an 'artificial deadline' that would be 'as unrealistic as passing a law that says in three years cancer has to be cured.'"

New Carry-On Rules Cause Some Confusion, Delays. In an article appearing on at least 56 news websites, the AP (9/26, Yee) reported, "Happy that new security rules have cleared their liquids and gels for takeoff, air travelers presented small, clear plastic bags filled with toiletries for inspection Tuesday, but long lines grew at some airports as others confused about the changes filled trash cans with containers that were too large." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said the new rules, announced Monday by the TSA, "'are likely to be with us for the foreseeable future.' Testifying before the House Homeland Security Committee, Chertoff said the new rules would be in place for at least six weeks, but he declined to say whether they would remain as long as six months."

USA Today (9/27, Frank, Copeland, 2.27M) reports "occasional long lines and strict security" left some passengers wondering whether "their toothpaste was worth the trouble." Some "said they were confused by a requirement that the bottles fit in the 1-quart plastic bag. Others stumbled over a policy limiting each traveler to one bag. And a few were frustrated with trying to find the right size of bag. … The new rules caused logjams of more than double the normal wait times at the security checkpoints at Hartsfield-Jackson from 7 to 8:30 a.m., according to Christopher White, TSA spokesman for the Southeastern region." However, "TSA chief Kip Hawley said he felt 'everything went smoothly across the country' on the first day since the ban was relaxed."

The Washington Times (9/27, Lengell, 88K) reports many passengers decided yesterday that "it was more convenient to forgo their new rights." Some "said it was too confusing keeping up with rules, particularly because the Homeland Security Department just announced them Monday." The Times adds, "Passengers weren't the only ones getting used to the new rules. Transportation Security Administration officials at Reagan Airport regularly deferred to clipboards with the updated regulations. And a sign outside an hourly parking garage at the airport still informed passengers that all liquids were banned on board flights, ignoring the updated rules."

The Washington Post (9/27, A12, Wilber, 748K) reports, "Security was relatively smooth at US airports yesterday, as travelers adjusted to new rules allowing them to bring aboard planes small amounts of liquids and gels in their carry-on bags. But it took some flexibility on the part of authorities to make things work." The Post recounts how former ABC "Nightline" host Ted Koppel had to be given a plastic bag by a TSA supervisor at Washington's Reagan National Airport. Likewise, the Los Angeles Times (9/27, Khalil, 918K) reports, "On the first day of the relaxed transportation safety rules, travelers and security personnel at LAX spent much of the morning working through minor kinks and confusion caused by the new guidelines."

NYTimes Fears Carry-On Rules Eased In Reaction To Airline, Business Pressure. Under the headline "A Retreat On Carry-On Liquids," the New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) editorializes "we sure wish we could be confident that the Transportation Security Administration was not simply trying to placate airlines and other businesses concerned about possible loss of revenues. … The head of the TSA said the near total ban was no longer needed because extensive testing by the FBI and others had found that small containers don't pose a real threat and because items bought in the airport's secure area have already been screened on the way in." However, "It would seem relatively easy for a small group of terrorists to combine their liquids after all have passed through security checkpoints, either in the airport's secure area or even aboard the plane." The Times states, "A safer course of action would retain the near total ban on liquids and let the airlines supply passengers with ample beverages."

DOJ_NMG_0069658

WAR NEWS:

Bush Declassifies Portion Of NIE, Calls War Critics "Naïve." President Bush's declassification of certain portions of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq received heavy media coverage last night and this morning, with Bush generally portrayed as taking the initiative and being on the offensive on the issue. The AP (9/26, Shrader) reports Bush said "critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naïve" as he ordered the partial declassification of the analysis, which "has stirred heated election-season argument on the subject." At a joint news conference with visiting Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Bush "rejected any suggestion that the war was a mistake." Bush said, "I think it's naïve. I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe."

All three networks led with the story. ABC World News (9/26, lead story, 2:55, Gibson) said Bush "made public parts of a classified intelligence report that his opponents have been using to attack and discredit the way he's waged the war on terror." ABC (Raddatz) added, "This is the report that was released today. Three pages of a 40-page report. But the three-plus pages are very sobering. The report concludes that 'the global jihadist movement is spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts.' And if the trend continues, it will lead to 'increasing attacks worldwide,' including to US interests."

CBS Evening News (9/26, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Bush has long insisted the war in Iraq is making us safer, so when a classified intelligence review was leaked and suggested the war had created more terrorism, his critics pounced. Fighting back today, a President known for aggressively guarding government secrets decided to take a gamble. He released more of that classified document to try to make his case."

NBC Nightly News (9/26, lead story, 5:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's a report that was never meant to be public but it's out now. First it was leaked to the press and written about, and today the President, saying this is no way to do business, decided to declassify more of it and then release it officially. The intelligence report backs up the President's own position in part. But large portions of it are damaging to the Bush Administration, painting the Iraq war as a giant recruitment poster for would-be terrorists."

In a CBS Evening News (9/26, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) interview, former CIA National Counter-Terrorism Center Director John Brennan said, "Clearly the Islamic extremist elements within Iraq have taken a primary role within the insurgency, and theatre ones that are organizing a lot of attacks taking place against Iraqis, as well as against US forces. In addition, there's just a ready propaganda tool that the Islamic extremists use by showing the footage of the continuation of the struggle inside Iraq."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Blitzer) reported Bush "says he'll declassify key judgments" of the NIE, which "reportedly concludes the Iraq mission has made the terror threat worse. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Quijano) also said Bush "used the formal setting of the White House East Room to launch a full-throated political defense, attacking what he called the politically motivated leaking" of the NIE. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Miller, 918K) reports Bush "took the highly unusual step of releasing key findings" of the NIE "in an attempt to blunt a growing furor in Washington."

The Chicago Tribune (9/27, Silva, 623K) says the President "attempted to blunt criticism that the war in Iraq has emboldened a new generation of terrorists" with the partial release. The Tribune says a "carefully screened summary of the NIE concludes that a holy war in Iraq is 'shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives.' It reports that the conflict has become 'the 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement.'"

The New York Times (9/27, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports the NIE "identified the jihad in Iraq as one of four underlying factors fueling the spread of the Islamic radicalism, along with entrenched grievances, the slow pace of reform and pervasive anti-American sentiment." The NIE "said American-led counterterrorism efforts in the past five years had 'seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations,'" but it also said al Qaeda "continued to pose the greatest threat to American interests among terrorism organizations, and that the global jihadist movement overall was 'spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts.'"

Bush Sees Election-Season Motive Behind Leak Of NIE. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Wallsten, 918K) says Bush "accused unnamed people" of perpetrating the leak "as an act of political sabotage, intended to 'create confusion in the minds of the American people' in advance of the November elections." His comments and declassification decision "were the clearest signs yet that the ongoing debate over the Iraq war and its effect on U.S. security has grown to a fever pitch as the two parties struggle to shape public opinion before election day." Bush said, "Here we are, coming down the stretch of an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspaper. Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A3, Solomon, Lueck, 2.03M) says "leaders from both parties immediately seized on the findings to argue that their position on the Iraq war would better secure the U.S." While President Bush "called those who believe the war has worsened terrorism 'naïve,' and said to withdraw from Iraq could only further embolden militant groups to spread their influence across the Middle East and the Islamic world," Senate Intelligence senior Democrat Jay Rockefeller "countered that, 'The reality is, the war in Iraq has inflamed Islamic extremism…and it has created a training ground for the next generation of terrorists.'" CQ (9/26, Starks) reports Democrats said the NIE offered "evidence that Iraq has been a distracting and dangerous misadventure."

DOJ_NMG_0069659

Under the headline "Bush On Offensive Over Leaked Iraq Report," the Financial Times (9/27, Daniel) says the declassification "marked a White House effort to limit the political fallout from the admission that the Iraq war had fostered terrorism and to show that the findings were just one part of a wider analysis of terrorism trends." And the Washington Times (9/27, Curl, 88K) reports under the headline "Bush Hits 'Political' Leak" that "an angry" Bush said the NIE "had been leaked for 'political purposes' and disputed that the classified report had concluded the Iraq war is spreading Islamic extremism across the world."

NIE Calls Iraq War "Cause Celebre" For Jihadists. The Washington Post (9/27, Fletcher, 748K) reports on its front page that the NIE says the Iraq war "has become a 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and drawing new adherents to the movement." But it also says the "jihadist movement is potentially limited by its ultra-conservative interpretation of Islam and could be slowed by democratic reforms in the Muslim world." Still, the NIE says, terrorists "with experience constructing roadside bombs and other deadly devices in Iraq 'are a potential source' of leadership in attacks elsewhere." USA Today (9/27, 4A, Nichols, Jackson, 2.27M) puts the "cause célèbre" quote in the lead sentence of its report, and the AP (9/26, Shrader, Loven) also carries a story led by the phrase.

NYTimes, WPost Analyses Suggest NIE Shows US Failing To Quash Terrorism. Under the headline "Waging The War On Terror: Report Belies Optimistic View," the New York Times (9/27, Sanger, 1.21M) writes that in 2003, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "wrote a memo to his colleagues in the Pentagon posing a critical question in the 'long war' against terrorism: Is Washington's strategy successfully killing or capturing terrorists faster than new enemies are being created? Until Tuesday, the government had not publicly issued an authoritative answer." But the NIE "does exactly that, and it concludes that the administration has failed the Rumsfeld test."

The Washington Post (9/27, A21, DeYoung, Pincus, 748K) says Bush "said he agreed with the document's conclusion 'that because of our successes against the leadership of al-Qaeda, the enemy is becoming more diffuse and independent.'" But the Post says the NIE "posits no such cause and effect. Instead, while it notes that counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged and disrupted al-Qaeda's leadership, it describes the spreading 'global jihadist movement' as fueled largely by forces that al-Qaeda exploits but is not actively directing. They include Iraq, corrupt and unjust governments in Muslim-majority countries, and 'pervasive anti-U.S. sentiment among most Muslims.'" The Post says the "overall estimate is bleak, with minor notes of optimism."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A18, 2.03M) editorializes, "We're happy to take credit for the suggestion made in our editorial yesterday, 'Declassify the Terrorism NIE.' But of course it was hardly rocket science to come to this decision. … We will hold an election in this country in six weeks and a bigger one in 2008. The war on terror -- with or without Iraq -- will be central to those votes. If declassifying this national intelligence estimate helps voters in that decision, so much the better."

The New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) editorializes, "It's hard to think of a president and an administration more devoted to secrecy than President Bush and his team. Except, that is, when it suits Mr. Bush politically to give the public a glimpse of the secrets. And so, yesterday, he ordered the declassification. … Bush said he wanted to release the document so voters would not be confused about terrorism or the war when they voted for Congressional candidates in November. But the three declassified pages from what is certainly a voluminous report told us what any American with a newspaper, television or Internet connection should already know. The invasion of Iraq was a cataclysmic disaster. The current situation will get worse if American forces leave. Unfortunately, neither the report nor the president provide even a glimmer of a suggestion about how to avoid that inevitable disaster."

In his Washington Post (9/27, A27, 748K) column, David Ignatius writes, "No matter how you slice it," the NIE "is big trouble for President Bush and his party in this election year. It goes to the heart of Bush's argument for invading Iraq, which was that it would make America safer. Many Democrats act as if that's the end of the discussion. … That is understandable, given the partisanship of Republican attacks, but it isn't right. The issue raised" by the NIE "is much grimmer than the domestic political game. Iraq has fostered a new generation of terrorists. The question is what to do about that threat."

Gonzales Says DOJ To Follow "Standard Procedure" On NIE Leak. USA Today (9/26, 4A, 2.27M) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday that the Justice Department will determine whether to investigate the weekend leak of an intelligence assessment that found the war in Iraq is exacerbating terrorism. 'We have a standard procedure in place that is followed with respect to leaks of classified information,' Gonzales said when asked at a news conference whether a criminal investigation would be launched, as it was in the case of an earlier leak of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists by the National Security Agency. 'I suspect that standard procedure will be followed in this case,' he said. That procedure requires the agency that classified the document to request a criminal investigation and then to answer 11 questions about how widely the document was circulated and how much the agency is willing to divulge in court if a case is brought to trial."

DOJ_NMG_0069660

Bush Will Try To Mediate Between Karzai, Musharraf At White House Dinner. ABC World News (9/26, story 3, 2:45, Gibson) reported that Presidents Musharraf and Karzai "are having dinner" tonight "with President Bush. The rift between the Presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan is getting quite bitter. And the presidents are anticipating a spirited evening tomorrow. Presidents Bush and Karzai spoke about it when they met with reporters at the White House today." President Bush: "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are. Yeah. I'm teasing about the body language for the dinner tomorrow night. But it's going to be a good dinner. It's an important dinner."

The Washington Post (9/27, A22, Kessler, Abramowitz, 748K) reports, "Tonight, joined by Vice President Cheney and" Secretary Rice," Bush "will bring both men into the old family dining room of the White House for a private chat." The Post says the "intimate dinner has all the earmarks of a peace conference. Karzai and Musharraf have been sniping at each other from long-distance for months, and Rice was dispatched to Kabul and Islamabad last June to try to ease tensions. The meeting comes as chaos is increasing in southern Afghanistan," while Musharraf "recently signed a deal with tribal chiefs that many experts believe turned over much of the area along Afghanistan's border to the control of Pakistani-based Taliban forces." Administration officials "noted that this is the second meeting Bush has brokered between the two men, and it was an effort to build a common strategy between two countries that have been at odds for decades."

The AP (9/27, Gearan) reports that yesterday, Bush "Bush reassured Afghanistan's leader…that the United States will stick by him five years into a democratic experiment that both men acknowledged has suffered setbacks." Karzai "said the insurgent violence in his country can be tamed, and he called the staggering growth in Afghanistan's illegal drug production an embarrassment. 'You got a tough job,' Bush told his guest at the start of a White House press conference. 'Sometimes it is,' a slightly rueful Karzai agreed."

The Financial Times (9/27, Daniel) says Karzai "expressed scepticism about a key agreement to stop potential insurgents from crossing the Pakistani border, saying he would 'wait and see' how it would be implemented." Of Musharraf's deal with border-area chieftains, Karzai is quoted saying, "My initial impression was that this was a deal signed by the Taliban – and then later I learned that they actually signed with the tribal chiefs. It will have a different meaning if it is signed with the tribal chiefs." The Times says, "in the past few days," both men "have added to tensions," with Musharraf having "suggested the root cause of Afghanistan's problems is its own history," and Karzai having "blamed outsiders."

USA Today (9/27, Jackson, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Bush Guests Are Both Allies -- Of The US, At Least." Bush, says USA Today, "tests his mediation skills today when he brings together a pair of feuding neighbors who are both essential to the US war on terrorism." The White House dinner "is an attempt at trilateral negotiations for Bush."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/27, 918K) says, "Bush's famously personal approach to diplomacy hasn't always worked out -- the last leader into whose eyes he gazed, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, has not turned out to be a reliable ally of the US or of democracy -- and it will be tested tonight. Somewhere between Karzai's and Musharraf's competing versions of the truth, and within the borders of the lands they nominally control, lie the leaders of the Taliban and Al Qaeda -- the original enemies in this war." The Times concludes, "Maybe Bush can trade on his friendships with Karzai and Musharraf to come up with a coordinated plan to fight the Taliban and reduce its havens in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Otherwise, he will have to explain how those countries can continue to harbor terrorists yet not be considered hostile regimes."

US Intel Picked Up Signs Of Sudden Activity In Pakistan's Mountain Regions Two Months Ago. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Starr) reported, "US intelligence sources tell CNN that two months ago there were signs of sudden activity in the remote mountain regions of Pakistan where Osama bin Laden is thought to be hiding. Analysts describe signs of people and movement in an area where the pace of activity is normally predictable. Part of the movement may have been Arab fighters or Taliban trying to avoid the Pakistani military. But according to one official, there was a source in the region who saw someone, possibly bin Laden himself. There have been tips before. But this time it was all enough to persuade the US intelligence community to once again order reconnaissance assets into a particular area of the tribal border region. The high-tech hunt using spy planes and sensors essentially is aimed at putting an electronic fence around an area where bin Laden might be. Spy satellites are used to look for changes in the landscape below. For example, fresh tire tracks on a mountain pass could mean medical aid is being brought to bin Laden."

DOJ_NMG_0069661

Musharraf Sidesteps Question About US Entering Pakistan In Pursue Of Bin Laden. Musharraf was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/26) about President Bush's comment that he would go into Pakistan to get bin Laden if he knew where he was. Musharraf said, "My comments are -- I have been giving my comments that this is a sensitive area. And our decision is that we operate on our side of the border and US forces and allies operate on the other side. Now, having said that, we are hunting Osama and Zawahiri together. We are on the hunt, we are on the lookout for him. When we locate him, we have to take action, we have to take effective action to do away with him." Asked what would be wrong with is the US tried to capture kill bin Laden or al-Zawahiri in Pakistan, Musharraf said, "It is a very sensitive issue. We should not be discussing how and who is to deliver the blow, but whenever we locate him, we have to deal with him. And let's leave it at that and let's not get into the sensitivities of who and how it will be done."

Musharraf Appears On "Daily Show." The Washington Post (9/27, C1, Copeland, 748K) reports Musharraf "appeared on Comedy Central's 'Daily Show' with Jon Stewart, where he demonstrated both a sense of humor and a deep desire to sell 'In the Line of Fire,' which, incidentally, is now available on Amazon.com for the low, low price of $16.80, plus shipping and handling." Stewart "asked Musharraf why he hadn't made much reference in his book to America's war in Iraq. 'Is that because you felt like it was such a smart move, and has gone so well that to mention it would be gloating?' Stewart asked. Musharraf laughed and said of the war, 'It has led certainly to more extremism and terrorism around the world.'"

Suicide Bomber Kills 18 In Afghanistan. CBS Evening News (9/26, story 3, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported that in Afghanistan, "violence is on the rise. A suicide bomber struck outside a governor's compound in the south. The governor was not hurt, but 18 other people were killed, including several who were there to get papers for a pilgrimage to Mecca." NBC Nightly News (9/26, story 3, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the violence.

The AP (9/27, Khaleq) reports "the blast at the doorstep of Helmand Gov. Mohammed Daoud Safi's compound came on the same day a bombing against a NATO patrol in the Kabul area killed an Italian soldier and a child, and two weeks after militants assassinated a governor in eastern Afghanistan who had been a Karzai confidant." The New York Times (9/27, Gall, 1.21M) says the latest violence provides "another sign of the increasing size and power of suicide attacks and roadside bombs by insurgents."

Five People Killed In Baghdad As Violence Continues. CBS Evening News (9/26, story 8, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Bombs went off in several parts of Baghdad today. Five people were killed. The police found 23 bodies of men apparently killed by death squads."

Talabani Says Iraq Won't Descend Into Civil War. The AP (9/27, Schweid) reports, "Iraqi President Jalal Talabani disputed on Tuesday reports of growing violence in his country and declared, 'I can assure you there will be no civil war.'" At a news conference, Talabani also "leveled a warning to Iraq's neighbors that interference will not be tolerated. 'Iraq is not so weak our neighbors can do anything and we will remain silent,' Talabani said after delivering an upbeat speech at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars."

Mixed Shiite-Sunni Neighborhood Is Consumed By Distrust. The Washington Post (9/27, Raghavan, 748K) in a 2,727-word front page article reports, "Across the capital, mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods have become battlegrounds of sectarian hostilities. West of the Tigris River, hundreds of Shiite families have fled mostly Sunni neighborhoods such as Amiriyah and Ghazaliya. In the east, hundreds of Sunni families have fled mostly Shiite areas such as Amin and Shaab. Increasingly, the strife is spreading into central Baghdad. In still-mixed neighborhoods such as Tobji, nestled in north-central Baghdad, political and militant Islam is clashing with tribal customs and a shared Arab and Muslim identity that have bonded Sunnis and Shiites for decades." The Post describes the fighting and killings that occur in the Tobji neighborhood of Baghdad over a 10-day span.

Poll Finds Most Iraqis Want Immediate US Withdrawal. The Washington Post (9/27, Paley, 748K) reports, "A strong majority of Iraqis want U.S.-led military forces to immediately withdraw from the country, saying their swift departure would make Iraq more secure and decrease sectarian violence, according to new polls by the State Department and independent researchers. In Baghdad, for example, nearly three-quarters of residents polled said they would feel safer if U.S. and other foreign forces left Iraq, with 65 percent of those asked favoring an immediate pullout." The University of Maryland Program on International Policy Attitudes will announce on Wednesday "that 71 percent of Iraqis questioned want the Iraqi government to ask foreign forces to depart within a year. By large margins, though, Iraqis believed that the U.S. government would refuse the request, with 77 percent of those polled saying the United States intends to keep permanent military bases in the country." The "stark" poll results, "among the most negative attitudes toward U.S.-led forces since they invaded Iraq in 2003, contrast sharply with views expressed by the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki."

DOJ_NMG_0069662

Saddam Removed From Courtroom. McClatchy (9/27, Brunswick) reports, "For the second time in as many days in his genocide and war crimes trial, former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was ordered tossed from the courtroom on Tuesday, sparking an eruption from the other defendants and briefly shutting down the court. … Two other defendants were led out of the courtroom after Saddam, who barely concealed a smile on his face as he made his way to the door."

The New York Times (9/27, Oppel, Mizher, 1.21M) reports that "after throwing Saddam Hussein out of court again, the judge hearing the deposed dictator's genocide trial abruptly postponed the case until Oct. 9, so Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants could consult with lawyers who are boycotting the trial or find new ones."

Oil-For-Food Inquiry Finds Australian Wheat Exporter Was Warned. The AP (9/27) reports Australian wheat exporter AWB Ltd. was "repeatedly warned" by lawyers that funneling money to Saddam Hussein's regime "could be illegal and breach U.N. sanctions on Iraq," according to evidence released by a government-commissioned inquiry Tuesday. The documents "contradicted" testimony by company executives that the monopoly exporter, formerly the government-owned Australian Wheat Board, "did not knowingly pay $222 million in bribes to the Iraq government under the corruption-riddled U.N. oil-for-food program." The documents are among 900 that AWB fought to withhold from the inquiry, but were ordered to be turned over last week by Australia's Federal Court.

West Point Buries First Female Graduate To Die In Iraq. The Washington Post (9/27, Partlow, Parker, 748K) reports in a front page article on the funeral at West Point of Emily Perez, "the first female graduate…to die in Iraq. Perez, a platoon leader, was killed while patrolling southern Iraq near Najaf on Sept. 12 when a roadside bomb exploded under her Humvee." Perez was mentioned in a Sunday New York Times piece on the increasing number of women killed in combat. The article quotes people who knew her and chronicles the funeral.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Prison. CBS Evening News (9/26, story 5, 0:15, Couric) reported, "It will be six years in prison for Andrew Fastow for masterminding the financial fraud at Enron. The former CFO could have faced ten years but the judge opted for leniency. Thousands of employees lost their jobs and pensions and many stockholders lost their life savings when Enron collapsed in 2001."

The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Hart) reports that due to Fastow's cooperation with the investigation, US District Judge Kenneth Hoyt stopped short of sentencing him to the maximum term. In 2004, Fastow "had agreed to serve as long as 10 years in exchange for testifying against the former top executives of the fallen energy company." The Times adds, "Hoyt imposed no fine in meting out his sentence to Fastow, noting that under terms of the plea agreement he had already forfeited $23.8 million and pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy. Hoyt sentenced Fastow to two years of supervised release upon completing his prison term. The judge recommended a minimum-security prison for Fastow, as well as drug treatment for the anti-anxiety medication he has been taking."

The Washington Post (9/27, D1, Johnson) reports that Hoyt said that Fastow "had been 'the subject of great persecution,' including threats and religious slurs, as the primary scapegoat for an accounting fraud that cost thousands of employees of the Houston energy company their jobs and retirement savings."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Emshwiller, Biers) reports, "Some found the reduced sentence for Mr. Fastow troubling. 'I was very surprised,' said Leslie Caldwell, the original director of the special Justice Department task force that investigated the Enron scandal. Ms. Caldwell, who is currently a partner with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius in New York, said the 10-year sentence included in the 2004 plea deal contemplated that he would provide full cooperation."

USA Today (9/27, Krantz) reports, "Fastow, 44, who also is barred from serving as an officer or director of a public company, could shave a year from his prison term by joining a drug-treatment program. The judge recommended Fastow to serve at the federal prison in Bastrop, Texas, followed by a two-year probation."

The New York Times (9/27, Murphy) reports, "Although Mr. Fastow's lawyers and government prosecutors asked that he be allowed to surrender voluntarily after the Yom Kippur holiday on Monday, Judge Hoyt refused. Mr. Fastow was allowed to briefly embrace his wife before U.S. Marshals escorted him from the courtroom in handcuffs. … 'We're very disappointed he was remanded into custody,' said Chris Patti, counsel for the University of California, which is a plaintiff in pending shareholder litigation. 'I'm not sure what this will mean for us.' … Mr. Patti and other lawyers involved in Enron civil cases had asked the judge at today's hearing to allow Mr. Fastow to remain free until at least October 23, the date they hoped to conclude his deposition. October 23 is also the date Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey Skilling, will be sentenced." The Times adds, "Another lawyer representing shareholders, Lawrence Irving, testified that Mr. Fastow was 'critical' to their case. Referring to Mr. Fastow's testimony in the trials against his former bosses Mr. Skilling and Kenneth Lay, Mr. Irving said, 'I have never seen a more impressive witness.' Mr. Lay died of a heart attack in July before serving any jail time. … United States Attorney John Hueston testified that the cases against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay were weak until Mr. Fastow agreed to help the Justice Department's Enron Task Force: 'He allowed the U.S. government to bring jurors inside the executive suite.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069663

The AP (9/27, Lozano) reports, "Fastow was originally indicted on 98 counts, including fraud, insider trading and money laundering. He pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy, admitting to running various schemes to hide Enron debt and inflate profits while enriching himself. He also surrendered nearly $30 million in cash and property. … At their trial, Fastow testified Lay and Skilling were aware of fraudulent financial structures engineered by Fastow and his staff."

Fastow Accuses Investment Banks Of Aiding Enron Fraud. Fastow has accused 10 investment banks of helping Enron falsify its books in exchange for large advisory fees. The Financial Times (9/27, White, McNulty) reports, "The accusations came in a 24-page legal declaration filed by Mr Fastow in support of a class action lawsuit against the banks brought on behalf of Enron's shareholders." Fastow's declaration "could put new pressure on banks that have not yet settled in the class-action case. … Mr Fastow singled out Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse, RBS and Barclays as especially involved with creating what he described as deceptive structures."

The Texas Lawyer (9/27, Jeffreys) reports, "Tuesday, lawyers in the shareholder securities suit, In Re: Enron Corp. Securities Litigation filed a declaration from Fastow in connection with the civil litigation. In that declaration, Fastow alleges that some of the banks that did business with Enron when he was CFO 'understood that some of the transactions were done primarily for generating certain accounting benefits and financial-reporting objections for Enron, including higher funds flow from operations, lower debt and increased [current period] income.' … G. Paul Howes, a lawyer for the lead plaintiff in the securities litigation, told Hoyt during the hearing that Fastow has agreed to testify during the upcoming trial in the securities litigation and will provide crucial testimony to tie banks to the downfall of Enron."

Local Television. U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt Judge decision to sentence former Enron CFO Andrew Fastow to six years in prison received reasonable coverage by Texas local newscasts. All newscasts agreed that Fastow's help in the prosecution of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling helped him receive a lenient sentence. Some examples: KHOU-TV Houston, (9/26, 10:05 p.m.) reported. "Despite what it seemed, sentencing day turned out to be a pretty good day for Andrew Fastow. He came to court facing ten years, but found Judge Kenneth Hoyt to be lenient, giving Fastow only six years in prison. Plus if he enters a drug treatment program for anxiety medication he takes, Fastow could get a year shaved off that."

WFAA-TV Dallas, (9/26, 12:14 p.m.) reported. "Judge has granted leniency for former Enron CFO Andrew Fastow. He was expecting a 10-year sentence. The sentence is reduced now and it will be six years, not ten."

WOAI-TV San Antonio, (9/26, 06:11 p.m.) reported, "Lawyers for the 44- year-old pushed for the lesser sentence after he testified in the trials of Enron founder Kenneth lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling."

KHWB-TV Houston, (9/26, 9:04 p.m.) reported. "Today U.S. District Judge Ken Hoyt granted his attorney's request for leniency citing his cooperation in the investigation. Hoyt says Fastow's family has suffered enough, and that Fastow has been persecuted as the scapegoat in the Enron collapse."

KXAN-TV Austin, (9/26, 10:00 p.m.) reported. "Fastow will also face 2-years of court supervision when he is released."

KPRC-TV Houston, (9/26, 06:02 p.m.) reported. "Andrew Fastow's leverage in pending Enron cases spared him four long years behind bars."

KPRC-TV Houston, (9/26, 04:01 p.m.) reported. "One person who was happy to see a lighter sentence for Fastow was whistle blower Sherron Watkins. She helped shed light on the problems. She went to Fastow during her time and says that the work he has done since the plea deal earned a lighter sentence."

Ebbers Reports To Prison. Former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers reported yesterday to a medium security federal prison in Louisiana to begin serving a 25 year sentence, USA Today (9/27) reports. Ebbers was "convicted in 2005 for his role in the company's $11 billion accounting fraud, the biggest in corporate history."

The Washington Post (9/27, D1, Masters, Joyce) reports, "Ebbers will spend at least the next 21 years in prison. The federal system does not have parole, but inmates can receive up to 15 percent off their sentences for good behavior. Ebbers is appealing his conviction and sentence to the Supreme Court."

Attorneys To Discuss Scrushy Request For A New Trial. US District Court Judge Mark Fuller has ordered prosecutors and defense attorneys to a non conference call today to discuss former HealthSouth Chief Executive Richard Scrushy's request for a new trial on political corruption charges. The Wall Street Journal (9/27) reports, "Attorneys for Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman say their June convictions should be thrown out because some jury members may have communicated with one another via email outside the courtroom before and during deliberations. Defense attorneys also say the jurors improperly viewed articles and information on the Internet during deliberations."

DOJ_NMG_0069664

Jenkins Says H-P Scandal Is "Devoid Of Larger Meaning." Holman Jenkins Jr. writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/27) that the Hewlett-Packard saga "is devoid of larger meaning, but the snafu now has its own consequences, hence the unusual suspense, and unusual stakes, of tomorrow's spectacle before a House committee concerned with data privacy. The questions only begin with which executives will invoke the Fifth (likely only those directly involved in the record filching). Will [board chair Patricia] Dunn take full responsibility for driving the investigation or seek to share it with CEO Mark Hurd? … Another element of suspense is Congress. Will it confine itself to what the H-P saga has to say about 'pretexting' -- the scamming of phone companies and others into allowing unauthorized access to records? This subject was on the committee's radar screen already. Or will H-P become an excuse to become even more prescriptive on corporate governance along the lines of the poorly considered Sarbanes-Oxley law in the wake of Enron?"

Pegoraro Says Consumer Punishment Of H-P Won't Deter Other Corporate Criminals. Rob Pegoraro writes in the Washington Post (9/27, D1) that "HP awaits your judgment the next time you walk into any computer or electronics store. What do you do? … Do you give HP your business or not? Does its vile conduct outweigh the finer points of its products?" Pegoraro adds, "The brain trust at HP let its megalomania outweigh any other considerations, like common decency or simply the desire not to look like felons when the whole sorry operation inevitably came to light. If this doesn't affect HP's bottom line, how much lower does a company have to sink before its customers rebel? … Go ahead, make HP your punching bag the next time you shop for a printer or a computer. Just don't overestimate the deterrent effect that might have on the rest of corporate America."

Options Probes Hit Investors In Bottom Line. Bloomberg (9/27, Green) reports, "The scandal over backdating stock options, used by companies to reward top executives with shares granted at below-market prices, has so far cost investors at least $7.9 billion in market value." Bloomberg continues, "More than two-thirds of 117 companies that announced investigations into their options grants by Aug. 31 fell in the stock market the next day, data compiled by Bloomberg show. The declines sliced an average 2.6 percent from their market value, 2.5 percentage points more than the average return on the same day for Standard & Poor's and Bloomberg indexes of similar companies." Bloomberg adds, "The losses add grist to 220 investor lawsuits against 70 companies, including Apple Computer Inc. and Home Depot Inc., which demand restitution and damages. The inquiry into backdating and fortuitous timing of option grants rivals the probe three years ago into improper mutual-fund trading, which led to $4.3 billion in penalties. … Companies grant options to give executives an incentive to boost the stock price. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department are looking at whether the companies backdated grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low, giving recipients a built-in profit, and cases where they may have failed to properly account for awards."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Plame Probe Has Cost $1.4 Million So Far. The New York Times/AP (9/27, Press) reports, "Prosecutors said Tuesday that they had spent $1.44 million investigating the leak of a Central Intelligence Agency officer's identity in 2003. Because the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and other lawyers in the case were already on the government payroll, most of the costs were covered as a 'paper transfer' from one government account to another, Mr. Fitzgerald's office said." The AP adds, "The only additional cost to taxpayers was $333,000, mostly for travel and contractual services like research and court recorders. Investigators did not rent office space here, eliminating an expense that drove up costs for other investigations of top officials."

The Washington Post (9/28, A12, Leonnig, 748K) headlines its story "CIA Leak Probe Relatively Inexpensive," saying the $1.4 million figure "establishes him as remarkably frugal in the ranks of recent special investigators." Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr's "investigations of President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky and his ties to the failed Whitewater land investment cost $71.5 million and took eight years. Independent Counsel David M. Barrett's examination of Clinton housing secretary Henry G. Cisneros over an extramarital affair and potential illegal payments cost $21 million and lasted 10 years."

Judge To Consider "Crucial Issue" For Libby Trial. The AP (9/27, Apuzzo) reports, "A closed-door hearing beginning Wednesday will deal with a crucial issue in the trial of a former White House aide: whether President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other sensitive documents should be disclosed in the CIA leak case." The hearing, "which could last several days, will help establish what classified information is relevant to the case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby." Libby "wants to use the daily intelligence briefings and terrorism threat assessments as evidence to show he had important things on his mind and honestly didn't remember details about his conversations with reporters." Prosecutors "have said Libby is trying to sabotage the case by requesting so much classified information that the government will be forced to withhold it and let the case be dismissed. It's a legal tactic known as 'graymail.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069665

Gotti Jurors Tell Judge They Are Deadlocked. The New York Times (9/27, Williams) reports, "The federal jury in the racketeering conspiracy trial of John A. Gotti sent a note to the judge this afternoon saying they were deadlocked and unable to reach a unanimous verdict." The Times continues, "Judge Shira A. Scheindlin read the panel the Allen charge, an instruction meant to encourage juries to continue working until they reach a verdict, and sent them back to continue deliberating. … It is unclear how long the jurors — seven women and five men — will continue to deliberate, but Judge Scheindlin told them if they felt they were close to reaching a verdict by later this afternoon that the court would pay for dinner and give them rides home." The Times adds, "If the jury is unable to reach a verdict, it would be the third mistrial on the racketeering charges in the past year for Mr. Gotti. This is the sixth day of this jury's deliberations. In Mr. Gotti's first trial, the jury deliberated for eight days. In the second, the deliberations lasted one and a half days. … The jurors did say that of the four counts Mr. Gotti is facing, they had been able to reach a decision on only part of one of the racketeering conspiracy charges: the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio talk show host. … The jury's note did not say what decision it had reached on that count."

The AP (9/27, Neumeister) reports, "From the start, the jury has sought evidence aimed at deciding whether Gotti quit the Gambino crime family before July 1991, as he claims. If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004. … The jury was in its sixth day of deliberations. It had asked for some evidence to be read back as it deliberated over the last week, but the panel has not been particularly noisy in a courthouse where jurors can sometimes be heard shouting at one another." The AP adds that Judge Scheindlin "encouraged the jurors to give it another try, saying the case would likely have to be tried again and it was unlikely that another jury would be better able to judge the evidence. Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials."

Local Television. Only a few local newscasts reported that the jury in the third racketeering trial of John Gotti is unable to agree on a verdict. WSMH-TV Flint, (9/26, 10:24 p.m.) reported, "The jury in the third racketeering trial of John 'junior' Gotti is deadlocked just like the two prior trials. A New York federal judge is telling jurors to keep trying."

WLUK-TV Green Bay, (9/26, 05:36 p.m.) reported, "The jury in John Gotti's latest trial is deadlocked – just like the first two juries. The judge in the case told jurors to keep trying. Gotti has already had two mistrials because of hung juries. If convicted, he faces 30 years in prison on racketeering charges."

WANE-TV Ft. Wayne, (9/26, 11:13 p.m.) reported, "Six days of deliberations and jurors are deadlocked in the third racketeering trial of John 'junior' Gotti. The federal judge trying the case is urging jurors to keep trying. She says if they can't come to a decision there will probably be another trial."

WABC-TV New York, (9/26, 05:04 p.m.) reported, "Another day of deliberations for a jury deciding the fate of John Jr. Gotti. This is Gotti's third trial on racketeering charges in the last year. … The jury must decide if Gotti quit the Gambino crime family as he claimed, if so a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before the charges were filed."

Senate To Cooperate With DOJ On Probe Of Former FDA Head. Roll Call (9/27, Bresnahan) reports the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee "has agreed to turn over documents and allow three staffers to provide testimony to the Justice Department as part of the federal investigation into Lester Crawford, the former head of the Food and Drug Administration." The US Attorney's office "in the District of Columbia is conducting a probe into Crawford's statements about his financial holdings during confirmation hearings before the panel in 2005."

Former Westinghouse Electric Nuclear Engineer Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges. Under the headline, "Nuclear Engineer Guilty Of Conspiracy, Tax Evasion," the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/26, Ward, 241K) reported, "A nuclear engineer who formerly worked for Westinghouse Electric Corp. pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to conspiracy and tax evasion. Initially, Mark M. Kaushansky, 55, of Monroeville, was charged with helping Russia's former atomic energy minister steal more than $9 million in aid money from the US Department of Energy. But the plea before Senior US District Judge Maurice B. Cohill included just nine of the original 20 counts against him, and they all related to tax evasion." The Post-Gazette added that according to the US attorney's office, Mr. Kaushansky and Dr. Adamov began working together" and "incorporated two businesses, one in Pennsylvania and another in Delaware, and used two shell investment companies, with accounts in the United States, France and Monaco, to divert some of the money earmarked for NIKIET, a Russian nuclear research institute headed by Dr. Adamov."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/26, Cato) reported that Kaushansky "will try to prove during a four-day hearing in February that he owes significantly less than the $5 million prosecutors say he owes. That could earn him significantly less time in prison than the approximately five years he faces if the government is right. In pleading guilty to nine counts of conspiracy and tax evasion, Kaushansky avoided more serious offenses of money laundering and interstate transportation of stolen property. He maintains his long-standing argument that he was not involved in an international scheme to rip off the United States with Adamov." Prosecutors say "Kaushansky and Adamov routed $15 million provided by the United States and other countries to bank accounts in Pittsburgh, Delaware and Monaco between 1993 and 2003."

DOJ_NMG_0069666

The AP (9/26, Nephin) reported, "US Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said in a statement that the indictment alleges Adamov was primarily responsible for diverting the money, but that Kaushansky 'was most directly involved with the concealment and expenditure of those funds.' US prosecutors wanted to try Adamov here, but Russian officials said he should face trial in his home country. He has denied the charges against him and awaits trial in Russia."

Stevens Reveals FBI Made Second Search Of Alaska Office. The Anchorage Daily News (9/26, Mauer, Demer) reported, "FBI agents returned last week to the legislative office of Senate President Ben Stevens and seized more evidence, including a copy of a sworn statement that implicated Stevens in an alleged payment scheme involving fisheries legislation brought by his father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. Word of the second search, and what was taken by the FBI, came from Ben Stevens himself, who disclosed the information in a letter to the Daily News dated Sept. 22. In his letter, Stevens denied a request by the newspaper for a copy of any FBI search warrants which may have been served on him or his office," but he did provide "what he said was a 'complete listing of what was obtained from my legislative offices.'" The Daily News noted, "Though much has been made of the FBI's apparent interest in the relationship between legislators and the politically active oil field service and construction company Veco…Stevens listed only a single Veco document taken by the FBI: an undated memo to Veco president Pete Leathard."

Judge Sentences Ailing Gambino Capo To 12 Years In Prison. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/27, Neumeister) reports, "An ailing 74-year-old Gambino crime family captain who once recommended an undercover FBI agent for mob membership asked a judge for leniency Tuesday but received more than 12 years in prison instead. 'Give me one more shot,' Gregory DePalma…asked U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein," but the judge replied, "If you were in my shoes, I don't think you would." Hellerstein, "calling DePalma 'a man thoroughly immersed in criminal activity,' said he could not be lenient because leniency toward DePalma in the past had not led him to avoid crime when he was out of prison." The New York Daily News (9/27, Zambito, 729K) notes, "In addition to the prison time, Hellerstein ordered DePalma to pay some $70,000 in restitution to two extortion victims. 'How much?' DePalma asked. 'Can I give them my Social Security check?' DePalma's motor-mouth was intercepted by a bug the FBI placed in his cell phone with the help of undercover agent Joaquin Garcia, who so deeply infiltrated the mob that DePalma was ready to sponsor his Mafia induction."

Lawmakers Seek Data Retention By Web Hosts. CNET News (9/27, Broache) reports, "Politicians on Tuesday urged domain name registries and Web hosting companies to do more to keep illicit child pornography off the Internet and indicated mandatory retention of user records is an option under consideration." CNET continues, "At a hearing here convened by a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee on oversight and investigations, Michigan Rep. Bart Stupak, the panel's top-ranking Democrat, asked company representatives how they would feel about being subject to a law in the works that would require Internet service providers to retain customer records for one year. … 'If we do compel data retention, is there any reason Web hosting sites should be treated differently than ISPs?' Stupak asked the general counsel for GoDaddy.com, which bills itself as the largest domain name registrar in the world, and the CEO of Blue Gravity Communications, a New Jersey-based Web hosting firm. Both executives were participants on a panel at the latest in a series of hearings on the topic of online child exploitation. … 'A year might be a little long,' replied Thomas Krwawecz, Blue Gravity's CEO, later adding: 'It would be something we would definitely be open to if there were some guidelines for maintaining that data for a specific period of time.'" CNET adds, "Christine Jones, general counsel for GoDaddy, said requirements to maintain particular customer data for hosting companies and ISPs alike would be 'productive' for law enforcement. But the data, she added, should be limited to identifying information about subscribers, such as IP addresses and credit card numbers, and should not include the content of their communications. … Privacy and industry groups have generally voiced opposition to calls for mandatory data retention, which have become a fixture on the congressional agenda ever since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the practice's necessity earlier this year."

Police Seize Electronics From Home Where DC Attorney Was Killed. The Legal Times (9/27, Schwartz) reports, "Police have seized computers and other electronics from the Dupont Circle home in Northwest

DOJ_NMG_0069667

Washington where lawyer Robert Wone was stabbed to death Aug. 2, according to an affidavit in a search warrant for the house that was recently made public." The Times continues, "The evidence, which included two laptops, a desktop computer, diskettes and USB drives, was among the material police confiscated during their monthlong search of the home at 1509 Swann St. N.W." The Times adds, "Wone, 32, who was the general counsel for Radio Free Asia, was found shortly before midnight "showing no signs of life" in the second-floor bedroom of the house, owned by his college friend Joseph Price, a partner at Arent Fox, according to the Aug. 4 affidavit by Detective William Xanten III. Price's partner, Victor Zaborsky, a marketing manager at the International Dairy Foods Association, co-owns the house. A third man, Dylan Ward, also lived there. All three were home the night of the murder."

SCOTUS To Consider Appeal In Arizona Death Penalty Case. The AP (9/27) reports, "The Supreme Court accepted an appeal Tuesday from Arizona, which wants to execute a twice-convicted killer who says his lawyer didn't do enough to ward off a death sentence." The AP continues, "Justices said they would review a decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said a lower court should consider Jeffrey Landrigan's claims that his lawyer was ineffective." The AP adds, "Landrigan escaped from an Oklahoma prison in 1989, where he was serving a 20-year term for murdering an acquaintance. A month later, he killed Chester Dyer, who picked up men on the Phoenix streets by flashing large sums of money. … As Landrigan and the man were drinking beer in the victim's Phoenix apartment, Landrigan strangled Dyer with an electrical cord and repeatedly punctured him with a screwdriver. He was convicted of killing Dyer and sentenced to death. .. Dale Baich, who represents Landrigan in his appeals, said his client might have won a life term instead of a death sentence if his trial lawyer had submitted evidence that he was predisposed to violence and suffered brain damage that made him unable to appreciate his crimes. … The Arizona Supreme Court, a federal district judge and a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit all rejected Landrigan's claims before the full appellate decided otherwise in March."

Biker Brawlers Go On Trial In Law Vegas. The AP (9/27, Ritter) reports, "Videotape images show rival motorcycle gang members wielding guns, knives, wrenches and chairs in a brawl that killed three and injured at least a dozen in a southern Nevada casino in 2002." The AP continues, "The footage is among hundreds of hours of videotape jurors may view during the trial of 11 Hells Angels charged in the deadly casino brawl." The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors are expected on Tuesday to tell jurors that the bikers plotted to attack the rival Mongols gang at the Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino after years of friction erupted into violence at a crowded motorcycle rally. … They are the first of 42 men - from California, Washington, Arizona, Alaska and Nevada, and ranging in age from 28 to 63 - to stand trial in the brawl. All face the possibility of life in prison if convicted of the most serious charge, racketeering-attempted murder." The AP notes, "Each has pleaded not guilty, and defense lawyers say the men will argue they were attacked first. … 'The tapes are going to reveal clearly that the Hells Angels were threatened and were engaged in lawful self-defense,' said lawyer David Chesnoff, who represents defendant Calvin Schaefer of Chandler, Ariz. … Chesnoff has argued previously that police knew trouble was brewing and federal agents missed a chance to prevent violence at the 2002 Laughlin rally, an annual event that draws tens of thousands of motorcycle enthusiasts to the Colorado River resort town about 100 miles southeast of Las Vegas."

Many Business Web Sites Vulnerable To Cyber Crime. The New York Times (9/27, Strom, 1.21M) reports, "When Ralph Nader wrote 'Unsafe at Any Speed' in 1965, he exposed how certain design decisions had made some automobiles inherently unsafe. Much the same can be said for Web sites these days. Many sites contain inherent design flaws that leave them ripe for exploitation. Unlike lack of seat belts in cars, these flaws are not immediately obvious and the fixes are not simple. … 'A business owner has risks even if they aren't doing e-commerce and if they just have a Web site,' said Shena Crowe, an agent in the F.B.I.'s San Francisco field office who has helped prosecute cybercriminals who used Google hacks and other techniques. 'Once you are plugged into the Web, your backyard can become open, and it is easy to have your information taken from you.'"

Analyst Finds Few Cases Of ID Theft Despite Surge In Data Losses. The New York Times (9/27, Lohr, 1.21M) reports, "In the last 12 months alone, the personal records of nearly 73 million people, from Social Security numbers to credit-card accounts, have been lost or stolen, in reported incidents compiled by ID Analytics, a San Diego company that provides fraud-detection services to banks, cellphone operators and other companies. … But while high-profile data breaches are common, there is no evidence of a surge in identity theft or financial fraud as a result. In fact, there is scant evidence that identity theft and financial fraud have increased at all. … 'The threat of identity theft from data losses is being greatly exaggerated,' said Fred H. Cate, the director of the Center for Applied Cybersecurity Research at Indiana University in Bloomington. 'And that's because a lot of people have fallen into the trap of equating data loss with identity theft.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069668

US Seeks Death Penalty For Two In DC Drug Conspiracy. The Washington Times (9/27, Mcelhatton) reports, "Federal prosecutors have filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty against two D.C. men charged with running a violent drug gang in Southeast." The Times continues, "The men, Antwuan Ball and David Wilson, reportedly led the Congress Park Crew, which authorities say dealt hundreds of kilograms of crack cocaine in Southeast for more than a decade. The gang resorted to homicide, assault and armed robbery, authorities said." The Times adds, "The move to seek the death penalty marks the second time in a year that the U.S. Department of Justice has declared it will seek capital punishment in the District. … In the other case, Larry Gooch, described as an enforcer in the M Street Crew in Northeast, has been charged in five killings and is expected to go to trial in January. … Only two capital murder cases have gone to trial in the District since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976. The District has no statute for the death penalty, but capital punishment can be pursued in federal cases if authorized by the U.S. attorney general. … However, there are questions about whether the move to seek the death penalty against Ball and Wilson came too late. … Last week, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts issued a ruling barring the death penalty in the case." The Times notes, "Judge Roberts wrote that the Justice Department did not comply with his order setting a Sept. 15 deadline for a decision on whether to seek capital punishment. On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office filed the notice to seek the death penalty and asked Judge Roberts to reconsider. … 'The process took as long as it did not because the government was insensitive to the speedy trial rights of the defendants, but because we were giving additional and extra careful consideration to defendants' interests,' Assistant U.S. Attorneys Glenn S. Leon and Ann H. Petalas told Judge Roberts in a memo."

Gambling Companies Warned Not To Accept Bets In Louisiana. The Financial Times (9/27, Ward, Blitz) reports, "Louisiana police have warned all online gambling companies to stop accepting bets in the state or risk having their executives and directors arrested if they visit the US. The police official responsible for the arrest of Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet, on a Louisiana warrant in New York three weeks ago, said the state was pressing ahead with its clampdown, in spite of what appears to be a rethink about the case in other political jurisdictions." The Times adds, "It is understood Louisiana has sealed warrants against more than 50 people working or connected to at least a dozen online gambling or related companies. … Louisiana is one of several US states that has its own laws prohibiting internet gambling."

Conspiracy Trial Begins For Two Alleged MS-13 Members. The Baltimore Sun (9/27, Dolan) reports that the racketeering conspiracy trial of two alleged members of La Mara Salvatrucha, a violent street gang known as MS-13, began Tuesday with allegations that the two men, Edgar Alberto Ayala, known as "Pony," and Oscar Ramos Velasquez, known as "Casper" "participated in a well-oiled criminal organization responsible for at least six homicides and five attempted killings." The Sun adds, "Formed in California by Salvadoran immigrants who have spread eastward, MS-13 'is without any doubt a criminal enterprise,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson told jurors Tuesday. 'The objective of this gang is to kill people.' Dubbed one of the nation's most violent and fastest-growing gangs, MS-13 has a relatively low profile outside of the Washington suburbs. But experts say its strength is growing throughout Maryland as the overall Hispanic population expands its reach beyond Prince George's and Montgomery counties."

The Washington Post (9/27, B7, Castaneda) reports that MS-13 "has rules that include a standing edict to kill rival gang members, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson said in her opening statement in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. … Prosecutors said in court papers that the gang has 10,000 members in 10 states and the District, as well as in El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico. Wilkinson said MS-13 has many cliques, which she compared to business franchises. … MS-13 gang members have conspired to commit murder, rape, kidnapping and robbery and to obstruct justice by attacking or intimidating witnesses, federal prosecutors allege in their original indictment and two superseding indictments."

Murders Of Three Teens Raises Alarms Across DC. The Washington Post (9/27, B1, Klein, Weil) reports that the murders of three teenagers in a 24 hour period in DC has raised "alarm across the city. DC police said none of the three cases appears to be related, but all three are homicides. That raises to 15 the number of slayings of victims in the city this year who were younger than 18. In all of last year there were 12. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said last night that a man, about 50, had been taken into custody in the death of the 15-year-old, Dominick A. Dixon. Ramsey said the man had made a statement about the killing to police. No arrests have been reported in the other two killings. Police said last night that Dixon's death was a homicide. But they did not say how he was slain, and autopsy results had not been released."

Thieves Killed Cutting Into Power Lines For Copper. USA Today (9/27, Koch) reports, "At least seven men in five states have been fatally electrocuted since July while hacking through power lines to steal wire made of copper, which has been commanding near-record prices, police say. … Nationwide, police report copper thieves stealing wires from air conditioning units, exposed pipes from underneath homes, vases from graveyards in Sumter, S.C., and bells from a church in Yonkers, N.Y." USA adds, "Police have reported three deaths since July in Fort Worth, Pineville, W.Va., and Aurora, Colo. There are no national figures, but the number of copper thefts and related deaths is 'probably at the highest level it's ever been,' says Kenneth Geremia, spokesman for the Copper Development Association, a trade group. He says copper is completely recyclable and can sell for $3 a pound at scrap yards."

DOJ_NMG_0069669

Philadelphia Man Charged With Defrauding Victim-Assistance Program. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/27, Shiffman, 399K) reports, "A Philadelphia man was charged yesterday with staging fake armed robberies in scams that netted $385,000 from the state's victim-assistance program." David Toomer "is accused of staging robberies from 2000 to 2002, then enlisting the help of a former accomplice, an unnamed chiropractor, to help him stage fake accidents this year." The Inquirer notes, "Toomer was arrested by the FBI on April 28 in the parking lot of the Holiday Inn on Packer Avenue as he allegedly conspired with an unnamed chiropractor to stage a fake accident. By then, the chiropractor had begun cooperating with authorities, according to an affidavit by FBI Agent Therese Nestor, and had been audiotaped and videotaped discussing the scam." The Philadelphia Daily Mail (9/27, Hinkelman) adds, "Toomer, who used at least two aliases during the alleged scheme, was charged with mail fraud and health-care fraud. His attorney said yesterday that Toomer plans to plead guilty. … Authorities said the investigation is continuing. Toomer is out on bail."

Seven In Three States Indicted On Katrina Aid Fraud Charges. The Detroit News (9/27, Egan) reports, "Five Detroit-area women, an Indiana man and a Mississippi woman fraudulently obtained nearly $30,000 in relief money intended for Hurricane Katrina victims and used the cash to buy cars, narcotics and other items, the federal government alleged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday. … None was directly affected by the…storm," but "each obtained between $2,000 and $12,750 in Federal Emergency Management Agency aid, mainly by falsely claiming they lived in New Orleans when the storm hit, according to complaints filed in U.S. District Court." Defendants Pamela Reason and Curtisine Ingram "told investigators they used some of the Katrina money to buy narcotics," and "other items allegedly purchased with the $28,182 include two cars, clothing, eyeglasses and food." The AP (9/27) also reports on the indictments.

Paper Executive Sentenced To 15 Years In Prison For $300-Million Fraud. Newsday (9/26, Kessler) reported, "The former head of a Hauppauge-based national paper manufacturing conglomerate was sentenced" Monday "to 15 years in prison for a $300-million fraud involving his firm, American Tissue, which was once the nation's fourth-largest producer of paper towels, tissues and toilet paper." Iranian immigrant "Mehdi Gabayzadeh, 62, of Great Neck also was ordered to make restitution of $65 million and serve five years' supervised release by U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert in Central Islip." Newsday notes that "a drop in paper prices resulted in sharp financial losses that Gabayzadeh attempted to cover up by lying to lenders, and then to creditors after the company was forced into bankruptcy." The Manchester Union-Leader (9/26, Colquhoun) reports that in addition to prison, Gabayzadeh "must make $65 million in restitution and will be on probation for five years after he serves his prison term. … 'It's not enough time, but we have to put it behind us and move on,' said Gorham [NH] Town Manager Bill Jackson. 'It was more than I expected him to get, but it wasn't enough,' said Berlin [NH] Mayor Bob Danderson. … 'He exemplifies the worst of American greed.'"

The AP (9/27, Eltman) reports, "In seeking a stiff sentence, prosecutors had compared Mehdi Gabayzadeh's misdeeds to those of better-known white-collar corporate criminals, including Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John Rigas and former WorldCom Corp. chief Bernard Ebbers. 'The purpose of this sentence is to demonstrate that white-collar crime hurts just as much as blue-collar crime,' said U.S. District Court Judge Joanna Seybert. … Prosecutors estimated 2,700 people across the country, including Wisconsin, Vermont and Tennessee, lost their jobs" when American Tissue bankrupted. The New York Times/Bloomberg (9/27) also briefly reported on Gabayzadeh's sentencing.

New York Man Sentenced To 20 Months In Prison For Investment Fraud. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (9/22, Busse) reported, "A New York man will serve one year and eight months in prison for his role in an investment scheme that bilked a Lynchburg resident out of more than $385,000." Dennis Testa "was convicted in March of conspiracy to commit money laundering. He was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court in Charlottesville." The News & Advance noted co-conspirator Nicholas Lanza "was sentenced Sept. 1 to 2½ years in prison and ordered to pay $30,000 in restitution. … The Lynchburg resident was the biggest victim of the scam. In all, the pair took more than $400,000 from seven people in five states."

DOJ_NMG_0069670

New York's Local Courts Survive Despite A Century Of Criticism. The New York Times (9/27, Glaberson) reports that over the last century, at least nine commissions other state bodies have denounced New York State's town and village courts. The Times adds, "Although they are key institutions of justice in more than 1,000 small towns and suburbs across New York, trying misdemeanor cases and lawsuits, a vast majority of the justices who run them are not lawyers, and receive only a few days' legal training. The justices are often elected in low-turnout races, keep few records and operate largely without supervision — leaving a long trail of injustices and mangled rulings. Yet these justice courts, as they are known, remain essentially as they were when New Yorkers started complaining nearly a century ago."

Officials Use Forensic Techniques To Diagnose Elder Abuse. The New York Times (9/27, Gross) reports that public health and law enforcement officials "are learning to speak the same language and using the same forensic techniques as those popularized on the three C.S.I. television series to diagnose elder abuse and neglect. For decades, the techniques have been the state-of-the-art approach for investigating child abuse and domestic violence. But elder abuse has lagged far behind, suffering from a lack of financing, research and data. Now change is in the air, and forensic techniques are just one of many new initiatives nationwide to protect the elderly." The Times adds, "Congress is also expected to consider, before the October recess, the Elder Justice Act of 2006, which would create the first nationwide database on elder abuse, replacing inconsistent or unavailable data. The legislation, which has bipartisan support, also assigns a federal official to coordinate projects and technical assistance."

Internet Revives Land Scams. USA Today (9/27, El Nasser) reports that the Internet "is reviving a grand old American tradition: land scams. Thousands of lots in phantom subdivisions that were sold decades ago to people who hoped to build retirement homes in warm states are reappearing on online sites such as the Internet giant eBay. The new wave of land scams has the potential to snooker millions more around the world because of the Internet's broad and instantaneous reach. Many of the lots being sold have never been developed because they are on swampland in Florida or isolated desert ranchland in Texas and Arizona. There is no road access, water or power. The land might be developed someday, but county officials who are busy processing a surge in deed transfers are skeptical."

"Girls Gone Wild" Founder Enters Guilty Plea. The Washington Times (9/27, Seper) reports that Jospeh Francis, founder of the "Girls Gone Wild" video series "has pleaded guilty to charges of failing to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in his sexually explicit films." Francis "entered the guilty plea Monday before U.S. District Judge Margaret Morrow in Los Angeles. Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Francis pleaded guilty to two counts filed under a law passed by Congress to prevent sexual exploitation of children. … Under the agreements, she said, Francis agreed to pay the maximum fine of $500,000 and his two companies agreed to pay an additional $1.6 million in fines and restitution."

Tennessee Man Sentenced For Removing Classified Data. The Knoxville (TN) News-Sentinel (9/27, Satterfield) reports, "Retired U.S. Navy man Everett Ashley Blauvelt Jr. had no intention of betraying his country when he played fast and loose with 'secret restricted data' at the Y-12 National Security Complex in Oak Ridge, defense attorney Tom Dillard said Tuesday. … 'It was just a bad mistake,' Dillard said." The News-Sentinel continues, "Blauvelt, 61, pleaded guilty before U.S. Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton to a misdemeanor charge he removed classified information from Y-12, where components for the country's nuclear weapons arsenal are made, while working there as an employee of contractor BWXT in 2000. … Guyton sentenced Blauvelt to a one-year probationary term." The News-Sentinel adds, "According to documents filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court by Assistant U.S. Attorney David Dake, Blauvelt worked for BWXT as a 'shift technical adviser' and 'held secret and Q-security clearances.' … His job gave him access to classified information including documents labeled 'secret restricted data' because of references to nuclear weapon making and the potential to cause 'serious damage' to national security, Dake told Guyton. … The exact nature of the information at issue in Blauvelt's case was not disclosed in court records, although some of it apparently involved data on fellow employees. … At some point in late 2000, an allegation was made to Blauvelt's bosses that he had 'compiled a database containing detailed personal and sensitive information about co-workers,' Dake wrote. … It's not clear why Blauvelt broke the security rules, but Dillard insisted -- and the Justice Department agreed in allowing a misdemeanor plea -- that there is no proof that Blauvelt intended to market the classified information."

Resolution Of San Diego Pension Fund Scandal Criticized. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) says in an editorial that San Diego "is approaching the bitter end-game on its pension-fund scandal, with the Securities and Exchange Commission expected to release its own report on the city council's decade-long bender of overpromising benefits and underfunding its pension fund. The SEC is likely to require the city's government to take steps to ensure that the fiasco isn't repeated, allowing it to re-enter the municipal-bond market." But the "nightmare won't end there for San Diego taxpayers, who are left holding the bag for the misfeasance of the city council. For them, two big issues remain: Will the extravagant promises to city employees be honored without regard to their cost or the improprieties involved in making those promises? Second, will the city council be held accountable for creating this mess?"

DOJ_NMG_0069671

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Rule On Use Of Union Dues For Political Activity. The Washington Post (9/27, A8, Lane, 748K) reports that the Supreme Court has announced that it will decide "whether states may require organized labor to ask some workers for permission to spend their union fees on political activity. The case addresses the agency fees that some states require workers to pay to labor organizations for representation, even if they chose not to join the unions. The court said it would review a Washington state Supreme Court ruling that struck down a state law barring the use of those fees for political purposes without workers' consent. … The law had been adopted by Washington voters as part of a referendum on campaign finance reform." But "the state's high court ruled 6 to 3 earlier this year that the law violated unions' First Amendment rights because it presumes workers would object to labor leaders' spending choices."

The Washington Times (9/27, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The dispute actually involves two cases. One is an appeal by the state's attorney general defending the law, and the other is an appeal on behalf of teachers." Stefan Gleason, vice president of the Fairfax-based National Right to Work Foundation, "which is working on behalf of the teachers, said the case has big stakes because the state court's ruling could be seen to create a right to collect money even from nonunion teachers."

The New York Times (9/27, Greenhouse, 1.21M) reports, "From the labor unions' point of view, the difference between permitting nonmembers to 'opt out' and requiring them to 'opt in' is substantial." They "argue that it is burdensome to have to seek permission from nonmembers, and that nonmembers who do not exercise their opt-out rights should be seen as acquiescing in the expenditures."

LATimes Criticizes Class Action Light Cigarette Lawsuit. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, 918K) says in an editorial that an appeals court "must decide whether, as a matter of law, a federal judge in Brooklyn erred in refusing to block a class-action racketeering lawsuit against tobacco companies on behalf of millions of smokers of 'light' cigarettes. But lay people are likely to scratch their heads over District Judge Jack B. Weinstein's decision to let this lawsuit proceed — especially when they learn that the damage supposedly caused by the tobacco industry was to smokers' wallets, not their lungs." If Weinstein "isn't overruled, his decision will be a windfall for lawyers, a disaster for tobacco companies — which already have agreed to pay out billions of dollars as part of a settlement with state attorneys general — and a travesty for the cause of due process."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Rohrabacher Asks For DOJ Probe Of Border Agents' Prosecution. The Washington Times (9/27, Seper) reports, "Rep. Dana Rohrabacher yesterday asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate what he called 'the exceedingly harsh prosecution' of two U.S. Border Patrol agents now facing 20 years in prison for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks. … 'This proceeding has garnered national attention calling into question the administration's commitment to secure our borders,' said Mr. Rohrabacher, adding that the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean – 'were simply doing their jobs to guard our homeland by attempting to apprehend an illegal drug smuggler.'" The Times continues, "The California Republican's letter also called for the agents' sentencing next month to be postponed 'due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding' their prosecution. … Mr. Rohrabacher joins a growing list of Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill who have asked for congressional hearings and reviews by the White House and Justice Department into the prosecution. … 'It appears the facts do not add up or justify the length of the sentences for these agents, let alone their conviction on multiple counts,' Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said in a letter last month to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, requesting a full hearing into the matter. … 'Undue prosecution of Border Patrol agents could have a chilling effect on their ability to carry out their duties,' she said."

Boston Police Officer Charged With Violating Civil Rights Of Prostitute. The Boston Globe (9/27, Murphy, 425K) reports, "A 19-year-old prostitute feared that no one would believe her if she said an off-duty Boston police officer kept forcing her to perform sex in his car. So one night, she fled his car with a key piece of evidence: his badge," and "when Officer Michael LoPriore called the woman to get his badge back, the FBI was listening, too. LoPriore, 37, of Everett, was charged in federal court yesterday with depriving the woman of her rights by using his position as a police officer to coerce her to perform sex in September 2004. According to a plea agreement filed with the court by the US attorney's public corruption unit, LoPriore, a 12-year Boston police veteran, will plead guilty, resign from the department, and never seek another job as a police officer in Massachusetts." The Boston Herald (927, Sweet, McPhee, 203K) notes acting Boston police Commissioner Albert Goslin said, "Getting rid of characters of his ilk can't be done quick enough. We don't make excuses for anybody." The AP (9/27) also reports on the charges against Lopriore.

DOJ_NMG_0069672

Missouri Ice Cream Company Managers Indicted On Human Trafficking Charges. The Kansas City Star (9/21, Rizzo, 278K) reported, "Two managers of a Kansas City ice cream company were indicted…on new charges related to the alleged forced labor of Russian students who drove ice cream trucks." David L. Carslake and David H. Mackintosh "were among five men charged…in U.S. District Court in Kansas City with violating federal human trafficking laws," then "a grand jury in Springfield indicted Carslake and Mackintosh on a charge of document servitude for allegedly confiscating the passports and other identification documents of the eight young Russian men identified as victims in the human trafficking case. Carslake was also indicted on a charge of visa fraud for allegedly making false statements in federal immigration documents concerning the status of the Russian students."

The AP (9/21) noted, "Authorities said the men collaborated to force the students to work for Frosty Treats ice cream truck company of Kansas City by telling them they would be seriously harmed if they refused. All five are charged with aiding and abetting each other from Jan. 1 to Sept. 17 to obtain forced labor. … The eight students from Voronozh, Russia, were recruited under a summer work program run by the Russian company InterAir, according to an affidavit filed in support of the case."

Cambodia Cracks Down On Child Sex Trade. The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Piore) reports that Cambodia is cracking down on the child sex trade. This year, officials "have arrested at least 12 foreigners on charges of sexually abusing children - more than twice the amount snagged all of last year. In addition to three Americans, they've caught four Germans, an elderly Swiss man, a Belgium national, and at least three Vietnamese nationals who helped the foreigners procure children." The Monitor adds, "It's a trend that's been in the offing since at least 2000, when Cambodia first launched a major initiative funded by foreign donors aimed at targeting the exploitation of women and children and set up a hotline to receive tips."

Racist Graffiti Forces Charles County To Confront Race Relations Problem. The Washington Post (9/27, B1, Rucker, Wan) reports, "A wave of offensive graffiti and vandalism in the past seven weeks" is forcing Charles County, Maryland to confront "what some residents say has existed for years: a race relations problem. As Charles transforms from a land of sprawling tobacco farms to a far-flung exurb of Washington, few have spoken openly about what one black resident calls 'the browning of Charles County' -- the movement of large numbers of middle-class black families to an area that not long ago was predominantly white." The Post adds, "At least 10 incidences of racist graffiti or vandalism, all classified as hate crimes, have occurred in Charles since mid-August. … FBI agents are planning to join authorities in their search for the vandals at the request of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the House Democratic whip, whose district includes Southern Maryland."

Judge Says Louisiana Parish Schools On Target For Release From Federal Oversight. The Baton Rouge Advocate (9/27, Burgess) reports, "The St. Landry Parish school system is on track to be released from federal oversight by the end of next year, the federal judge handling the parish's desegregation case said Tuesday." The Advocate continues, "U.S. District Judge Tucker Melancon made the comments during a quarterly meeting in Lafayette with St. Landry Parish school system officials and School Board members. … 'My intention in this case is to get it over as soon as possible,' Melancon said. '… Barring some unforeseen circumstance, it's going to happen next December (2007).'" The Advocate adds, "Melancon said he hopes to convene court in Opelousas — the St. Landry Parish seat — for the formal hearing to declare the school system "unitary," or free from discrimination. … Several legal hurdles remain. … To be freed from federal oversight, school officials must show discrimination has been eliminated in six areas. … Melancon ruled last year that three areas were unitary: transportation, faculty assignment and extracurricular activities. … The school system still must show discrimination does not affect decisions on the quality of education offered to students, the quality of facilities and student assignment." The Advocate notes, "A hearing was set for Tuesday on a motion by the School Board for unitary status in the area of quality of education. … That hearing was delayed to allow Justice Department attorneys time to review a forthcoming report from the state with information about racial balance in special-education programs, an issue raised in St. Landry Parish."

DOJ_NMG_0069673

House Passes Parental Notification Bill. The New York Times/AP (9/27) reports, "Accompanying a minor across a state line to obtain an abortion and avoid parental notification in the girl's home state would become a federal crime under a bill the House passed Tuesday on a vote of 264 to 153." Supporters of the legislation "argued that it made no sense that minors who need parental permission to get an aspirin at school or to go on field trips can get an abortion without telling their parents." The bill's sponsor, GOP Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, said, "It protects minors from exploitation from the abortion industry, it promotes strong family ties and it helps foster respect for state laws." Opponents "argued that it would result in the arrests of grandparents and others who were trying to shield girls from abusive parents." The AP adds, "Chances are slim that the House and the Senate, which approved a more limited version of the bill in July, will devise a compromise they can send to the president before the end of this session of Congress. But the House vote gives conservatives something to showcase when they return home next week to campaign for the midterm elections."

The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Levey, 918K) says that "in a mark of the majority party's struggles with its 'values' agenda, Senate Republicans may run out of time to vote on the measure before lawmakers leave town at the end of the week." That "would leave Republicans with few trophies to show their socially conservative base as they try to motivate voters in the final six weeks of the fiercely contested 2006 campaign." The Times adds, "Some strategists fear that failure to win final passage of the bill could hamper efforts to spur turnout of a reliably Republican voting bloc — which might mean the difference in key races around the country." The bill "that the House passed Tuesday by a vote of 264 to 153 was the latest initiative in a more than decade-long campaign to chip away at abortion rights." But "aides to senior Senate Republicans said Tuesday that they could not be sure the measure would make it to the floor for a vote."

The Washington Times (9/27, Fagan, Bellantoni, 88K) notes the House action is a story titled "GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation," in which it says Senate Democrats "have blocked the final negotiations, seeking, among other things, changes to limit the notification rights of fathers who rape their daughters. It was not clear yesterday whether the Senate would act on the bill this week, but if it does, the bill would likely pass and could then go on to President Bush, supporters said."

House Approves Bill On Religious Lawsuits. The AP (9/27, Abrams) reports, "House Republicans, carrying out their election-year values agenda, on Tuesday pushed through legislation cutting off financial awards for lawsuits successfully filed against expressions of religion such as Christmas displays on government grounds." The bill, "passed 244-173, denies the awarding of attorney's fees or monetary damages to a party that wins a court case based on the establishment clause in the Constitution that is used to argue a separation of church and state." The AP adds, "There is no companion Senate bill and little chance the Senate would consider it in the waning days of this session, but the House vote was a reminder to the GOP's conservative base that their issues are not being ignored."

The Washington Post (9/27, A4, Cooperman, 748K) reports, "Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office, said the measure is 'election-year red meat for the Christian right, because they've been complaining they haven't gotten enough from this Congress.'" The American Legion, the Southern Baptist Convention "and other conservative groups began pushing for the legislation after a Pennsylvania judge awarded $2 million to the ACLU of Pennsylvania and Americans United for Separation of Church and State. The two groups had successfully sued the school board in Dover, Pa., for requiring science teachers to teach "intelligent design" alongside evolution. The award was later reduced to $1 million." The Washington Times (9/27, Fagan, Bellantoni, 88K) notes the House action is a story titled "GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation," in which it says "if the Public Expression of Religion Act were to become law, groups like the American Civil Liberties Union would be barred from receiving legal fees if they prevail in a court battle."

Texas Court Case Tests Limits Of Legal Intervention In Church Affairs. The New York Times (9/27, Blumenthal, 1.21M) reports Peggy Lee Penley of Fort Worth, Texas sought marriage counseling from her pastor, C.L. Westbrook, Jr., who "disclosed her 'biblically inappropriate relationship'" with another man "to church elders" and eventually "the full congregation of the church." In 2001, Ms. Penley "sued her pastor for defamation and negligence, saying he had violated his responsibilities as a professional counselor. Her lawsuit has attracted considerable attention from church groups trying to prevent court intervention in religious matters. The case went before the Texas Supreme Court on Tuesday, and the outcome will once again help define the evolving line between church and state." While courts "have long held that religious practices and discipline are immune from court review under a legal doctrine known as 'ecclesiastical abstention,' secular misconduct by religious figures is not automatically protected." Church groups "have leapt into the case, submitting briefs that warn of growing attacks on religious autonomy."

DOJ_NMG_0069674

ANTITRUST:

Wright Bill Backers Press For Compromise. The Dallas Morning News (9/27, Reddy) reports, "Legislation to lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field could come down to the wire to clear both the House and Senate before a pre-election recess." The News continues, "Finding a procedural path for the Wright legislation has proven elusive on both sides of the Capitol as congressional leaders try to rush through major legislation before returning home Saturday to campaign for the November elections. … Still, lawmakers from North Texas weren't conceding Tuesday that the issue would have to fall into the lame-duck session. … Getting the bill cleared Friday or early Saturday remained a possibility. … 'It's not dead for this week, but it's still in flux,' said Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth." The News adds, "The legislation would implement a June compromise to repeal the 1979 Wright amendment. … The bill needs to be enacted by the end of the year, or the agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport will expire. … The House is awaiting action on an original version of the legislation and one amended by the House Judiciary Committee that removes an exemption from antitrust laws."

Bill Faces More Opposition. The Dallas Business Journal (9/27) reports, "Opposition to the Wright Amendment compromise bill continues to mount locally, as a new study says the bill will cost consumers billions, and two consumer groups have written House Democratic leaders to protest the bill." The Journal continues, "The study was conducted by Steven A. Morrison, a member of the Department of Economics at Northeastern University and editor in chief of the Journal of Transport Economics and Policy. The study was solicited by the law firm of Bickel & Brewer, which represents Love Terminal Partners, which has filed a lawsuit over the local agreement that the Wright compromise bill is based on. … In the report, Morrison looked at U.S. Department of Transportation data on airline fares and passenger volume to estimate the effects on consumers of full repeal versus the proposed agreement. … He said by fully repealing the bill consumers would recognize $726 million annually, compared to between $117 million and $383 million annually from through ticketing."

Johnson & Johnson Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Deal. The AP (9/27, Johnson) reports, "Months after Johnson & Johnson lost a bidding war for medical-device maker Guidant, J&J is suing the winner, Boston Scientific, and Abbott Laboratories, alleging the two companies induced Guidant to breach its agreement with J&J." The AP continues, New Brunswick.-based Johnson & Johnson is seeking $5.5 billion in damages, according to the lawsuit, filed Monday in U.S. District Court in New York. The lawsuit also seeks reimbursement for court costs, attorney fees and interest." The AP adds, "The suit asks the court to rule that Indianapolis-based Guidant Corp. breached the companies' merger agreement and that Boston Scientific Corp. and Abbott Laboratories Inc. intentionally interfered with the deal and induced Guidant to breach it. … Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific trumped Johnson & Johnson's final $24.2 billion offer with a $27.2 billion bid to acquire Guidant and its portfolio of stents, defibrillators, pacemakers and other medical devices. … Guidant paid Johnson & Johnson a $705 million breakup fee after it opted to accept Boston Scientific's offer in late January. To eliminate possible antitrust snags, Boston Scientific agreed to sell Guidant's stent and vascular business to Abbott for $4.1 billion and a $900 million loan."

UPI (9/27) reports, "Johnson & Johnson alleges in its New York federal lawsuit, which also names Abbott Laboratories, that Boston Scientific prevailed 'only because Guidant leaked confidential information to a third party, Abbott, for the purpose of arranging a prepackaged divestiture of significant Guidant businesses to Abbott,' Boston Business Journal said. … Once Guidant had done so, Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific, 'which allowed Boston Scientific to make an offer for Guidant that would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review,' the suit says."

Bloomberg (9/27, Glovin, Goldstein) reports, "Since defeating J&J, Boston Scientific has been buffeted by product recalls, falling sales, profit warnings, analyst downgrades and growing legal risks, driving the company's market value down to $21.8 billion from $31.2 billion in less than five months. … J&J lost the deal in January, when Abbott made financing agreement that enabled Boston Scientific to snatch Guidant, the lawsuit said. Guidant accepted the bid as superior to J&J's offer, and J&J promptly received a $705 million termination fee from Guidant."

Judge Dismisses Part Of AMD's Claim Against Intel. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Clark) reports, "A federal judge dismissed major portions of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s high-profile antitrust suit against Intel Corp., accepting Intel's argument that many of AMD's claims are beyond the reach of U.S. law." AMD "accuses Intel of illegally maintaining a monopoly in the market for microprocessor chips that act as the brains in most personal computers. Its suit, filed in June 2005 in federal court in Delaware, questions Intel's business tactics in several countries, including Britain, Germany and Japan. Intel, of Santa Clara, Calif., asked the judge to dismiss AMD claims that are based on the foreign effect of Intel's alleged tactics. … US District Judge Joseph Farnan sided with Intel. He ruled that AMD 'has not demonstrated that the alleged foreign conduct of Intel has direct, substantial and foreseeable effects in the United States which gives rise to its claim.'"

DOJ_NMG_0069675

DeCode Genetics Sues Former Employees For Stealing Trade Secrets. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Regalado) reports that Icelandic gene hunting company DeCode Genetics Inc. is suing five ex-employees for stealing trade secrets and breach of contract. The Journal reports that the case "may threaten a major US project to study the DNA of children." Four of the five former employees of DeCode Genetics Inc. "now work for Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, which in June announced a high-profile plan to collect and study DNA from some 100,000 children. … In its suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, DeCode asked the court to prevent CHOP or its former employees from using any of its trade secrets. In a statement, CHOP officials said the 'hospital believes that the claims against its researchers are without merit and that they will prevail in the lawsuit.' The hospital said it would 'vigorously' defend its employees and its own research program."

Think Tank Director Says Microsoft Can't Be Guilty Of A Crime Before It Commits It. Alberto Mingardi, director general of Istituto Bruno Leoni, a Milan-based free-market think tank, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/27), "Quarrels between the European Commission and Microsoft seem to be the daily bread in Brussels. … Since March, the Commission has expressed concerns about Vista, the new version of Windows, ready to be released in a few months but waiting for an informal greenlight from Brussels. … The new operating system's alleged future dominance is merely a prediction, albeit a reasonable one based on the history of previous iterations of Windows. Still, there can be no evidence of the size of Vista's market share until it is released and sold." Mingardi adds, "You cannot be 'guilty' of any crime before you have committed it and been accused, much less proven, of having committed it. This is a basic tenant of legal certainty as we know it. Why should it not continue to apply to competition policy?"

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Regent Radio Station Buy. The AP (9/27) reports, "Radio broadcasting company Regent Communications Inc. received antitrust approval from the Federal Trade Commission to buy five radio stations serving the Buffalo, N.Y., market from CBS Corp. for $125 million in cash." The AP continues, "The FTC on Monday granted early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust law, according to the agency's Web site." The AP adds, "Cincinnati-based Regent announced on Sept. 5 that it planned to operate the Buffalo stations -- WBLK-FM, WBUF-FM, WJYE-FM, WYRK-FM and WECK-AM -- through a local marketing agreement starting in October. … After the deal closes, Regent will own and operate 19 radio stations in the Upstate New York region including stations in the Buffalo, Albany, Utica/Rome and Watertown markets."

Kroes Claims US Lobbied Her Over Microsoft Fine. CNET News (9/27, Thurston) reports, "The U.S. government sought to influence the European Commission over Microsoft's antitrust case, according to Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes." CNET continues, "Kroes said the U.S. Embassy in Brussels, Belgium, had asked her to be 'nicer' to Microsoft ahead of her decision to fine the software giant 280 million euros ($357 million) in July. … The commissioner criticized the approach. 'This is of course an intervention which is not possible,' Kroes told Dutch newspaper Financieele Dagblad this week." CNET adds, "When asked if she was annoyed by the embassy's approach, she said: 'In my work, I cannot have a preference. I have, however, a personal opinion, but that is for Saturday night.' … Kroes' representative added in an e-mail to CNET News.com's sister site ZDNet UK on Tuesday: 'We can confirm that she was lobbied and that she did not appreciate it.'" CNET notes, "Microsoft declined to comment on Kroes' claims, but an insider insisted that the company had not tried to influence discussions between the U.S. government and the EC. … The U.S. Embassy had not responded to requests for comment at the time of writing."

New Jersey MLS Withdraws Display Policy. Inman News (9/27, Roberts) reports, "The New Jersey Multiple Listing Service, a regional MLS in Northern New Jersey that is owned and operated by two local Realtor organizations, has withdrawn a policy that prevented some property listings from reaching Realtor.com and several other home-search Web sites." Inman continues, "While New Jersey MLS officials were reportedly contacted by representatives for the U.S. Federal Trade Commission -- an agency that has been investigating similar policies at more than a dozen other MLSs across the country -- MLS officials stated in a communication to members this month that the decision to rescind the rule was in response to the practices of neighboring MLSs. … National Association of Realtors general counsel Laurie Janik announced earlier this year that 14 separate government investigations had been launched over MLS policies that prevent some property listings information from being publicly displayed on some public Web sites. The Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin MLS changed its restrictions relating to the public display of some property listings in late August after an FTC investigation." Inman notes, "The Northern New England Real Estate Network and Austin Board of Realtors in Texas also lifted similar restrictions, and both of these groups announced agreements with the FTC in response to investigations."

DOJ_NMG_0069676

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Allows California Auto Emissions Suit To Proceed. The AP (9/27, Thompson) reports, "Automakers can continue their lawsuit seeking to block strict vehicle emission standards adopted two years ago by California regulators, a federal judge ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii sided preliminarily with a coalition of automakers on their three major arguments against the state law, which was passed in 2002 and adopted two years later by the state air board. In a ruling Monday,Ishii threw out two lesser arguments, but ruled the suit should go to trial Jan. 30." The AP adds, "The tailpipe standards adopted by the California Air Resources Board were designed to cut greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks by 25 percent and from sport utility vehicles by 18 percent starting in 2009. Ten other U.S. states have since adopted the California standard. … The automobile industry sued in U.S. District Court in Fresno, California, arguing that the state law amounts to an attempt to set new fuel-economy standards, something it says can be done only by the federal government. .. . The judge ruled that automakers can continue with their argument that allowing states to set their own emission standards would violate two federal laws that reserve that power to the federal government. Ishii also allowed an argument by the automakers that California's regulations would undermine the federal government's ability to conduct a uniform foreign policy."

NOAA Researchers Accuse White House Of Blocking Warming Report. USA Today/AP (9/27) reports, "The Bush administration has blocked release of a report that suggests global warming is contributing to the frequency and strength of hurricanes, the journal Nature reported Tuesday. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration disputed the Nature article, saying there was not a report but a two-page fact sheet about the topic. The information was to be included in a press kit to be distributed in May as the annual hurricane season approached but wasn't ready." NOAA spokesman Jordan St. John said, responding to the Nature article, "The White House never saw it, so they didn't block it."

Seattle Law Firm Represents 76 Clients In Tainted Spinach Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Tesoriero, Lattman) reports on the Seattle law firm Marler Clark which had filed its first bad spinach lawsuit before health officials warned the public about possibly tainted spinach. As "word of the bacteria outbreak began to spread this month, lawyers at the firm posted messages on the firm's E. coli blog, www.ecoliblog.com1. They reached out to reporters and waited for the calls and emails to stream in. Now Marler Clark is representing 76 clients. Bill Marler, a 49-year-old partner in the firm, tracks them with Post-it Notes on a US map hanging in his office." The Journal adds, "A tiny firm with six attorneys, a staff epidemiologist and a nurse, Marler Clark has in the past eight years established itself as the go-to place for victims of food-borne illnesses. The firm's niche practice requires it to connect quickly with new, often widely dispersed clients as an outbreak unfolds, making effective marketing paramount. The firm has pursued an aggressive brand-building campaign, including speaking engagements, media interviews and an extensive Internet presence."

Ohio Town Has Been A Test Lab On Air Pollution Since 1970's. The New York Times (9/27, Barringer) reports that since the 1970's residents of Steubenville, Ohio have been providing "details about their lung function and cardiac rhythms, about the manner of their lives and the cause of their deaths, to the science on which 21st-century air pollution policies are built. Data from Steubenville have played a central role in many decisions by the Environmental Protection Agency on air pollution regulations, including two of the more controversial — one in 2005 setting the first limits on mercury emissions, and another last week to tighten one but not both of the standards for lethal fine soot particles." The Post adds, "Three decades ago, Steubenville's reputation for having the country's foulest air made it a magnet for researchers in the young field of environmental epidemiology. … Much of that pollution, along with a noxious odor that seemed part burnt toast and part burnt metal, has disappeared along with the jobs at the larger steel plant, across the river in Weirton, W.Va. As the pollution receded, mortality rates declined."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reputed Cali Cartel Leaders Get 30-Year Prison Sentences. There are more than 400 media references to the guilty pleas and sentencing of two reputed leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities say supplied most of the cocaine in the U.S. in the 1990s. Some examples: USA Today (9/27, Johnson) reports the surviving leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities "say once supplied up to 80% of the cocaine in the USA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to trafficking charges as the government took steps to seize an estimated $2.1 billion in cartel assets." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said brothers Miguel and Gilberto

DOJ_NMG_0069677

Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced to 30 years in prison, effectively ending a 20-year period in which they were key players in Colombia's violent drug trade." While they were sentenced in Miami, 28 other family members "reached a separate pact with the government to surrender their worldwide assets. … 'It doesn't get any bigger than today,' said…Karen Tandy. She said the guilty pleas represented the 'last nail in the coffin of the Cali cartel.'"

The Washington Post (9/27, Eggen, A8) notes that because of the plea agreement, half a dozen of the brothers' relatives "will not face prosecution. In addition, U.S. officials said, 28 people with ties to the pair will have a chance to be removed from a Treasury Department list that freezes the assets of 'specially designated narcotics traffickers' if they relinquish property tainted by drug money."

Bloomberg (9/26) reports Gonzales said the two men "were responsible for importing more than 200 tons of cocaine into the U.S."

The AP (9/26) reports John Walters said the cartel "had operated by terrorizing Colombian society and killing prosecutors, judges and political candidates and was responsible for 'the torture and murder of more than 100 people' whose bodies were dumped in a Colombian river to keep others downstream in fear of the gang."

In Miami, the AP (9/27) also reports the brothers "agreed to forfeit to the United States $2.1 billion in assets linked to drug trafficking, but the two probably made many times that amount during the cartel's heyday in the 1990s. Neither brother is required to cooperate in any current or future criminal investigations, according to the plea agreement." A version of the AP story was used by MSNBC, Forbes, the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Gainesville Sun, Seattle Times, and other newspapers.

The New York Times (9/26) reports Walters "praised President Uribe for his 'courage' in helping to bring down the two formidable drug kingpins. 'People in the past talked about the Cali cartel as the peaceful cartel, but their reign of terror and blood, their war with Pablo Escobar in the early 90's, still haunts the collective memory of many in Colombia and many in this country that worked against them,' he said. 'The Cali cartel was one of the most powerful criminal organizations ever, seeking to buy or kill anybody that got in their way.'"

The Miami Herald (9/27) reports that on Tuesday, the Rodríguez Orejuela brothers "pleaded guilty to conspiring to smuggle tons of cocaine into the United States. The brothers also agreed to plead guilty to a separate indictment filed in New York that charged them with conspiring to launder their drug profits."

The Washington Times/UPI (9/26) cites the Miami Herald story and also reports that both brothers "are in their 60s and the sentences mean they are likely to die in federal prison."

On its Web site, CBS News/AP (9/26) reports, "It's estimated the Orejuelas controlled 80 percent of the cocaine market in the 1990s largely because of the corporate mentality of the two brothers and the ingenious ways in which they hid drugs, such as in frozen broccoli. The Drug Enforcement Administration believes the successor organizations are fractured and will never have the clout of Cali."

BBC News (9/27) reports the brothers "were accused of organizing drug trafficking and money laundering from the Colombian prison in which they had been held since 1995." McClatchy Newspapers (9/27, Blum) also reports this story.

Significant "Drug War" Challenges Remain. ABC News (9/26) reports on its Web site that despite the latest developments in the Cali cartel case, "significant challenges remain in the drug war and the Colombian government's efforts against the FARC narco-terrorist rebel group. … According to the DEA, the FARC rebels…control large parts of the coca production areas in Colombia and are responsible for supplying more than 50 percent of the world's cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine that enters the United States."

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (9/26, story 4, 0:15, Couric) reported, "It's being called a major blow to the world's biggest supplier of cocaine. Two brothers struck a deal with U.S. prosecutors. They will forfeit $2 billion in drug money and likely spend the rest of their lives in prison, but their families won't be prosecuted."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (9/26, 3:00 p.m.) reported, "While the men, who are in their 60s, have agreed to plea deals that will likely keep them behind bars for the rest of their lives; a side deal protects half a dozen of their relatives in Colombia from facing charges. The Cali cartel once was responsible for up to 80% of the cocaine smuggled into the U.S."

FOX News (9/26, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Anyone who bought cocaine on the streets of the United States in the 1990's was likely buying it from the two men who were in court…in Miami today -- two Colombian brothers head of the Cali cartel and today after a 15 year effort, U.S. Justice Department officials brought them to justice. They got terms of 30 years in prison. They got to payback $2 billion in cocaine profits as part of their deal."

CBC Evening News (9/26, 6:35 p.m.) reported, "It's being called a major blow to the world's biggest supplier of cocaine. Two brothers, who once headed the Cali cartel in Columbia, struck a deal with U.S. Prosecutors. They will forfeit $2 billion in drug money and likely spend the rest of their lives in prison, but their families won't be prosecuted."

Local TV Coverage. WTVT-TV, Tampa-St Petersburg-Sarasota (9/26, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Both men are in their 60's and will get sentences that will most likely keep them in prison for life. The Cali cartel was once responsible for as much as 80% of the cocaine smuggled into America."

DOJ_NMG_0069678

WINK-TV, Ft. Myers-Naples (9/26, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Drug kingpins pled guilty to charges in Miami. The brothers are accused of building Colombia's Cali cartel into the world's top cocaine supplier during the 1990s. Today's plea agreement was reached after months of negotiations with several U.S. agencies."

KJRH-TV TULSA, (9/26, 5:01 p.m.) reported, "A major milestone in the U.S. government's war on drugs. Two Colombians, who headed the powerful Cali cocaine cartel, pleaded guilty in Miami today to drug trafficking and money laundering charges. A federal judge immediately sentenced Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez- Orejuela to 30- years in prison. The brothers also agreed to forfeit billions of dollars in drug money. The Cali cartel was once responsible for as much as 80-percent of the cocaine smuggled into the U.S."

WBRE-TV Wilkes Barre, (9/26, 11:19 p.m.) reported, "Two Colombian drug kingpins appeared in a Miami courtroom today. Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, founders of the Cali drug cartel, pleaded guilty to charges of drug trafficking and money laundering. The brothers, who are in their 60's, were each sentenced to 30 years in a U.S prison. As part of a complex deal, the brothers agreed to turn over billions of dollars in assets connected to their drug business."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles, (9/26, 4:33 p.m.) reported, "There is no doubt that if these two brother drug lords were legitimate, they would had been in the top tier of the Forbes list of the richest people in this world."

WBFS-TV Miami, (9/26, 10:10 p.m.) reported, "In Washington, a cartel of cabinet level brass declared today's plea bargain a victory. These criminals rank as the highest level drug figures to ever occupy a U.S. jail cell. The brothers admitted to supplying most of the coke that was consumed in the U.S. in the 1990s. At its zenith, their cocaine network was shipping nearly five tons of the white powder every month most of it through south Florida, inside fence posts, shipments of ceramic tiles but all that is history now."

KTSM-TV El Paso, (9/26, 5:13 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the brothers' guilty pleas effectively signal a final, fatal blow to the powerful Cali cartel."

WCIV-TV Charleston, (9/26, 11:20 p.m.) reported, "Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, ages 67 and 63, each… are two of more than 300 drug traffickers extradited to the U.S. from Columbia as part of a 1997 treaty."

Pakistani Man Gets 18-Year Sentence In Drugs-For-Weapons Scheme. The Los Angeles Times (9/26) reports a Pakistani man "was sentenced Monday to an 18-year federal prison term for his role in an international drugs-for-weapons scheme foiled by undercover U.S. agents. Syed Mustajab Shah, 55, admitted conspiring with two co-defendants to trade 5 tons of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin for four Stinger antiaircraft missiles, which they intended to sell to the Taliban. He was arrested in Hong Kong in 2002."

Beheadings Seen As Mexican Drug Cartels' New Method Of Intimidation. The San Antonio Express-News (9/26) reports Mexican drug cartels are adopting a method of intimidation made notorious by Middle Eastern terrorist groups. Already this year, at least 26 people have been decapitated in Mexico, with heads stuck on fences, dumped in trash piles and -- most recently -- tossed onto a nightclub dance floor. … In Mexico, as crime bosses fall and turf shifts, the pattern of killing is changing. The infamous Gulf and Sinaloa cartels and their smaller offshoots are fighting for control of smuggling routes from the southern border with Guatemala to the northern border with the United States."

President-elect Says Violence Fueled By Drug Smuggling Overwhelms Key Areas. The AP (9/26) reports Mexico's president-elect "says murder and mayhem fueled by drug smuggling have overwhelmed the governments of the nation's capital and key states across the country. Felipe Calderon said the wave of bloodshed knows no politics; it is ravaging state governments controlled by each of Mexico's three major parties." Calderon "will take office Dec. 1. … Authorities say more than 1,500 people have died in Mexican drug violence so far this year."

Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team. The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Harman) reports on what it calls the "calculated massacre of one of Colombia's best counternarcotics police teams." The Monitor says seven of the men on the team were members of a group of about 200 police trained by the DEA. According to the Monitor, the investigation of last May's killings in Jamundí "suggests the reach that Colombia's drug lords maintain today, and has shaken officials in Washington and Bogotá. The US Congress has temporarily frozen funding for Plan Colombia…and a chorus of disappointed and angry voices in both capitals is demanding an honest evaluation of the US' most expensive foreign aid program outside of the Middle East, six years after it set out to win the war on drugs." USA Today has posted this story on its Web site.

House Approves New Gun Show Rules. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (9/27, Hardin) reports, "The House of Representatives yesterday passed a bill to revamp federal enforcement rules for gun dealers, born in part from complaints about agents' tactics at Richmond-area gun shows." The Times-Dispatch continues, "The bipartisan bill would give the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives more tools to punish federally licensed gun dealers who break U.S. firearm-sale rules. It was passed on a vote of 277-131." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Its chief proponents, including Virginia Rep. Robert C. Scott, D-3rd, labeled the bill a balanced approach to provide needed intermediate penalties, including civil penalties or a license suspension, that fall short of revoking a dealer's license. … Warnings and revocation of licenses are the only punishments for dealers under current law." The Times-Dispatch notes, "As many as 98 percent of gun dealers' federal violations now result in nothing more than a letter of reprimand, or a meeting with ATF officials in their offices, Scott said during debate of the bill Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0069679

ATF Seeks Creation Of Gang Field Office In Seattle Area. The AP (9/27) reports, "The local head of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives says he hopes to establish a permanent gang investigation field office here, part of a growing law enforcement response to gang activity statewide." The AP continues, "Kelvin Crenshaw, special agent in charge of the ATF's Seattle office, told The Seattle Times he plans to ask his bosses in Washington, D.C., this fall for permission to establish the gang office, which he said would mean more agents and funding for complex investigations." The AP adds, "The plan is part of a response to what law enforcement officials see as a recent increase in gang activity. In Seattle, a regional hub of such crime, 101 cases were referred to the police department's gang unit between Jan. 1 and Aug. 31 of this year - more than the 94 cases in all of 2005. … The ATF has been compiling a regional database of gang members, and last year formed a violent gang task force with members from the FBI, Seattle Police and the King County sheriff's office. Crenshaw's second-in-command, Doug Dawson, said the database will also help officials determine what cases meet the threshold for federal prosecution, determined in part by firearm use and the amount of drugs involved."

IMMIGRATION:

High Court To Consider California Immigrant Car Theft Case. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Savage) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to hear a California case to decide whether immigrants convicted of stealing a car must be deported." The Times continues, "A strict federal immigration reform law passed in 1996 says that immigrants, including permanent residents, who commit an 'aggravated felony' in the U.S. must be sent home, regardless of how long they have lived here or whether they have a family and a job. … But the Justice Department and some lower courts have disagreed on which crimes, including auto theft, are aggravated felonies." The Times adds, "Next week, the Supreme Court will take up a separate South Dakota case to determine whether immigrants who are convicted of drug possession can be deported as felons. The outcome is expected to affect tens of thousands of immigrants across the country." The Times notes, "The case before the court involves a California law on auto thefts, but government lawyers said all 50 states have similar measures. … Four years ago, Luis Alexander Duenas-Alvarez, a native of Peru who became a legal U.S. resident, pleaded guilty to stealing a 2002 Honda Accord in Marin County, near San Francisco, and was sentenced to three years in prison. Federal authorities took him into custody for deportation. … The 1996 law has a list of aggravated felonies that lead to deportation, including any theft that carries a prison sentence of more than a year. … Government lawyers contend that any immigrant convicted of auto theft in California should be deported under that law. … But earlier this year, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed. The court ruled that the California law is too broad to fit the definition of theft in the federal law because it includes accomplices to auto theft. … The government counters that all states have laws that allow accomplices to be charged with auto theft. … In their appeal on behalf of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, government lawyers said the 9th Circuit was wrong on two points. First, Duenas-Alvarez stole the car and therefore was a thief. And second, Congress meant to include accomplices to the crime when it wrote the federal law."

Fort Bragg ID Sweep Nets 28 Detentions. The Fayetteville (NC) Observer (9/27, Willett) reports, "Fort Bragg officials this morning detained 28 people, mostly construction workers, as they tried to enter post with false or fraudulently obtained identification." The Observer continues, "The operation — the second this year — was conducted at the All American Freeway access-control point between 6 and 8 a.m. … In July, 58 people were detained at the Knox Street and Randolph Street entrances to Fort Bragg." The Observer adds, "Tom McCollum, a Fort Bragg spokesman, said the 28 were taken to a immigration detention center in Cary. … People caught in the sweep could be charged with presenting a false or fraudulently obtained federal or state identification and criminal trespassing, according to a statement about today's operation. … Following the July 18 sweep, all but 10 of the 58 people detained were charged with illegal entry into the United States. Six people received federal jail sentences in August, and the other 42 each pleaded guilty to a single charge related to their illegal status. … Agencies involved in today's sweep included: Fort Bragg's Directorate of Security and Emergency Services, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, U.S. Marshals, the Defense Criminal Investigation Service, the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Raleigh."

DOJ_NMG_0069680

Judge Orders Deportation Of Three Egyptian Students. The AP (9/27, Ross) reports from Omaha, NE, "Three Egyptian students who sparked a nationwide search when they failed to show up for a university exchange program last month were ordered deported Monday." The AP continues, "The students - Mohamed Ibrahim El Sayed El Moghazy, 20; Ahmed Refaat Saad El Moghazi El Laket, 19; and Moustafa Wagdy Moustafa El Gafary, 18 - had admitted they violated U.S. immigration laws and asked Judge James Fujimoto to allow them to return home voluntarily." The AP adds, "Fujimoto, who presided over the hearing via teleconference from Chicago, denied the request and ordered the three deported, citing their brief time in the United States, lack of long-term and family ties here and decision to flee immediately upon entering the country. … In the future, the three will need special permission to ever re-enter the U.S., which they would not have needed if they were allowed to leave voluntarily. … The three were among 17 students from Mansoura University in Egypt invited to a monthlong exchange program at Montana State University. Only six students showed up to the program, prompting U.S. authorities to issue a nationwide search for the remaining 11 students. All were detained, but none were considered a terrorism risk."

McCain Says He Is Inclined To Vote For Narrower Immigration Bill. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Blitzer) reported that Sen. John McCain "joined with some Senate colleagues today to make a final likely futile push for comprehensive [immigration] reform this year. But later McCain told CNN he is inclined to vote for a far narrower bill now before the Senate to build a 700-mile security fence along the US-Mexico border. A short while ago, Democrat Ted Kennedy went to the Senate floor to blast that security fence bill. McCain and Kennedy are sponsors of a farther reaching bill that has been stalled in the Senate because of opposition to a key position -- a path to citizenship for many illegal immigrants."

The New York Times (9/27, Swarns, 1.21M) reports McCain and Sens. Arlen Specter and Lindsey Graham "said they supported border security, including a measure to add fencing to the border with Mexico. But they said that such measures alone would fail to deal with the illegal residence in this country of about 11 million immigrants as well as labor shortages in particular industries."

Meanwhile, USA Today/AP (9/27, Gamboa) reports, "A senior GOP senator blocked Republican leaders Tuesday in their efforts to add immigration, handgun and Internet gambling measures to a defense bill." Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, "rejected requests from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert to add the items to his bill on military pay." Warner "said in a memo to Frist he is 'firmly opposed' to including unrelated measures in the defense bill."

Supreme Court To Examine Provision In 1996 Reform. The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Savage, 918K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to hear a California case to decide whether immigrants convicted of stealing a car must be deported." A "strict federal immigration reform law passed in 1996" says that "immigrants, including permanent residents, who commit an 'aggravated felony' in the US must be sent home, regardless of how long they have lived here or whether they have a family and a job." But "the Justice Department and some lower courts have disagreed on which crimes, including auto theft, are aggravated felonies."

States, Municipalities Now Enforcing Immigration Laws. The Washington Post (9/27, A1, Whoriskey, 748K) reports from Charlotte, NC, "Police here operated for years under what amounts to a 'don't ask, don't tell' policy toward illegal immigrants. As elsewhere in the United States, law enforcement officers did not check the immigration status of people they came into contact with, and in the vast majority of cases, a run-in with the law carried little threat of deportation." But "that accommodation for the burgeoning illegal population ended abruptly in April, when the Mecklenburg County sheriff's office began to enforce immigration law, placing more than 100 people a month into deportation proceedings. Some of them had been charged with violent crimes, others with traffic infractions." The Post adds, "Besides Mecklenburg, six other state and local law enforcement agencies have started similar programs in recent years. A dozen more are being worked out with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. And in the past three months, hundreds of state and local departments have inquired about similar efforts, said Robert J. Hines, who heads the program for the ICE."

Rohrabacher Asks Gonzales To Reassess Prosecution Of Border Patrol Agents. The Washington Times (9/27, Seper, 88K) reports, "Rep. Dana Rohrabacher yesterday asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate what he called 'the exceedingly harsh prosecution' of two US Border Patrol agents now facing 20 years in prison for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks." Said the lawmaker, "This proceeding has garnered national attention calling into question the administration's commitment to secure our borders. He added that "the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean – 'were simply doing their jobs to guard our homeland by attempting to apprehend an illegal drug smuggler.'" The California Republican's letter also "called for the agents' sentencing next month to be postponed 'due to significant concerns over the circumstances surrounding' their prosecution."

DOJ_NMG_0069681

TAX:

Rangel Says Eliminating Tax Cuts Is On Table. The Washington Times (9/27, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, the top Democrat on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, said yesterday he wouldn't rule out killing any of President Bush's tax cuts in order to alleviate the dreaded Alternative Minimum Tax and balance the budget, Congress Daily reported. Mr. Rangel stipulated that 'everything has to be on the table' when considering which tax cuts must go, and when asked if he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum, he answered, 'No question about it.' His remarks caused an immediate outburst among Republicans, claiming the Democrat had just admitted his party will indeed raise taxes if it comes to power in November."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Poised To Approve $448 Billion Defense Budget. The AP (9/27, Taylor) reports, "Just days before leaving Washington to campaign, Congress is moving to provide $70 billion more for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as part of a record $448 billion Pentagon budget. With Iraq alone costing about $8 billion a month, another infusion of funds will be needed next spring." After final passage (the Senate has not acted yet), "Congress will have approved $507 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and heightened security at overseas military bases since the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago, according to the Congressional Research Service. The growing price tag of the Iraq conflict is partly driven by the need to repair and replace military equipment worn out in harsh, dusty conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan or destroyed in battle. ... While the measure enjoys sweeping support, the brief debate sparked partisan exchanges over the Iraq war." House Democrat Jerrold Nadler and House Republican Tom Cole are quoted. The Washington Post/AP (9/27) runs a shorter version of this article.

Senate Democrats Seek To Block GOP Legislative Priorities. The Washington Times (9/27, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senate Democrats are blocking Republicans from passing several of their top legislative priorities this week, including new border fencing, two of the Bush administration's key counterterrorism programs and a drastic reduction in the estate tax. 'The legislative corner they've painted themselves in is very difficult,' Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, told reporters yesterday." Democrats, "while accusing Republicans of presiding over a 'do-nothing' Congress, are slow-walking legislation but appear unlikely to kill outright any of the security measures as elections approach." Asked yesterday "whether Democrats will take advantage of Senate rules that allow lawmakers to demand 30 hours of debate on each bill, Mr. Reid replied: 'Well, unless there's some agreement, we're going to go ahead and do the 30 hours.'" Roll Call (9/27, Billings) says Reid "is looking ahead to the next session, when he expects to have a stronger hand to play and share more in common with his Republican counterpart." In "a wide-ranging interview," Reid "said he has high expectations for both the upcoming midterm elections and the 110th Congress itself. He also expressed optimism about working with the man all but certain to be the next Senate Republican leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.)."

Mann, Ornstein Criticize 109th Congress. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (9/27), Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution and Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute say, "Even those of us with strong stomachs are getting indigestion from the farcical end of the 109th Congress, slated for early Saturday. This Congress hit the ground stumbling and has not lifted itself into an upright position. With few accomplishments and an overloaded agenda, it is set to finish its tenure with the fewest number of days in session in our lifetimes, falling well below 100 days this year." This "part-time Congress has other parallels to the famous 'Do-Nothing 80th Congress' that Harry Truman ran against successfully in 1948. The output of the 109th is pathetic measured against its predecessors and considering its priorities, which included a comprehensive immigration bill, tax reform and the research and development tax credit, lobbying and ethics reform, healthcare costs and insurance coverage, trade agreements, procedures for the detention and trial of suspected terrorists, and regulations for the oversight of domestic wiretaps, among many others. With just days to go before Congress adjourns and the fiscal year begins, not a single one of the 11 appropriations bills that make up the range of government programs has been enacted into law." But the "big problem with this Congress is not what it didn't do, it is what it did, and did badly. As of Tuesday, there were three must-pass pieces of legislation pending: defense and homeland security appropriations and the annual Department of Defense authorization."

Bush Signs Bill Creating Online Database Of Federal Spending. USA Today (9/27, 2.27M) says "President Bush yesterday "signed legislation to create an online database for tracking about $1 trillion in government spending on grants and contracts. The law is intended to prevent wasteful spending by opening the federal budget to greater scrutiny." The AP (9/27, Pickler) reports Bush said in his signing statement, "Information on earmarks will no longer be hidden deep in the pages of a federal budget bill, but just a few clicks away. … This legislation will give the American people a new tool to hold their government accountable for spending decisions. When those decisions are made in broad daylight, they will be wiser and they will be more restrained."

DOJ_NMG_0069682

The Washington Times (9/27, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Written by Sens. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, and Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, the legislation creates a database available to the public through a Web site. It will list every entity receiving federal funds, along with information about the amount and purpose of the spending." Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the White House Office of Management and Budget, "said the information already exists, but now the administration must collect and compile it into a consistent format."

Johanns Says Bush Administration Wants Say In Next Farm Bill. The Dow Jones Newswire (9/27) reports Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns Tuesday said the Bush Administration wants to "have an impact" on how the next farm bill is written in 2007. While acknowledging that Congress will write the next farm bill, Johanns "stressed that it'll be President George W. Bush who either approves or vetoes it." The USDA will publish its proposal for the next farm bill in January, and Johanns told a farm group luncheon that "first on his list" is the "fair" distribution of farm subsidies and the reform of "inequities" in the system. Johanns said US farm policy needs to be "beyond challenge" by member countries of the World Trade Organization. However, Dow Jones says the Bush administration's positions have placed it at odds with some of the largest farm organizations. Farm Bureau President Bob Stallman said, "For the short term, and until we get a WTO negotiation…we ought to forgo major changes to our farm policy."

Spellings Outlines Higher Education Reforms. U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings received widespread coverage for her National Press Club address on a report by the Commission on the Future of Higher Education. Coverage focused on proposals for increasing the Pell Grant, establishing a student database and testing at colleges. The AP (9/27, Feller) reports, "Handed a plan to shake up college life in America, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings is endorsing some of its key ideas and promising to get moving on them. Her overarching theme is to make everything about college -- choosing one, affording one, succeeding in one -- easier for families."

McClatchy (9/27, Douglas) says the Bush administration is "looking to extend its education policies into America's colleges and universities." But "some higher-education officials fear" the plans "will lead to standardized testing at the collegiate level and trample on students' privacy." The proposals would "extend to colleges the principles from President Bush's No Child Left Behind program." And "even before Spellings spoke, several higher-education officials had blasted the proposals, saying they menace student privacy, potentially offer a one-size-fits-all approach to testing and don't sufficiently address student financial aid."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Chaker, 2.03M) reports the proposals would "impose tighter standards on colleges and universities" while trying to make "the college process simpler for families" and "colleges more accountable for the services they provide. That causes some in the higher-education community to bristle." The proposals are "prompting questions about the scope of a federal department's authority" and "may prompt conflict with Congress."

The New York Times (9/27, Dillon, 1.21M) reports Spellings "hoped to jolt American higher education out of a dangerous complacency." Spellings called the proposals "the beginning of a process of long-overdue reform." But "many educators opposed the testing proposal, calling it misguided."

The Washington Post (9/27, A8, Romano, 748K) reports Spellings "called yesterday for greater fiscal and academic accountability in higher education and endorsed a controversial plan to keep long-term records on students that would track performance from the time they enter the system in grade school to show how their educations progress." Yet Spellings "largely sidestepped the commission's bold proposal for a substantial increase in need-based Pell Grants."

USA Today (9/27, Marklein, 2.27M) reports Spellings "called Tuesday for greater accountability by colleges and universities, including the creation of a national database to track how well students learn." The proposed "database has been among the commission's most controversial proposals, mostly because of concerns about student privacy."

Bloomberg (9/27, Basken) reports Spellings "called on the nation's 3,700 colleges to cut costs while doing a better job of proving how well they teach." She "also promised to ask Congress for more aid for low-income students, without endorsing the panel's specific suggestion of a 50 percent increase." Colleges "have resisted the idea of standardized tests, saying school provides an experience too diverse to be measured by any uniform means."

Swagel Nominated To Be Assistant Treasury Secretary. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) reports, "The White House nominated Phillip Swagel, an economist at the American Enterprise Institute, to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for economic policy." Swagel, "a former chief of staff at the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, was tapped as part of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's personnel makeover. … If confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Swagel would succeed Mark Warshawsky, who left Treasury this year to join consulting firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide."

DOJ_NMG_0069683

GAO Criticizes DOD Travel Booking System. The Washington Post (9/27, Williamson, 748K) reports, "After a decade and more than $500 million in costs, the Defense Department's new travel booking system doesn't work, it doesn't save money, and most staff members don't use it," according to the GAO. The GAO said "that defense officials offered a credit card company news release as sole proof for its claim that the system saves millions of dollars each year." Senator Tom Coburn complained of "very effective lobbying by the contractor," Northrop Grumman. Senator Norm Coleman is also quoted complaining of "unconscionable waste," while Undersecretary David S. C. Chu "strongly objected to criticism of the Pentagon's estimates of personnel cost savings

Cheney's Helicopter Left Sitting On Tarmac As Bush's Takes Off First. The Washington Post (9/27, A25, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that there may now be a new rule for Washington Residents "Never get in the way of President Bush heading for his soft down pillow. Seems Vice President Cheney , in Grand Rapids, Mich., on Monday, landed at Andrews Air Force Base at 8:10 p.m. -- a full two minutes before Air Force One touched down. But being president means never having to wait your turn. So Bush bounded down the steps, our colleague Peter Baker reports, and onto his chopper before Cheney's entourage even realized what was happening. Marine One quickly powered up, forcing Marine Two to sit on the tarmac until the top bird lifted off."

Website Publishing Congressional Aide Salary Information. The Washington Post (9/27, A25, Goldfarb, 748K) reports a Website "documenting the salaries of the roughly 20,000 Capitol Hill employees went live last week -- and almost as soon came crashing down." By law, "the salaries of Hill staffers have long been available in thick books in the offices of the House and Senate clerks. The site came down because of the rush of traffic from computers housed in Congress -- and elsewhere." It was "a sign of the intense interest percolating on Capitol Hill and political blogs about the just-launched LegiStorm (http://www.legistorm.com). The site quickly went back online, offering a window for Hill staff and strangers alike into what everyone -- from senior senators' chiefs of staff to the House barber -- earns per year." The LegiStorm data "show that slightly more than 200 Senate staffers earn $150,000 per year. Close to 300 House staffers make that amount, many of them on the House Appropriations Committee. Most employees seem to make about $50,000 to $60,000 per year. Many paid interns -- which Hill aides often start their careers as -- take home barely $200 per month."

O'Connor Criticizes Atmosphere Of Judicial Intimidation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (9/27), former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor sys, "In November, South Dakotans will vote on a state constitutional amendment being advocated by a national group called 'JAIL 4 Judges.' If the amendment passes, it would eliminate judicial immunity, and enable a special grand jury to censure judges for their official legal determinations." Although the amendment's supporters "claim they seek a 'judicial accountability initiative law' (JAIL), they aspire to something far more sinister -- judicial intimidation. Indeed, the national Web site of JAIL 4 Judges boasts with striking candor that the organization 'has that intimidation factor flowing through the judicial system.'" While it is "tempting to dismiss this proposed amendment as merely an isolated bout of anti-judge angst," it is "far from alone in expressing skepticism of the judiciary. In addition to South Dakota, this election cycle has witnessed efforts in at least three other states that are designed to rein in judges who have supposedly 'run amok.'" Congress has "also has engaged in recent efforts to police the judiciary." But "all of society has a keen interest in countering threats to judicial independence. Judges who are afraid -- whether they fear for their jobs or fear for their lives -- cannot adequately fulfill the considerable responsibilities that the position demands."

Congress Urged To Pass Bill Aiding Disadvantaged Youth. In a Washington Times op-ed (9/27), Karen Burke Morison, former staff director for the White House Task Force for Disadvantaged Youth, says, "Congress has an opportunity to fix some costly problems that affect the hundreds of federal programs that target disadvantaged youth, by passing the Federal Youth Coordination Act. These problems were aptly identified by the White House Task Force for Disadvantaged Youth, a group created by President Bush in late 2002." The task force "reported that there were more than 300 such programs scattered throughout 12 agencies. They also found the total spending for these programs was significant ($223.5 billion in fiscal 2003), about one-tenth of the federal budget." Coordination should "be mandatory with children's programs, because it's about what services an agency offers as well as who receives them." The Federal Youth Coordination Act (H.R. 856/S. 409) "was passed by the House in late 2005 with a strong bipartisan majority. But the bill, which recently received the endorsement of the American Bar Association, has been stalled in the Senate. There is no good reason not to pass this bill, which could put some sanity into the process."

DOJ_NMG_0069684

OTHER NEWS:

Consumer Confidence Up. The Financial Times (9/27, Pimlott) reports, "US consumer confidence recovered from August's nine-month low to post a stronger than expected gain this month as prices at petrol pumps fell sharply." The consumer confidence index "rose to 104.5, up from 100.2 in August. September's data came in above economists' expectations, according to Bloomberg, that this month's figure would stand at 103. Consumers told researchers that there were more jobs available and that they expected to earn more in the coming months."

The Wall Street Journal (9/27, McAuley, 2.03M) reports, "Consumer expectations for the state of economic activity over the next six months increased to 89.0 from 84.4 in August." The Conference Board "noted in the report that respondents who assess economic conditions as 'good' increased to 27.4% in September from 26.2%, while those who termed current conditions as 'bad' slipped to 15.4% from the 16.6% who held that view in August."

USA Today (9/27, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) says that though consumer confidence "rebounded from a nine-month low in September," it is "still hovering near one of the lowest levels of the year, according to Tuesday reports indicating moderate economic growth."

World Economic Forum Ranks US As Sixth-Most Competitive Economy. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Walker, 2.03M) reports, "The US's huge budget deficit threatens to make the country's economy less competitive, according to a study by the World Economic Forum, an institute in Switzerland. The institute's annual study of global competitiveness says the US economy is the sixth most-competitive in the world, slipping from first place in last year's ranking, a result of mediocre scores for its public finances." Switzerland "ranks No. 1 in this year's survey, thanks to what the forum sees as a combination of efficient public administration and flexible markets. Three Nordic countries -- Finland, Sweden and Denmark -- come next, followed by Singapore and the US."

Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (9/27, D1, 748K), "The predictable response from the business community will be to use these studies to warn of impending economic ruin unless the government adopts the Republican agenda of less regulation, lower taxes, tort reform, and relieving companies of health-care and pension costs. Don't be fooled. These reports speak to the embarrassing failure of a decade of Republican rule in improving US competitiveness." Business taxes, "as a percentage of anything you want to measure, are at their lowest level in decades. The Bush White House has subjected new regulations to rigorous cost-benefit analysis. Several reforms make it less attractive for shareholders, workers and consumers to file frivolous lawsuits, but not necessarily for businesses. And in case you hadn't noticed, businesses have already made tremendous strides in shifting health-care and pension costs to workers."

Stocks Up; Dow At Second-Highest Closing Ever. ABC World News (9/26, story 5, 0:10, Gibson) reported, "Wall Street's powerful September rally kept going today, pushing the Dow Jones Industrial Average to their second-highest close ever. The Dow pushed up 93 points to 11,669. That's just 54 points below its all-time high. Rising consumer confidence also held the NASDAQ, which gained 12 points." The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Browning, 2.03M) says "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index finished at a 5½-year high of 1336.34, up 0.8%, or 9.97 points. It is up 7.1% this year and 5.2% so far this quarter."

NBC Nightly News (9/26, story 4, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) showed Maria Bartiromo of CNBC saying, "There really is a growing sense of optimism among investors. It has so much to do with the price of oil. Had you look at gasoline it is way down from the more than $3 a gallon we saw just a couple of months ago across the country. Oil prices, crude oil, close to $80 a barrel just a few months ago. Now they're down at $61 a barrel. I think people are looking at that drop-off in oil and thinking, well, this economy is growing. It is not too hot but it is growing and going into the last quarter of the year where we have the important holiday shopping season, people do have the ability to spend money because they don't have that pressure from the price of oil and that will certainly bode well for corporate profits. That was really behind it."

Hillary Clinton Defends Husband's Fox Interview Performance. ABC World News (9/26, story 2, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "The battle over terrorism and national security has also become a political scrap between the Clintons, both Mr. and Mrs., and the Bush Administration, over who deserves more blame for not preventing the 9/11 attacks. In recent days, the words have become more bitter, more personal." ABC (Tapper) added, "Republicans have won the last two elections on national security issues. The question is, can Democrats fighting back so aggressively break that streak? Or does it just bring attention to what's been a losing issue for them?"

NBC Nightly News (9/26, story 2, 3:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's not as if we can bring anyone back who was lost on 9/11, but suddenly, both sides are debating over which president did what to try to kill or capture Osama bin Laden and head off the al Qaeda threat. Today Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York praised heir husband's performance in that combative TV interview over the weekend, defending his record on terrorism and pursuing Osama bin Laden. Then she took her own swing at the Bush Administration."

DOJ_NMG_0069685

The AP (9/26, Humbert) reports ex-President Clinton's "angry response to questions about Osama bin Laden has partisans of every persuasion certain it will energize voters in the elections and affect a possible presidential bid by his wife." Conservatives "immediately labeled the interview a prime example of the soap opera that would run daily should another Democrat -- say, for example, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton -- win the White House." But Democrats "argued the former president's feisty dressing-down of Fox News' Chris Wallace is just the wake-up call the party's liberal base needed six weeks before the election, a pointed criticism of the Bush administration's bungled search for bin Laden. Either way, don't expect the furor to subside any time soon."

The AP (9/26) reports Sen. Clinton "hit back at Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday as the political fighting escalated over which president -- Bill Clinton or George W. Bush -- missed more opportunities to prevent the Sept. 11 attacks." Sen. Clinton said, "I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks. I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled 'Bin Laden Determined To Attack Inside the United States' he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team." CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Blitzer) reported Sen. Clinton "is praising her husband's performance in that feisty television interview."

The New York Times (9/27, Hernandez, 1.21M) says the "war of words between the Bush administration and the Clintons intensified on Tuesday" as Sen. Clinton "suggested that her husband would have reacted differently as president if he had heard the same warnings." In "unusually blunt terms," she "questioned the current administration's response" to the Bin Laden Attack intelligence briefing, and "ratcheted up an already bitter exchange of charges between the Bush and Clinton camps over how the two administrations responded to the threat posed by Al Qaeda before the attacks." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/27, A12, Baker, 748K) reports Bush "complained yesterday that Clinton was engaging in 'finger-pointing' by attacking the current administration's actions before the hijackings. 'I don't have enough time to finger-point,' Bush said."

More Commentary. In her New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Hillary is morphing from workhorse back to show horse, paving the way for her historic presidential race with a series of big policy speeches. And she is taking on the other dynasty more energetically" with her defense of her husband.

In a Wall Street Journal (9/27, A18, 2.03M) op-ed, Richard Minister of the Hudson Institute writes, "Bill Clinton's outburst on Fox News was something of a public service, launching a debate about the antiterror policies of his administration. This is important because every George W. Bush policy that arouses the ire of Democrats -- the Patriot Act, extraordinary rendition, detention without trial, pre-emptive war -- is a departure from his predecessor. Where policies overlap -- air attacks on infrastructure, secret presidential orders to kill terrorists, intelligence sharing with allies, freezing bank accounts, using police to arrest terror suspects -- there is little friction. The question, then, is whether America should return to Mr. Clinton's policies or soldier on with Mr. Bush's. … While it is easy to look back in hindsight and blame Bill Clinton, the full scale and nature of the terrorist threat was not widely appreciated until 9/11. Still: Bill Clinton did not fully grasp that he was at war. Nor did he intuit that war requires overcoming bureaucratic objections and a democracy's natural reluctance to use force. That is a hard lesson. But it is better to learn it from studying the Clinton years than reliving them."

Midterm Election Ads Seen As "Most Toxic" In Memory. The New York Times (9/27, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports Republicans and Democrats "began showing at least 30 new campaign advertisements in contested House and Senate districts across the country on Tuesday. Of those, three were positive." For Republicans, "it was the leading edge of a wave of negative advertisements against Democratic candidates, the product of more than a year of research into the personal and professional backgrounds of Democratic challengers." For Democrats, it "was part of a barrage intended to tie Republican incumbents to an unpopular Congress, criticize their voting records, portray them as captives to special interests and highlight embarrassing moments from their business histories." The "result of the dueling accusations has been what both sides described on Tuesday as the most toxic midterm campaign environment in memory." Democratic and Republican strategists "said they expected over 90 percent of the advertisements to be broadcast by Nov. 7 to be negative."

Some Conservatives Prefer Democratic Congressional Majority. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A4, Dreazen, 2.03M) reports a "small but vocal band of conservative iconoclasts say they would prefer to see their own party lose" control of Congress in the midterm elections. The "array of former members of Congress and officials from Republican administrations dating to the 1970s are using opinion articles, speeches and interviews to make the surprising -- and, to many of their friends and colleagues, near-heretical -- argument that it would be better for the country if their party lost." The Republican "rebels say the modern Republican Party has so abandoned its conservative beliefs that it deserves to be defeated by the Democrats." The WSJ identifies "three factors" that "are driving the conservative backlash." Fiscal hawks "are furious about the growth of the federal government. Conservative lawyers such as Bruce Fein, who worked in the Nixon Justice Department and Reagan Federal Communications Commission, are upset that Congress allowed President Bush to claim expansive powers to eavesdrop on American citizens and detain suspected militants without trial. Others say the war in Iraq is a costly diversion from the war on terror." Other Republicans "couch their desire for Republican losses in political terms, arguing that Democratic control of Congress for at least two years would increase the chances of Republicans retaining the presidency in 2008."

DOJ_NMG_0069686

Marriage "Gap" Could Play Role In House Elections. USA Today (9/27, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports a USA TODAY analysis of 2005 Census data shows "House districts held by Republicans are full of married people. Democratic districts are stacked with people who have never married. This 'marriage gap' could play a role in the Nov. 7 congressional elections." Twenty-seven "of the 38 Republican-held districts with seats considered vulnerable by independent political analysts have fewer married people than found in the average GOP district." The USA TODAY analysis also shows that Republicans "control 49 of the 50 districts with the highest rates of married people." Democrats "represent all 50 districts that have the highest rates of adults who have never married." The "political tug-of-war is between people who are married and those who have never been. The 'never married' group covers a variety of groups who form the Democratic base: young people, those who marry late in life, single parents, gays, and heterosexuals who live together."

USA Today (9/27, Cauchon, 2.27M) also runs an extended analysis of the "marriage gap" phenomenon, noting GOP Congress members "represent 39.2 million children younger than 18, about 7 million more than Democrats. Republicans average 7,000 more children per district." Democratic districts "that have large numbers of children tend to be predominantly Hispanic or, to a lesser extent, African-American. This 'fertility gap' is crucial to understanding the differences between liberals and conservatives, says Arthur Brooks, a professor of public administration at Syracuse University. These childbearing patterns shape divisions over issues such as welfare, education and child tax credits, he says." Brooks says, "Republicans are congenial to traditional families, which is clearly the best way for kids to grow up. But there are some kids who don't have that advantage, and Democrats are very concerned with helping those kids."

Cheney Attends His 100th Fundraiser Of Midterm Cycle. CNN's The Situation Room (9/26, Roberts) reported, "The Vice President hit a milestone this week, his 100th fund-raiser of the midterm election cycle -- not far behind, President Bush, with just under 70 now. In total, Republican candidates and campaign committees have so far raised more than $870 million."

Democrats Seek Lobbyist Contributions. The Hill (9/27, Bolton) reports House Democrats "are making an intense final push to raise inside-the-Beltway money before Congress adjourns, collecting most of it from the lobbying industry they have distanced themselves from this election cycle." Lobbyists "representing corporate clients are an important source of political contributions — funding that is vital to their chances of capturing the chamber. At the same time, Democrats have spent a lot of time and effort asserting that Republican rule has created a 'Culture of Corruption' because of close ties between the GOP and certain special interests." The "dynamic has created awkwardness for some Democrats." Democratic leaders "asked their entire caucus to come into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) headquarters" on Tuesday and Thursday "to make fundraising calls." On Tuesday night, "the DCCC held a fundraiser at Bistro Bis, a high-end restaurant a short walk from the Capitol, featuring lawmakers poised to take over as the chairmen of House committees." Apart from "the event held by the party fundraising committee, the Democratic ranking members of committees and subcommittees have been raised money aggressively. Several senior Democrats have held multiple fundraisers since Labor Day, collecting money for their party and Democratic candidates but also giving lobbyists and representatives of the business community opportunities to renew old acquaintances or forge new ones."

Challenger Seeks Investigation Of Murtha's Links To Lobbying Firms. Roll Call (9/27, Bresnahan) reports the Republican challenger "to Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) has asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Murtha traded appropriations earmarks for hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from the clients of lobbying firms with close ties to the veteran lawmaker, including one where his brother works." Washington County Commissioner Diana Irey, "Murtha's GOP opponent, delivered a letter to Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania, requesting that Justice begin a probe of Murtha immediately." A Murtha spokesman "denied Irey's accusations, calling it a political stunt by a long-shot challenger." Roll Call adds the "allegations about Murtha's relationship with the PMA Group and KSA Consulting — a lobbying firm that employs Murtha's brother, Kit Murtha, as well as a former aide — were first reported by the Los Angeles Times in June 2005." Since then, "some House Republicans have called publicly for an ethics probe of Murtha, although no GOP lawmakers have stepped forward to officially file a complaint against him.

DOJ_NMG_0069687

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington recently included Murtha on a list of the most corrupt Members of Congress."

Third Acquaintance Claims Allen Used Racist Slur. The New York Times (9/27, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports, "Another acquaintance of Senator George Allen," Ellen G. Hawkins, said "she heard him use a racial slur in 1976, contradicting a statement he made Monday in an effort to tamp down similar accusations." Allen campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, "called the account by" Hawkins "another false accusation." Hawkins, who "described herself as a rural Virginia housewife and an active Democrat, said in an interview Tuesday that she heard Mr. Allen use the slur repeatedly at a party on election night in 1976." She said Allen "used the term while deprecating the intelligence of the black players on the Washington Redskins football team, which Mr. Allen's father coached. Recalling remarks about its star running back, Larry Brown, Mrs. Hawkins said that Mr. Allen 'started in effect bad-mouthing him, saying what a shiftless you-know-what' he was." She said "she remembered the conversation because she was a big fan of the team and was shocked. She said Mr. Allen's statement on Monday was 'just plain a lie.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (9/25, Blitzer) reported, "For the third time in recent weeks," Allen "is getting a crash course in damage control. The embattled Virginia Republican is vehemently denying that he has used racial slurs against blacks or that he's a racist. But today the allegations persist." CNN (Franken) added the "poisonous drum beat has transformed what was supposed to be an easy reelection for Allen. One of his top campaign officials tells CNN this race is competitive now. At their behest, other teammates have stepped forward to vigorously deny Allen was ever racist."

MSNBC's Hardball (9/26, Shuster) reported that Allen "is now facing a political death by a thousand cuts. The latest came today in the New York Times and Washington Post. On the heels of a story first written by Salon.com, the papers reported that three former classmates of Allen at the University of Virginia say he used the N-word to refer to blacks in the early 1970s. Allen denies the charge," but "noted political scientist, Larry Sabato, who went to college with Allen, said Allen's accusers are telling the truth."

Webb Campaign Said To Be Surging. MSNBC's Hardball (9/26, Shuster) reported that "the campaign of Democratic challenger Jim Webb is surging, raising more than $1 million last month alone. Webb has had his own challenges but he seems to be handling them far better than Allen. When Webb was asked about an article he wrote 27 years ago calling for women to be kept out of the service academies, Webb took responsibility immediately and apologized."

Webb Declines To Say If He Used Racist Slur. The AP (9/27, Espo) reports Democrat Jim Webb "declined to say definitively Tuesday whether he had ever used a common derogatory term to describe blacks, stepping carefully after watching his campaign rival confront charges of racism." Webb said, "I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time or another in their life." The AP adds Webb "referred to his novel, 'Fields of Fire,' which aides said includes occurrences of the n-word as part of character dialogue. But he added: 'I have never issued a racial or ethnic slur.'" Asked for "clarification of his original answer, spokeswoman Jessica Smith quoted Webb as saying, 'I have never used that word in my general vocabulary or in any derogatory way.'"

Virginia Republicans Want Allen To Focus On Accomplishments. The Washington Times (9/27, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Virginia Republicans say Allen's "floundering campaign" should "concentrate more on his accomplishments than on attacking his opponent or responding to charges of ethnic insensitivity." House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith said, "He really rewrote Virginia history with welfare reform, education reform, the abolition of parole -- those are three big items."

Steele Quickly Responds To First Negative DSCC Ad. The Washington Times (9/27, Ward, 88K) reports, "National Democrats yesterday ran their first TV ad against Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's U.S. Senate bid, prompting an immediate response ad from Mr. Steele." The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) ad "says Mr. Steele 'likes puppies, but he loves President Bush,' showing a picture of Mr. Steele and Mr. Bush in a heart-shaped frame." Steele "responded by releasing an ad that criticizes his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, for taking money from drug companies and voting against the importation of prescription drugs from Canada." The DSCC's "mention of puppies refers to an ad Mr. Steele released earlier this month warning of negative campaign ads from 'the Washington crowd.' Saying that he will be accused of 'hating puppies,' Mr. Steele says, 'For the record, I love puppies,' in the ad."

The Washington Post (9/27, B5, Marimow, 748K) reports Democrats "began airing an ad that called such puppy talk a diversion from Steele's relationship with President Bush and his position on issues such as abortion and stem cell research. Steele, and the growling puppy, were on the air hours later, decrying the Democratic spot as the work of Washington insiders, particularly his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D)." The DSCC ad "is a direct jab at Steele's much-talked-about spot that cast the lieutenant governor as a different kind of politician. In that ad, Steele, looking more like a talk show host than a politician, warns viewers of forthcoming negative ads." Steele's "quick retort yesterday labels the Democratic spots as 'nasty ads from the Washington crowd.' He brings back the puppy, which growls in agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0069688

Chafee Criticized For Supporting GOP Leaders. In his Washington Post column (9/27, A27), Harold Meyerson says Sen. Lincoln Chafee "is seeking reelection in his heavily Democratic state by insisting he's not really a Republican, or at least not part of the gang responsible for the decade's debacles." But "big deal. It matters not a damn whom Lincoln Chafee chose to support for president." The election "in which his vote did matter was that for majority leader of the Senate. There, he was one of just 100 electors, in a Senate nearly evenly divided. After this November's elections, control of the Senate may well hang by a single vote. And if Chafee truly wished to alter the course of his party and his country in the spirit of his vote for Poppy Bush, he would, if reelected, cast his vote for majority leader when the new Senate convenes for Bob Dole or Howard Baker -- former Republican leaders who showed a decent respect for reality and an interest in doing the nation's business. Rather than support an administration lapdog such as Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, the Republican whip, whom his party will probably put forth to run the Senate next January, Chafee would vote for some old-school GOP pol." Meyerson continues to criticize "moderate" Republicans such as Olympia Snowe and Mike DeWine, who also would probably vote for McConnell in the leadership elections.

RNC Devoting One-Third Of Fall Ad Budget To Three Senate Races. Roll Call (9/27, Kane) reports the Republican National Committee "already has devoted close to a third of its advertising budget this fall to just three critical Senate races, with all indications that the committee hopes to build a firewall around those states to ensure the chamber's GOP majority." The RNC is "focusing its nearly $30 million advertising war chest on the battleground Senate races in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, according to Federal Election Commission records and interviews with a handful of top Republican operatives." While aides "warned that the state of play could change in the final six weeks of the campaign, several GOP strategists said that the current plan was for the RNC to continue focusing its television campaign on those three states." FEC records "bear out that plan so far, with the RNC showering more than $3.8 million in independent expenditures in those states in recent weeks — $2.8 million of that aimed at Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who is trying to unseat Sen. Mike DeWine (R)." Democratic sources "involved in media purchases" also said "the RNC also has reserved another $4.7 million worth of ads in Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee, devoting more than $8.5 million worth of independent expenditures reserved for just those states so far."

NRCC Wades Into MN6 To Bash Wetterling. Roll Call (9/27, Duran) reports Republicans "believe Minnesota's 6th Congressional district is solid GOP turf, but given the unfavorable political climate they have endured this cycle, they are not taking it for granted." The National Republican Congressional Committee "paid more than $310,000 to begin running ads Monday in the suburban and exurban Twin Cities district to bash Democratic nominee Patty Wetterling." Wetterling, who "gained national prominence as a child safety advocate after her son was kidnapped in 1989, lost to Rep. Mark Kennedy (R) 54 percent to 46 percent in 2004." Despite the "drubbing Kennedy gave Wetterling and Republicans' public confidence in their nominee to replace him, state Sen. Michele Bachmann, the NRCC has spent almost $500,000 on ads and direct-mail pieces hammering Wetterling since mid-August." The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee "has yet to run independent ads or drop mail pieces in the district." EMILY's List, the "pro-abortion rights political action committee backing Wetterling, is releasing a survey it commissioned on the race today, presumably finding Wetterling hot on Bachmann's heels if not leading."

Padgett Gets Welcome Boost From First Lady In OH18. The Washington Post (9/27, A3, VandeHei, Cillizza, 748K) reports that in Ohio's 18th CD, Republican Joy Padgett, who is running to replace convicted Rep. Bob Ney, "has been in a jam when it comes to finding a big-name Republican who could come to town and bring more than trouble." This "helps explains Padgett's excitement Tuesday as her lunchtime guest of honor took to the podium outside the historic Granville Inn. It was first lady Laura Bush. The president's approval ratings may be in the drain, but the first lady still regularly scores in the high sixties." Democrats are "pressing the scandal issue relentlessly, and it appears to be working with some voters." In a year "when Republicans are battling low poll numbers nationally, there are few places where the GOP brand is more scuffed than in Ohio, where, since President Bush's election-night triumph here two years ago, national and local scandals have polluted the political atmosphere for GOP candidates."

Ohio Hosts Key House, Senate Races. Time.com (9/27, Bacon) reports Gov. Bob Taft's low approval ratings and Rep. Bob Ney's guilty plea in the Abramoff scandal are "not all the problems for the G.O.P. in Ohio." Peter Brown, who surveys Ohio races for the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute, said, "You've got a national anti-Republican, anti-incumbent sentiment that wasn't there two years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0069689

Voters "aren't happy about the economy, Iraq or President Bush here either." Time adds Democratic chances "of winning key races here are so high that top officials are trying to guard against activists getting complacent." And Democrats "remain worried that the G.O.P. will outperform them at getting voters to the polls, much as the Republican turnout operation helped defy the oddsmakers in 2004. Both Democrats and Republicans say a ballot initiative to allow slot machine casino gambling in the state may help to turn out conservatives who would oppose it, although liberals may show up to support a proposed minimum wage increase also on the ballot." The Ohio races "are critical. Democrats need 15 seats to win back the House, and three of their best chances are in Ohio. In the Senate, where they need six seats, this is a place where they could win one." In the 15th CD, Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce faces Democrat Mary Joe Kilroy. If Kilroy, "a Franklin County Commissioner, wins this race, it would be the biggest individual victory for the House Democrats on election night, because Pryce, as the chairman of the House Republicans, is the No. 4 member of the leadership team." In the 1st CD, Republican Rep. Steve Chabot faces Democrat John Cranley, who is "trying to keep voters focused on the problems at hand, running ads blaming Chabot for high gas prices and linking his opponent with voters' frustrations on other issues such as the increasing national debt."

Hospital Officials Defend Salary Increase For Obama's Wife. The Chicago Tribune (9/27, Dorning, 623K) reports officials "at the University of Chicago Hospitals on Tuesday explained a large salary jump for Sen. Barack Obama's wife shortly after he took office as a normal promotion that reflected expanded duties in her job as a liaison with the South Side community surrounding the medical center." Michelle Obama "was promoted to vice president for external affairs in March 2005, two months after her husband took office in the Senate. According to a tax return released by the senator this week, the promotion nearly tripled her income from the hospitals from $121,910 in 2004 to $316,962 in 2005." Hospitals spokesman John Easton "said Obama's salary was in line with the compensation received by the not-for-profit medical center's 16 other vice presidents." Easton said "the hospitals' management had discussed a promotion to vice president with Obama previously but that she had been reluctant to undertake the commitment until her husband's Senate campaign was finished. In part, she wanted to wait until her family had made a decision on whether to maintain their primary residence in Illinois, which they did, and she had a better sense of the demands on her time as a senator's wife, he said."

Democrats Propose Reimbursing States For Backup Paper Ballots. The New York Times (9/27, Urbina, 1.21M) reports three Senate Democrats "proposed emergency legislation on Tuesday to reimburse states for printing paper ballots in case of problems with electronic voting machines on Nov. 7." The proposal "is a response to grass-roots pressures and growing concern by local and state officials about touch-screen machines. An estimated 40 percent of voters will use those machines in the election." Sen. Barbra Boxer, who is co-sponsoring the measure with Sens. Christopher Dodd and Russell Feingold, said, "If someone asks for a paper ballot, they ought to be able to have it." The Times adds Republican leadership aides were skeptical about the prospects for the measure. It would have to advance without opposition from any senator and then make it through the House in the short time available before Election Day."

Ensign To Chair NRSC. Roll Call (9/27, Bresnahan, Billings) reports Sen. John Ensign "will take the helm of the National Republican Senatorial Committee at the start of the 110th Congress, putting the Nevada Republican on the front line of what is certain to be a difficult election cycle for the GOP." Republican leaders "have been scrambling for nearly two months to recruit the next NRSC chairman after Sen. John Thune (S.D.), who was expected to assume the post, opted against a bid. Thune shocked the GOP Conference in early August when he announced he wasn't interested in the position, citing the travel burden and family commitments." Ensign, "who also declined the NRSC post when initially approached by party leaders, said he changed his mind after consulting with friends, colleagues, and his wife, Darlene." Twenty-one Republican Senators "are up for re-election in 2008, versus just 12 Democrats. When combined with the certain competition for donor dollars from a presidential campaign and a renewed battle for the House, the NRSC's ability to raise money and elect its candidates will be tested severely."

Richardson Hints At 2008 Campaign. McClatchy (9/27, Thomma) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "insists that he's focused only on helping Democrats win elections this year and won't decide until next year whether to run for president. But over scrambled eggs and sausage Tuesday morning, he gave reporters a preview of the distinctive campaign he'd run - and how much he'd differ from likely rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York." Richardson "boasts a decidedly different resume. He's arguably more candid. And he's definitely funnier." In his remarks, Richardson "ticked off the changes in the Democratic presidential primary calendar and how Western states could play a bigger role in picking the 2008 nominee - states that happen to be in his backyard." Asked if he was "already mapping his campaign? 'I'm just kind of observing how it happens,' he said, his smile giving way to a knowing laugh." Richardson "came to Washington to talk about his work as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association and the prospects for this year's 36 gubernatorial elections," and he himself is "coasting toward re-election to a second term." Richardson "acknowledged that, if the election were held today, Democrats would pick up governors' offices in states such as Colorado, Massachusetts, New York and Ohio, but fall short in such states as California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Minnesota, South Carolina and Texas."

DOJ_NMG_0069690

The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Cook, 58K) reports that at the Monitor breakfast, Richardson "talked up his party's prospects in the 36 statehouse races that will be decided this November." Richardson said, "I believe we will win the House of Representatives, the Senate probably [is] a little more difficult. I can honestly say I believe we will win a majority of governorships this year.... We will win in New York. We will win in Massachusetts. We will win in Colorado. We will win in Ohio. We will win in Arkansas. We have some very competitive toss ups in Nevada [and] Florida. We will win in Maryland. I would put Maryland in the 'feel confident' [category]." The Monitor adds Richardson was "also in Washington as someone pondering a move from the state house to the White House. The governor told reporters at the breakfast that he 'will make a decision early next year' on whether to run for president. But he is already clearly preparing for a presidential run."

Bass Aide Resigns After Posing As Liberal Blogger. Roll Call (9/27, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "A top aide to Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) was forced to resign Tuesday for using Congressional office computers to pose as a liberal on political blogs, in an apparent attempt to undermine Bass' Democratic challenger. Bass asked longtime aide Tad Furtado to resign after HOH revealed Monday that the operators of two liberal blogs in New Hampshire had traced the suspicious poster's Internet protocol address to the House of Representatives' computer server." House ethics rules prohibit employees from using government resources to engage in campaign activity. Furtado "posted blog comments under the pseudonym 'IndyNH' and 'IndieNH.' He pretended to be a liberal who didn't think Bass' opponent, Paul Hodes, could win."

Iraq War Protesters Arrested At Hart Senate Building. The Washington Post (9/27, A14, Boorstein, 748K) reports, "The quiet, sunny atrium of the Hart Senate Office Building was transformed into a chaotic scene yesterday when dozens of war protesters filed into the lobby, formed a prayer circle, shouted Scripture and eventually were arrested as Senate staffers hung over railings and crammed glass-walled offices to watch." The Post adds, "Employees in the building and longtime area activists said they had never seen police allow such a demonstration in a government office building, with activists one and two stories up reading the names of the Iraq war dead, civilian and military."

Justices To Examine Links Between Credit Ratings, Insurance Rates. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Anderson, 2.03M) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed to decide whether insurance companies must tell consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher rates for coverage." Insurance companies "have faced a wave of class-action lawsuits alleging they violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act by not telling consumers that their low credit scores resulted in higher quotes for insurance coverage."

Surveys Find Health Premiums Rising Twice As Fast As Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, A2, Fuhrmans, 2.03M) reports two nationwide surveys by Kaiser Family Foundation and the Health Research and Educational Trust show that "the health-care premiums of employers and their workers have climbed twice as fast as wages and inflation in 2006 -- to nearly double their cost in 2000 -- and they look to rise at a similar clip next year." That said, "the pace of increase is about half what it was just a few years ago." According to the surveys, "the average family premium rose 7.7% in 2006. That compared with a 3.8% rise in wages and inflation of around 3.5%. Even so, the 7.7% increase marks the third year that employer health-care cost increases have decelerated since soaring nearly 14% in 2003."

USA Today (9/27, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "High-deductible health insurance policies coupled with savings accounts — touted by proponents as an answer to rising medical costs — did not grow in popularity among employers this year, even as premiums for insurance continued to rise. … Despite those policies being the biggest buzz among benefit consultants," the Foundation "found that only 7% of employers offered them this year, a percentage statistically unchanged since 2005." Drew Altman, president of the non-profit research group, noted, "This shows that the debate in the media and in Washington health policy circles is way out in front of the reality."

In addition, the Washington Post (9/27, D2, Day, 748K) quotes Altman as stating, "Nobody's celebrating, and nobody should be celebrating. … A modest reduction in an already high rate of increase hardly looks like salvation to working people and businesses, who have been getting hammered by high health-care costs year after year." The Post adds, "About 61 percent of companies questioned offer health-care coverage to at least some employees, about the same as last year. And workers at bigger companies continued to fare better: The study found that while nearly all companies with 200 or more workers offered coverage, fewer than half of the smallest companies surveyed did, those with from three to nine workers."

DOJ_NMG_0069691

The New York Times (9/27, Freudenheim, 1.21M) notes, "'It's slightly good news,' said Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health, a large employers' research and trade group in Washington. 'It could have been worse but we certainly haven't solved all the problems.'" She added, "The workers of the United States continue to give their pay raises to the health system." Still, "some business leaders took a more upbeat view of the survey results." Katie Mahoney, health policy director of the United States Chamber of Commerce, said, "It's a very positive sign that the increases were lower than the previous year."

"Piggyback Laws" Fail To Address Health Care Crisis. In an editorial, the New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) writes, "Many middle-class young adults are staying on their parents' health insurance long after college these days." So "the troubled American health-insurance system finds itself in a vicious circle as a result. The higher premiums climb (twice as fast as wages this year, according to a new study), the less likely the young and healthy are to participate. That, in turn, skews the pool of the insured even older and more infirm, making coverage still more expensive and less appealing to those who bet they can do without." The "piggyback laws" just make "life easier for those who have the most political influence and resources, reduce elected officials' incentive to do what is really needed and find a more comprehensive national solution."

WSJournal Celebrates Possible South Carolina Move Toward School Choice. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) writes in an editorial, "Fed-up South Carolina Democrats are blowing the whistle on the state's public-school system, one of the nation's worst." But "the good news is that the Palmetto State may be reaching a tipping point." Gov. Mark Sanford (R) "is already a supporter of broad-based school choice. The problem has been the Republican-controlled legislature." But "that is starting to change." In June, "three incumbent state legislators were defeated in primaries for opposing school choice" and "in November reformers could pick up the seats they need in the house to pass education scholarships and tax credits for parents with kids in failing schools."

Russia Will Begin Nuclear Fuel Shipments To Iran In March. The New York Times/AP (9/27) notes Moscow media reports that "Russia will ship fuel to a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran by March under an agreement signed by the two countries on Tuesday." The deal "represents a small victory for Iran, but seems certain to inflame Western anxiety over Iran's nuclear ambitions." It was "signed by Sergei Shmatko, head of Russia's state-run company Atomstroiexport, and Mahmoud Hanatian, vice president of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization. An additional protocol sets out a time frame for starting up an $800 million plant in Bushehr, which will be Iran's first." The AP notes "the fuel could be enriched to create weapons-grade material," and adds, "To try to ease Western concerns over Bushehr, Russia has agreed with Iran that Tehran will ship spent fuel back to Russia."

Iran Denies Reports It's Negotiating Secret Uranium-Enrichment Suspension. The Washington Times (9/27, Gertz, 88K) reports, "Iran yesterday said it is not negotiating a secret temporary shutdown of its uranium-enrichment program as part of ongoing talks with the European Union, rebutting Bush administration sources who told The Washington Times that such a deal is being discussed." Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, when asked about the report in The Times, "said chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani and chief European Union negotiator Javier Solana will discuss what has been proposed already."

Jailed Former Iranian Lawmaker Says He IS Being Tortured. The Washington Post (9/27, A20, Boustany, 748K) reports, "Ali Akbar Mousavi Khoini, a former Iranian lawmaker who has been jailed without charges in Tehran for more than 100 days, was briefly released from detention last Thursday to attend a memorial service, where he shouted out allegations of torture and other harsh treatment, according to his lawyers and other witnesses quoted by a human rights organization." He said, "For the past 20 days, prison officials have chained my hands and feet. I am being tortured. … I am held in solitary confinement and interrogated four times a day. … They wake me up in the middle of the night to interrogate me. They are trying to turn me to a mental patient.." The Post adds, "Calls to the Iranian mission to the United Nations in New York, seeking comment, were not returned."

Rice Eyes Trip To Northeast Asia, Says Pyongyang's Time Running Out. AFP (9/27) reports Secretary Rice "said she would travel to Asia in the next six weeks to see whether to make 'one last push' to convince North Korea to return to multilateral negotiations on ending its nuclear weapons program." She "said in an interview released Monday that time was running out to bring North Korea back to the negotiating table." Rice added that, "in light of North Korea's continued refusal to return to the negotiating table, further action was needed." She "said that in the meantime, Washington would continue its financial measures 'because they do relate to illicit North Korean activities.'" Rice "also sought to counter suggestions of a growing rift between the United States and South Korea over how to approach the crisis, with Seoul seen as favoring more diplomacy rather than threats of sanctions against its volatile neighbor. … She said South Korea had told allies…of efforts it was making to put pressure on the North, including cutting back badly needed food assistance and fertilizer supplies. She said those measures could be intensified and threaten overall North-South economic ties if North Korea goes ahead with the rumored nuclear weapons test."

DOJ_NMG_0069692

IDF Expects To Withdraw From Lebanon Before Sunday. The New York Times (9/27, Erlanger, 1.21M) reports IDF forces "are expected to be out of Lebanon before the Jewish holy day of Yom Kippur begins on Sunday night." Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz "told Parliament that Israel hoped to complete its withdrawal from Lebanon under a United Nations resolution 'during this week or at the latest several days later," while UNIFIL Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini is quoted saying, "It is my belief that with the necessary cooperation by both parties we should see the I.D.F. leave south Lebanon by the end of this month." However, "Israeli officials suggested that some of [related] issues remained unresolved, including how to deal with protests along the border and whether [UNIFIL] would act against Hezbollah if necessary or simply inform the Lebanese Army about violations." The Times notes the IDF "had said it wanted to leave Lebanon by the end of last week, before the Jewish New Year, but delayed, saying [UNIFIL was] not up to strength."

Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact. AFP (9/27) reports President George W. Bush Tuesday signed the US-Oman Free Trade Agreement, the fifth such pact with a Middle Eastern country since he took office. US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said in a statement that the accord was "good news for the United States, Oman, and our efforts to promote economic opportunity in the Middle East." Schwab also touted the agreement as "a milestone in strengthening ties and promoting freedom in the Middle East."

Korean Seen As Leading Candidate To Replace Annan. The Washington Times (9/27, Pisik, 88K) reports, "The race for United Nations secretary-general is moving into its final weeks with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon well in front, but the late entry of Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, who would be the first woman in the post, muddles the odds." Seven declared candidates "are now in the running to succeed Kofi Annan in January, and more could enter. They include a UN official who writes novels, the deputy prime minister of a recently deposed government, an ambassador with a passion for disarmament, a prince with peacekeeping experience, and a former World Bank executive from a shattered nation. All the declared candidates are from Asia -- which under an informal rotation system expects to field the next secretary-general -- except Mrs. Vike-Freiberga, whose candidacy could sink on the geographic considerations despite the fact that several nations would like to see a woman in the post." China "signaled early that it would not accept a candidate from a country outside Asia."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, LaFranchi, 58K), meanwhile, says that "while candidates are already campaigning for the post, no consensus has formed around any one of them -- in part because UN members, in particular on the powerful Security Council, have different views of what is most needed for the job."

Japan To Continue Push For Permanent UNSC Seat. AFP (9/27) reports Tokyo "has vowed to pursue its campaign for reform of the [UNSC] from which it hopes to secure a permanent seat on the key body despite opposition from some of its neighbours." Representative Kenzo Oshima "said the Security Council risked seeing its credibility further damaged if it did not change." Oshima "added that most countries wanted change 'with a sense of urgency' and 'Japan is determined to continue to take the initiative in this critical endeavour.'" AFP says Tokyo, Berlin and Brasilia "have pressed to become permanent members but opposition has come from" Washington and Beijing.

Major newspapers reported extensively on Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's first day in office. The New York Times (9/27, Fackler, 1.21M) says Abe "seeks a Japan with muscle and a voice," adding that he "has vowed to make Japan more assertive globally" and "appointed a cabinet on Tuesday packed with social conservatives and foreign-policy hawks." Abe's "ascension appears to be a changing of the guard in a country that has kept a low profile in international affairs since its defeat in 1945. He enters office riding a crest of popularity, as his message of renewed national pride has found followers amid the resurgence of Japan's long dormant economy." The Financial Times (9/27, Pilling) says Abe's cabinet picks "reflected an independent streak," while the Wall Street Journal (9/27, Hayashi, 2.03, 2.03M) said they "indicated he would follow many of the policies of his predecessor." Abe "pledged to speed up fiscal overhauls to keep the country's economic recovery on track, and to improve ties with China." In addition, he reappointed Foreign Minister Taro Aso.

Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny Following Killing Of US-Trained Counternarcotics Team. The Christian Science Monitor (9/27, Harman, 58K) reports on what it calls the "calculated massacre of one of Colombia's best counternarcotics police teams." The Monitor says seven of the men on the team were members of a group of about 200 police trained by the DEA. According to the Monitor, the investigation of last May's killings in Jamundí "suggests the reach that Colombia's drug lords maintain today, and has shaken officials in Washington and Bogotá. The US Congress has temporarily frozen funding for Plan Colombia…and a chorus of disappointed and angry voices in both capitals is demanding an honest evaluation of the US' most expensive foreign aid program outside of the Middle East, six years after it set out to win the war on drugs."

DOJ_NMG_0069693

Reputed Cali Drug Cartel Leaders Get 30-Year Prison Sentences. There are more than 400 media references this morning to the guilty pleas and sentencing of two reputed leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities say supplied most of the cocaine in the U.S. in the 1990s. For example, USA Today (9/27, Johnson, 2.27M) reports the surviving leaders of the Cali drug cartel, which authorities "say once supplied up to 80% of the cocaine in the USA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to trafficking charges as the government took steps to seize an estimated $2.1 billion in cartel assets." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said brothers Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela were sentenced to 30 years in prison, effectively ending a 20-year period in which they were key players in Colombia's violent drug trade." While they were sentenced in Miami, 28 other family members "reached a separate pact with the government to surrender their worldwide assets."

In Labor Address, Blair Does Not Clarify Departure Date. The New York Times (9/27, Cowell, 1.21M) notes, "With some wisecracks and familiar rhetorical flourishes, Prime Minister Tony Blair delivered his final speech as Labor leader to the party's annual conference on Tuesday," in which he "offered no formal endorsement of his presumptive heir, Gordon Brown, …and did not set a date for his own departure, suggesting that he would pursue a Middle East peace initiative and other projects for 'months' to come." The Times says Blair and Brown were "politically bruised" by Labor infighting three weeks ago, and yesterday's "speech was closely watched for signs that they had reached some kind of peace, particularly since Mr. Brown offered Mr. Blair fulsome praise in a similarly scrutinized speech on Monday." The Times adds, "Mr. Blair's deft handling of the Labor crowd — drawn from a party that supposedly wants to be rid of him — showed the extent to which Labor has relied on his oratory as a vote winner."

The Financial Times (9/27, Blitz) describes Blair's speech as "tough but tender," noting he declared "he loved his party – but that it must not retreat into a leftwing 'comfort zone' of politics after he is gone." In "a dazzling final address to the Labour conference that left many delegates in tears," Blair "said he wanted to heal the divisions with Gordon Brown, the chancellor, whom he praised as 'a remarkable man, a remarkable servant to this country.'"

USA Today/AP (9/27) reports Blair "noted Tuesday that the domestic issues that once dominated the agenda had been replaced by global challenges such as climate change, organized crime and religious extremism. 'We used to feel we could shut our front doors on the problems and conflicts of the wider world. Not anymore. The British people today are reluctant global citizens. We have to make them confident ones.'"

The Washington Times/AP (9/27, Quinn) says Brown is "a man who is much admired for his policy acumen but now seems fated to struggle to replace Blair and may ultimately even watch the post slip through his fingers." The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Stobart, 918K) and Washington Post (9/27, Jordan, 748K) run similar stories.

New Conservative Party Examined. The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Patrick, 2.03M) analyzes changes within the Conservative Party under David Cameron's leadership. "By concentrating on social and environmental issues, Mr. Cameron hopes to shed the image of Conservatives as right-wingers determined to lower taxes for the wealthy and cut welfare. He reasons that by shifting the party to the center of the political spectrum, he will pick up swing voters who previously supported" Blair. "While elections are as long as three years away, it looks like Mr. Cameron, 39 years old, has the best chance in a decade to put the party of Margaret Thatcher back in government." His "decision to rework the Conservative Party's image came in response to surveys showing the party was seen as out of touch." Those "efforts with British voters are paying dividends, putting his party consistently ahead of Labour in opinion polls for the first time in more than a decade."

Senate Vote On China Tariffs May Be Delayed. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/26, 2.03M) reported, "Leading China critics in the Senate said they may again delay action on a bill to slap a big tariff on Chinese-made goods, signaling a willingness to avoid a confrontation over a long simmering currency dispute. … Lead sponsors of the legislation, Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), had been pointing toward a vote this week, raising alarms in the Bush administration that the US's free-trade credentials abroad could be undermined. But after meeting with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the senators suggested they would be willing to put off action, pending further discussions with Treasury over the next day or two about the administration's new strategy engagement with China on economic issues." The Wall Street Journal (9/27, Hitt, 2.03M) runs a similar report on its print edition.

Calpers Considers Investing In China. The Financial Times (9/27, Gangahar, Guerrera) reports, "The California Public Employees Retirement System, the largest US public pension fund, is considering investing for the first time in Chinese companies, aiming both to capitalise on the country's booming economy and to raise its exposure to emerging markets." The Times adds, "Such a move by Calpers, which has not invested any of its $208bn (€164bn) portfolio in Chinese companies because of poor corporate governance standards, could have a ripple effect on other US public pension funds and increase demand for Chinese shares." In an interview with the Financial Times, "Russell Read, Calpers' recently appointed chief investment officer, indicated that the fund could begin by investing in Chinese companies with US or international listings through American Depository Receipts and Global Depository Receipts."

DOJ_NMG_0069694

German Opera House Cancels Mozart Opera That Could Be Offensive To Muslims. The New York Times (9/27, Dempsey, Landler, 1.21M) reports, "A leading German opera house has canceled performances of a Mozart opera because of security fears stirred by a scene that depicts the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad, prompting a storm of protest here about what many see as the surrender of artistic freedom." The Deutsche Oper Berlin "said Tuesday that it had pulled 'Idomeneo' from its fall schedule after the police warned of an 'incalculable risk' to the performers and the audience." The company's director, Kirsten Harms, "said she regretted the decision but felt she had no choice. She said she was told in August that the police had received an anonymous threat, but she acted only after extensive deliberations." The Times adds, "Political and cultural figures throughout Germany condemned the cancellation. Some said it recalled the decision of European newspapers not to reprint satirical cartoons about Muhammad, after their publication in Denmark generated a furor among Muslims."

The Washington Times (9/27, Sands, 88K) reports, "The 1781 original told the tale of a king of Crete at the time of the Trojan War, but the production by director Hans Neuenfels inserts a scene in which the severed heads of Muhammad, Jesus and Buddha are placed on chairs alongside the head of the Greek sea god Poseidon." The Los Angeles Times (9/27, Fleishman, 918K) and Washington Post (9/27, Whitlock, 748K) also report the story.

Bulgaria, Romania Will Join EU. The Washington Times (9/27, Kralev, 88K) reports, "The European Union will welcome Bulgaria and Romania, two of Washington's strongest allies on the Continent, as full members on Jan. 1, but the strings attached to their accession will be the toughest in the organization's history, EU officials said yesterday." The officials also "indicated that further enlargement will have to wait until member states find a compromise on the EU constitution, whose adoption last year was derailed by French and Dutch rejection in high-profile referendums." The Bush Administration "praised the decision on Bulgaria and Romania, which joined NATO in 2004, but State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged 'the EU to continue to keep open a European horizon for a number of states, including those in the Balkans, and Turkey as well.'" The Washington Post (9/27, A21, Anderson, 748K) also reports the story.

Photographer Chronicles Darfur Genocide. A front page story in USA Today (9/27, Hampson, 2.27M) reports on Brian Steidle, a former US representative on an African Union observation team to Darfur. Steidle "has become the most vivid chronicler of one of the world's worst humanitarian catastrophes. His photographs…have helped make Americans care about a complex crisis in a faraway place of little economic or strategic value." USA adds, "He applied for a job monitoring Darfur's shaky cease-fire under the auspices of the African Union, the association of African nations whose mission in Darfur receives financial support from the United States and other nations. He'd have no power or authority to stop the violence, not even a sidearm. But Steidle did not go unarmed. Photography had been his hobby; now he bought the best digital camera he could afford: a professional-grade Canon EOS 1D Mark II. In Darfur, it would prove more powerful, and more dangerous, than a gun."

Many Cubans Say They Haven't Seen US' Anti-Castro Broadcasts. The New York Times (4/27, Goodnough, 1.21M) reports that soon after Fidel Castro announced his illness in July, the Bush Administration "stepped up its anti-Castro television broadcasts to Cuba with a new $10 million system. For the last two months, a twin-engine plane has beamed the signal of the American broadcast, called TV Martí, toward the island from over the Straits of Florida for four hours a day, six days a week, up from four hours of transmission from an Air Force plane on Saturdays. … But in interviews in the past two weeks, many Cubans said they still saw just snowy interference where the TV Martí broadcasts should be. About a dozen people in Havana said they still had never glimpsed the station even after the expanded airborne broadcasts began, raising questions about the usefulness of the $10 million expenditure. Some said they would not watch the station even if they could, because they assumed that it would be biased."

Estranged Couple Face In Battle For Brazilian Congressional Seat. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/27, A1, Moffett, 2.03M) reports that Maria Christina Mendes Caldeira and Valdemar Costa Neto married in 2003, but "the union soon flamed out. In July of 2004, Mr. Costa had the water and electricity cut off in the mansion they had shared in Brasilia to force Ms. Caldeira to move out, which she eventually did." Caldeira "found a way to strike back, personally and politically. During nationally televised congressional hearings last year about an alleged political slush fund, she stepped forward to testify that she had seen Mr. Costa stowing big stacks of cash in a secret safe. Facing possible impeachment and a ban on holding office, Mr. Costa resigned his seat." The pair are now running against each other in Sunday's election approaches. Costa is seeking a new four-year congressional term. Caldeira "has become his chief opponent as candidate of the Green Party." The Journal adds, "More than just a story of romance gone sour, the contest between the estranged couple goes to the heart of the big question looming over Brazil's election: How much do voters really care about political corruption?"

DOJ_NMG_0069695

Freidman Says Bush Has Done Nothing To Stop "Petro-Authoritarianism." Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's speech to the UN, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's US trip and China's UN ambassador, Wang Guangya, effort to block a UN resolution calling for the deployment of peacekeeping troops to Sudan have in common "today's most infectious geopolitical disease: petro-authoritarianism." As oil "has moved to $60 to $70 a barrel, it has fostered a counterwave — a wave of authoritarian leaders who are not only able to ensconce themselves in power because of huge oil profits but also to use their oil wealth to poison the global system." Chávez, Ahmadinejad "and all their petrolist pals think we are weak and will never bite the bullet. … They know that Mr. Bush is a phony — that he always presents himself as this guy ready to make the 'tough' calls, but in reality he has not asked his party, the Congress, the people, or US industry to do one single hard thing to reduce our dependence on foreign oil." Friedman concludes that the Bush years will be remembered as "the moment when petro-authoritarianism — not freedom and democracy — spread like a wildfire and he did nothing serious to stop it."

Links To Kazakhstan Called US' Most Promising Relations With Muslim World. S. Frederick Starr, chairman of the Central Asia-Caucasus Institute at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, writes in the Washington Post (9/27, A27, 748K) that Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbayev will mark his country's 15th year of independence with a visit to the US next week. But whereas "the State Department sees Kazakhstan as a successful "corridor of reform," critics claim that it's just another corrupt petro-state and Nazarbayev himself a repressive, authoritarian ruler. The fact that Vice President Cheney recently visited the Kazakh capital of Astana only confirms their darkest suspicions: It's all about oil, and probably about Halliburton as well." Starr adds that US "links with Kazakhstan are among this country's most promising relations in the Muslim world. Developed over 15 years under both Democratic and Republican administrations, they are the fruit of hard work by US agencies, businesses, educational institutions and scores of nongovernmental organizations. They are creating a successful model of economic and social development for majority-Muslim societies. What a contrast to what we see daily in the Arab world."

NYTimes Says Abe Should Men Japan's Relations With China. The New York Times (9/27, 1.21M) editorializes, "If Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, hopes to be as popular and successful as his departing predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, he needs to be equally daring in breaking with failed policies of the past. The obvious place to start is by rebuilding Japan's badly damaged relations with China. … The first step should be declaring that he will not continue Mr. Koizumi's provocative practice of visiting the Yasukuni Shrine, where the spirits of convicted war criminals are honored. The shrine controversy, and the failure of Japanese textbooks to deal honestly with the wartime behavior of Japanese troops, complicate the nation's ability to handle contemporary military issues, like the emerging debate over amending the pacifist constitution that America imposed on it after World War II. There is no reason Japan should not be able to make that change. But unless it first comes to terms with its history and its neighbors, such a step would be poorly received by other Asian nations."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Goes Public With Terror Study."
"Sorry, Cupcake, You're Not Welcome In Class."
"Rap's Captive Audience."
"Drug Offenders To Be Banned From Skid Row."
"Security Shaping Campaign."
"Abortion Vote In House May Be Too Late To Boost GOP."
"Germans Jeering Opera's Bow To Islamic Extremists."

USA Today:
"College Overhaul Called 'Overdue.'"
"Through Lens In Darfur, 'I Was A Witness To Genocide.'"
"Marriage Gap Could Sway Elections."

New York Times:
"Backing Policy, President Issues Terror Estimate."
"How A Reviled Court System Has Outlasted Many Critics."

DOJ_NMG_0069696

"New York City Plans Sharp Limits On Restaurants' Use Of Trans Fats."
"New Campaign Ads Have A Theme: Don't Be Nice."
"Opera Canceled Over A Depiction Of Muhammad."
"Forensic Skills Seek To Uncover Hidden Patterns Of Elder Abuse."

Washington Post:
"Part Of Iraq Intelligence report Is Released."
"West Point Mourns A Font Of Energy, Laid To Rest By War."
"States, Counties Begin To Enforce Immigration Law."
"Distrust Breaks The Bonds Of A Baghdad Neighborhood."
"Deaths Of 3 D.C. Teens In 24 Hours Shock City
"Teens' T-Shirts Make Educators Squirm."

Detroit Free Press:
"Stockholders Rise Up, Push GM Changes."
"Partying Like Hell."
"Doctor Charged In Wife's 1968 Death."
"Hard To Hide."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Germans Gripe: This Bud's Not For Us."
"Details Of Plot Shock Canada."
"Stopping To Help? Be Careful."
"Boy, 9, Hacked To Death; Was Right Man Shot?"
"Fragile Digital Data In Danger Of Fading Past History's Reach."

Houston Chronicle:
"Gang Attack Kills Teen Rival In Park."
"Schools Might Get To Make The Call On Cell Phones."
"First-Class Night Down In Class A."
"Baby's Body At The Center Of Alleged Corpse Scam."
"Report: Storms Left New Human Landscape."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: NIE Report; Blame For Al Qaeda; Afghanistan Violence; Health Care Cost; Stock Market; Race Car Crash; The Mona Lisa; Byron Nelson Obit; World War I Soldier Buried.
CBS: NIE Report; NIE Report Analysis; Afghanistan Violence; Cocaine Suppliers Forfeit $2 Million; Fastow Goes To Prison; Heating Bills Going Down; Student Loans; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Natan Sharansky-Opinion; Byron Nelson Obit; World War I Burial-Arlington.
NBC: NIE Report; Clinton Vs Bush-Al Qaeda Blame; Afghanistan Violence; Stock Market; Fastow & Ebbers Now in Prison; New Orleans Clean Up; California Wildfires; Hood Blimp Crash; Immigration Debate-Colorado; World War I Burial-Arlington.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush Declassifies NIE; CA-Wildfire.
CBS: Bush Declassifies NIE; Nelson Obit.; Fastow Sentenced; Ebbers Reports To Prison; Wall Street; CA-Wildfire; Hilton Charged With Drunk Driving.
NPR: Bush Declassifies NIE; Talabani-Washington Visit; Rumsfeld-Albania Visit; US Nuclear Reprocessing Factory Project; Fastow Sentenced; Ebbers Reports To Prison.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends Bob Corker for US Senate and Tennessee Republican Party luncheon, Private residence, Memphis; Meets with President Musharraf of Pakistan and Afghan President Karzai.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Subcommittee. Hearing on U.S. policy and practice on the use of riot control agents by the armed forces. Assistant Defense Secretary Peter Flory; Rear Adm. Anthony Winns, vice director for operations, J-3, Joint Staff. Location: Room 232A, Russell. Notes: Closed session follows in Room 222, Russell.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Meeting on pending nominations and legislation. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on development of an artificial pancreas. Griffin Rogers, Acting Director, National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases; Chris Dudley, Dudley Foundation; Arnold Donald, Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation International; Caroline Sweeney, Gray, Maine. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nomination of Robert Howard to be Assistant VAD Secretary. Location: Room 418, Russell. Notes: Markup of the nomination following the first roll call vote after Noon in the Reception Room off the Senate floor.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Bioterrorism and Public Health Preparedness Subcommittee. Hearing on improvement to emergency medical care. Frederick Blum, president, American College of Emergency Physicians; Margaret van Amringe, Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations;

DOJ_NMG_0069697

Nancy Bonalumi, President, Emergency Nurses Association; Leon Haley, Jr., Grady Health Systems; Robert Bass, President, National Association of EMS officials. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on refugee admissions and policies. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (37 bills): 1) H.R. 6138 - To temporarily extend the programs under the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes; 2) H.R. 4766 - Native American Languages Preservation Act of 2006; 3) H. Res. 1009 - Supporting efforts to promote greater public awareness of effective runaway youth prevention programs and the need for safe and productive alternatives, resources, and supports for homeless youth and youth in other high-risk situations; 4) H.R. 6106 - To extend the waiver authority for the Secretary of Education under title IV, section 105, of Public Law 109-148; 5) H.Res. 295 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives supporting the establishment of September as Campus Fire Safety Month, and for other purposes; 6) H.Con.Res. 478 - Supporting the goals and ideals of ``Lights On Afterschool!", a national celebration of after-school programs; 7) H.R. 5483 - Railroad Retirement Disability Earnings Act; 8) H.R. 4981 - Dam Safety Act of 2006; 9) H.R. 5546 - Carroll A. Campbell, Jr. Federal Courthouse Designation Act; 10) H.R. 5606 - William M. Steger Federal Building and United States Courthouse Designation Act; 11) H.R. 5026 - Andres Toro Building Designation Act; 12) H.R. 6051 - John F. Seiberling Federal Building Designation Act; 13) H.R. 1556 - Clyde S. Cahill Memorial Park Designation Act; 14) H.R. 2322 - Kika de la Garza Federal Building Designation Act; 15) H.R. 5637 - Nonadmitted and Reinsurance Reform Act of 2006; 16) S. 3850 - Credit Rating Agency Reform Act of 2006; 17) H.R. 5347 - HOPE VI Reauthorization Act of 2006; 18) H.R. 6079 - Hedge Fund Study Act; 19) H.R. 5503 - FHA Multifamily Loan Limit Adjustment Act of 2006; 20) H.R. 5585 - Financial Netting Improvements Act of 2006; 21) H.R. 6062 - Community Development Investment Enhancements Act of 2006; 22) H.R. 6072 - Financial Services Regulatory Relief Amendments Act of 2006; 23) H.R. 6162 - Secure Border Initiative Financial Accountability Act of 2006; 24) H. Con. Res. 473 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Gynecologic Cancer Awareness Month; 25) H. Res. 402 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Infant Mortality Awareness Month; 26) H. Res. 748 - Recognizing the 225th anniversary of the American and French victory at Yorktown, Virginia, during the Revolutionary War; 27) H. Con. Res. 222 - Supporting the goals and ideals of National Pregnancy and Infant Loss Remembrance Day; 28) H. Res. 991 - Congratulating the Columbus Northern Little League Baseball Team from Columbus, Georgia, on its victory in the 2006 Little League World Series Championship games; 29) H.R. 5108 - Lance Corporal Robert A. Martinez Post Office Building Designation Act; 30) H.R. 6075 - Robert J. Thompson Post Office Building Designation Act; 31) H.R 6078 - Chuck Fortenberry Post Office Building Designation Act; 32) H.R. 4720 - Beverly J. Wilson Post Office Building Designation Act; 33) H. Res. 973 - Recognizing Financial Planning Week, recognizing the significant impact of sound financial planning on achieving life's goals, and honoring families and the financial planning profession for their adherence and dedication to the financial planning process; 34) H.R. 5989 - John J. Sinde Post Office Building Designation Act; 35) H.R. 5990 - Wallace W. Sykes Post Office Building Designation Act; 36) S. 3613 - Major George Quamo Post Office Building Designation Act; 37) S. 3187 - Richard L. Cevoli Post Office.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES AND VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Military Personnel Subcommittee and Economic Opportunity Subcommittee. Joint Hearing on the ``Montgomery GI Bill for Members of the Select Reserve." Michael Dominguez, Defense Department; Keith Wilson, VA; retired Vice Adm. Norbert Ryan, Military Officers Association of America; Steve Kime, Servicemembers Opportunity College. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises and the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Joint hearing on protecting Americans from catastrophic terrorism risk. Edmund F. (Ted) Kelly, CEO, Liberty Mutual Insurance Co.; Ramani Ayer, Chairman, President, and Chief Executive Officer, Hartford Financial Services Group; Gregory C. Case, President and Chief Executive Officer, Aon Corporation; Jacques E. Dubois, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Swiss Re America Holding Company; Christopher J. Nassetta, President and Chief Executive Officer, Host Hotels and Resorts, Inc.; Sharon Emek, Partner, CBS Coverage Group, Inc.; Warren Heck, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Greater New York Mutual Insurance Company; Janice M. Abraham, President and Chief Executive Officer, United Educators Insurance; Edwin L. Harper, Senior Vice President, Assurant, Inc.; Ira Shapiro, on behalf of the Real Estate Board of New York; Jonathan W. Knipe, World Trade Center Properties LLC. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOUSE ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on the House's 10-year IT vision. Kathy Goldschmidt, Congressional Management Foundation; consultant Larry Bradley; Jim Cornell, inspector general, House of Representatives; Wilson S. Livingood, sergeant-at-arms, House of Representatives; Karen Haas, clerk, House of Representatives; Pope Barrow, legislative counsel, House of

DOJ_NMG_0069698

Representatives; James Eagen, chief administrative officer, House of Representatives. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Disability Assistance and Memorial Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on the pension programs operated by the VA. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10:15 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on intelligence reform. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Education Reform Subcommittee. Hearing on early childhood visitation programs. Debroah Daro, University of Chicago; Michele Ridge, Family Nurse Partnership; Anna Scovell, Lake Forest School District, Delmar, Del. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 6134 - Health Opportunity Patient Empowerment Act. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Continued hearing on Internet child pornography and exploitation. Keith Wallace, Families Thru International Adoption, Evansville, Ind.; Jeannene Smith, founder, Reaching Out Thru International Adoption, Somerdale, N.J.; Richard L. Baird, Jr., Adiago Health, Inc., Pittsburgh; Carol Eiferman, Reaching Out Thru Adoption, Mount Laurel, N.J.; Serguei Dymtchenko, Toms River, N.J.; Marlene Seamans-Conn, former Executive Director, Reaching Out Thru International Adoption, Sewell, N.J.; Hannah Druger, Reaching Out Thru International Adoption, Medford, N.J.; Jared Rolsky, Joint Council on International Children's Services, Alexandria, Va.; Trish Maskew, Ethica, Inc., Silver Spring, Md. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee. Hearing on banks in real estate and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency's December 2005 ruling. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Energy and Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on rebalancing the carbon cycle. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Hearing on improving security and commerce at the nation's ports. Philip Byrd, Sr., Bulldog Highway Express, Charleston, S.C.; Debbie Gosselin, Chesapeake Marine Tours, Annapolis, Md.; George Leavell, Wepfer Marine, Memphis; Danny Schnautz, Clark Freight Lines, Pasadena, Texas. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Aviation subcommittee. Oversight hearing on ``Next Generation Air Transportation System Financing Options." Gerald Dillingham, GAO; Acting CBO Director Donald Marron; R. John Hansman, MIT; Ellen Jewett, Goldman, Sachs and Co. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on irregular warfare. Mario Mancuso, Deputy Assistant Defense Secretary; Vice Adm. Eric Olson, U.S. Special Operations Command; Brig. Gen. O.G. Mannon, Deputy Director, Special Operations, Joint Chiefs of Staff. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on U.S.-Republic of Korea relations. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill; Deputy Undersecretary of Defense Richard Lawless; Balbina Hwang, Heritage Foundation; L. Gordon Flake, Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation; Joshua Stanton, former judge advocate, U.S. Army. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT MUSHARRAF _ Highlights: 7:30 p.m. Meets with President Bush and Afdghan President Karzai. White House.

AFGHAN PRESIDENT HAMID KARZAI _ Highlights: 7:30 p.m. Meets with President Bush and Pakistani President Musharraf. White House.

GREEK FOREIGN MINISTER DORA BAKOYANNIS _ Highlights: 9 a.m. Meets with Energy Secretary Bodman. Energy Department. 10 a.m. Holds briefing for Greek media. At the Embassy. 11 a.m. Gives a speech on ``The Evolution of Europe and the U.S.: Synthesis or Antithesis?". Gaston Hall, Georgetown University. 3:15 p.m. Meets with Secretary of State Rice. State Department. 4:30 p.m. Meets with National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. White House. 5:30 p.m. Attends inauguration of a new chair in Hellenic studies. Healy Hall, Georgetown University.

AIR FORCE EXPO _ Air Force Association holds Air & Space Conference 2006 and Technology Exposition. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Role of Congress in Providing for the National Defense, Rep. Curt Weldon (R-PA). 11 a.m. Conference Address on the Future of Air and Space Power by General T. Michael Moseley. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, Washington.

NATIONAL SECURITY _ 9 a.m. - 2 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a program on the nation's strategic challenges and to launch the Princeton Project on National Security Report. Highlights: 10 a.m. Session on whether a new strategy is needed, with James Dobbins, RAND Corp., publisher Mortimer Zuckerman, G. John Ikenberry of Princeton University. 11 a.m. Panel on the economic dimensions of national security, with David Rubenstein of the Carlyle Group, former CBO Director Douglas holtz-Eakin, others. 12 p.m. Sen. Chuck Hagel. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon discussion on national security in the 21st century, with John Bellinger of the State Department, others. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0069699

HEALTH CARE _ 10 a.m. The Amgen Foundation holds a symposium on improving health care. Highlights: 10:20 a.m. CMMS Administrator Mark McClellan. 12 p.m. Donald Berwick, Institute for Healthcare Improvement. Location: Jordan Conference Center, Kaiser Family Foundation, 1330 G St. NW.

BUSINESS COSTS _ 9 a.m. The National Association of Manufacturers and the Manufacturing Institute hold a news conference to release a cost study showing structural costs sharply increasing. Location: Suite 600, NAM, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

FEDERAL CONTRACTING _ 9 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce holds a federal procurement business forum, with GSA Administrator Lurita Doan. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House GOP Conference. Location: Capitol Hill Club. Notes: Stakeout at 10 a.m.

HEALTH CARE _ 9:30 a.m. AARP and the American Hospital Association hold a program with former Sen. John Breaux, Rick Pollack of AHA, John rother of AARP, others, on health care reform. Location: National Press Club.

HOUSE CANDIDATES _ 9:45 a.m. Twelve veterans running for Congress as Democrats and Rep. John Murtha discuss the administration's military policy, Democratic support for troops and veterans assistance. Location: Phoenix Hotel, 520 N. Capitol St.

COMMUNISM MEMORIAL _ 10 a.m. Groundbreaking for the Victims of Communism Memorial, with Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky as the featured speaker. Location: Massachusetts and New Jersey Aves. and G St. NW. Notes: Reception follows in room HC-5, Capitol.

LINE ITEM VETO _ 10 a.m. The Council for Citizens Against Government Waste holds a news conference in support of the line item veto, with OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: National Press Club.

PHYSICIANS RALLY _ 10 a.m. Family doctors hold a rally to call on the next Congress to fix the nation's health care system. Location: West Lawn, Capitol.

SUPREME COURT _ 10 a.m. Environmental Defense holds a telephone briefing on two clean air cases upcoming on the Supreme Court calendar this term. Notes: Callin number: 800-903-0258; passcode: Supreme Court.

DEMOCRATS-BUSH AGENDA _ 10:30 a.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid, and other Democratic House and Senate Democrats hold a press briefing to say the will hold the Republican Congress accountable for what they see as its rubberstamping of the Bush Administration's ``misguided'' agenda. Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

NATIONAL PREPAREDNESS _ 11 a.m. George Mason University School of Law sponsors a discussion with Undersecretary of Homeland Security George Foresman on the future of critical infrastructure protection, followed by a panel discussion with Johanna Schneider of The Business Roundtable, David Eisner of the Corporation for National and Community Service, Paul Kurtz of the Cyber Security Industry Alliance, others. Location: National Press Club.

RELIGION-FOREIGN POLICY _ 11 a.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record media conference call with Walter Russell Mead discussing his article on evangelical Christians and U.S. foreign policy. Contacts: n/a, 212-434-9537. Notes: Callin number: 800-290-9461. passcode: Religion. RSVP required to NYpressRSVPcfr.org. Open to media only.

SUBURBAN BILLS _ 11:30 a.m. The Congressional Suburban Caucus unveils its ``7 Bills for 2007'' agenda. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

YUCCA MOUNTAIN _ 10 a.m. Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee nuclear policy staff and counsel and E&W Appropriations staff hold a briefing on the Yucca Mountain Bill to be introduced by Senator Domenici. Location: Room 328, Senate Hart Office Building.

BABY BOOMERS _ 12 p.m. The National Association of Area Agencies on Aging and other organizations hold a press conference to release the report ``Will America Be Ready?,'' foucsing on the maturing of America and assessing the nation's preparedness for the aging baby boomer population. Location: National Press Club.

DEMOCRATS-BUDGET _ 12 p.m. Sen. Kent Conrad and Rep. John Spratt hold a news conference to discuss the GOP budget and appropriations processes. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

HEALTH INSURANCE _ 12 p.m. The Economic Policy Institute holds a telephone briefing on a report showing more Americans are going without health insurance as employers drop health plans. Contacts: Nancy Coleman, 202-775-8810.

HIGHER EDUCATION _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a forum on reform of higher education, with Charles Miller of the Secretary of Education's Commission on the Future of Higher Education, President Christopher Nelson of St. John's college, others. Location: 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

JORDAN _ 12 p.m. Linda Jordan gives the kickoff speech in the I King Jordan Lecture Series. Location: Swindells Auditorium, Kellogg Conference Hotel, Gallaudet University.

VOTER PLEDGE _ 1 p.m. National watchdog organizations hold a telephone briefing to release signers of the ``Voters First'' pledge. Notes: Callin number: 888-868-9079; passcode: 7900382.

CHILD OBESITY _ 2 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, others, announce a task force Media and Childhood Obesity: Today and Tomorrow. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0069700

TORTURE _ 2 p.m. Rep. Cynthia McKinney holds a briefing on the history, techniques, training and use of torture by the U.S. government. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

CLEAN ENERGY _ 2:30 p.m. - 4 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute hosts a congressional briefing on a recently released report from the Western Governors Association, and association of 19 states and three US-flag Pacific islands, ttitled, ``Clean Energy, a Strong Economy and a Healthy Environment." Location: Room 340, Cannon House Office Building.

ROTARY INTERNATIONAL _ 3 p.m. Rotary International President Bill Boyd addresses a National Press Club afternoon newsmaker. Boyd will discuss the mobilization of Rotarians in 162 countries to promote international cooperation in addressing problems in the developing world. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

AGRICULTURE _ 3 p.m. - 5 p.m. The Institute for International Economics and the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations meets to examine US agricultural policy and present news reforms to revive the Doha Round and ensure the long-term competetiveness of the US agricultural sector. Location: 1750 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BAGHDAD ER _ 5 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a screening for the documentary, ``Baghdad ER," a look at emergency care in Baghdad. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BHATT HONORED _ 6 p.m. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton; AFL-CIO President John Sweeney; Inez McCormack, former President of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, and other leaders from the union, women's rights, international financial and academic communities will gather to honor Ela Bhatt, founder and former General Secretary of the Self-Employed Women's Association (SEWA). Location: AFL-CIO Headquarters, 815 16th St, NW.

CONGRESSIONAL HISPANIC _ 7 p.m. The Congressional Hispanic Leadership Institute holds its 2nd annual Hispanic Heritage Month gala. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, September 27, 2006 8:18 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, September 27, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060927.pdf; dojclips060927.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Deal Is Likely On Detainees But Not On Eavesdropping (NYT) 5
No Compromise On Wiretap Bill (WP) 6
Detainee Bill In Final Stages (WP) 7
A Last Hurdle For Bill On Detainees: Access To US Court (CSM) 8
Rush To Error (WP) 9
Detainees Compromise: Lose-lose (USAT) 10
EU To Probe Bank Data Monitoring By U.S. (AP) 12
Europe Panel Defers Report On Bank Data Sifting (NYT/AP) 12
Disputing An 'Obscure' Organization's Spokesman (WP) 13
Guantanamo Makes Adjustments For Ramadan (AP) 13

Homeland Response:

Officials Forgo Supreme Court Appeal In DHS Labor Case (GOVEXEC) 14
No Supreme Court Appeal For MaxHR (FCW) 15
Administration Opts Not To Appeal Court Rejection Of DHS Personnel System (FEDTIMES) 15
Homeland Security Department Ends Litigation On Workplace Rules (WP) 16
Chertoff, Democrats Disagree Over Cargo Scans (WT) 17
Air Travelers Glad To Have Liquids, Gels Back (AP) 18
Fliers Allowed Liquids, But Some Get Frustration (USAT) 19
Air Travelers Make Dry Runs Despite Rules (WT) 20
Airport Security Adjusts To New Rules On Liquids (WP) 21
Latest Airport Security Rules Trip Up Travelers In L.A. (LAT) 22
A Retreat On Carry-On Liquids (NYT) 23

War News:

Bush Orders Intel Report Declassified (AP) 23
Bush Goes Public With Terror Study (LAT) 24
Bush Declassifies Some Iraq Intelligence Documents (CHIT) 26
Backing Policy, President Issues Terror Estimate (NYT) 28
Bush's Leak Comments Heighten Debate Over Security (LAT) 30
White House Releases Portions Of Iraq-War Critique (WSJ) 31
Bush On Offensive Over Leaked Iraq Report (FT) 32
Bush Hits 'Political' Leak (WT) 33
Part Of Iraq Intelligence Report Is Released (WP) 35
Intel Report: Iraq War Cultivating Militancy (USAT) 36
Iraq Is 'Cause Celebre' For Extremists (AP-Y) 37
Waging The War On Terror: Report Belies Optimistic View (NYT) 38
Sobering Conclusions On Why Jihad Has Spread (WP) 40
Decision To Declassify (WSJ) 41
The Fine Art Of Declassification (NYT) 41
The Big Question Democrats Are Ducking (WP) 42
Justice Dept. Might Probe Leak (USAT) 43
Bush Brings Afghanistan, Pakistan To The Table (WP) 43
Bush Reiterates U.S. Support For Karzai (AP-Y) 44
Karzai Questions Pakistan Peace Deal (FT) 46
Bush Guests Are Both Allies — Of The U.S., At Least (USAT) 46
Get Musharraf And Karzai On Same Page (LAT) 47
Punch Lines For Pakistan's President (WP) 48
Taliban Bombs Afghan Official's Compound (AP) 49
Attacks In Afghanistan Grow More Frequent And Lethal (NYT) 50
Talabani: Iraq Won't Have Civil War (AP) 51
Distrust Breaks The Bonds Of A Baghdad Neighborhood (WP) 52
Most Iraqis Favor Immediate U.S. Pullout, Polls Show (WP) 55
Saddam's Trial Has Shouting, Then He Is Removed (MCT) 57
Judge Postpones Hussein Trial As Lawyers Continue Boycott (NYT) 58
Inquiry: Australian Wheat Exporter Warned (AP) 59
West Point Mourns A Font Of Energy, Laid To Rest By War (WP) 60

Corporate Scandals:

Enron's Fastow To Serve 6 Years (LAT) 61
Enron's Fastow Gets 6 Years (WP) 63
Fastow Gets Six Years As Judge Calls For Mercy (WSJ) 64
Fastow Gets Lighter Prison Sentence Of Six Years (USAT) .. 65
Enron's Fastow Is Sentenced To Six Years In Jail (NYT) 66
Former Enron Financial Officer Fastow Sentenced To 6 Years In Prison (FINDLAW/AP) 67
Fastow Accuses Enron Bankers (FT) 68
Fastow Sentenced To Six Years In Federal Prison (LAW) 68
Ebbers Reports To Prison In Mercedes (USAT) 70
Ebbers Starts 25-Year Term For Fraud At WorldCom (WP) ... 70
Lawyers Discuss Scrushy's New-Trial Request (WSJ) 71
The Hurd And Dunn Show (WSJ) 72
To Buy Or Not To Buy HP? A Question Of Ethics (WP) 73
Options Probe Has Cost Investors $7.9 Billion In Market Value (BLOOM) 74

Criminal Law:

Prosecutors In C.I.A. Leak Put Spending At $1.4 Million (AP). 76
CIA Leak Probe Relatively Inexpensive (WP) 77
Judge To Weigh Evidence In CIA Leak Case (AP) 77
Gotti Jurors Say They're Deadlocked (NYT) 78
Jury In 3rd Gotti Trial Deadlocked (FINDLAW/AP) 79
DOJ Can Question Staffers In Crawford Probe (RC) 79
Nuclear Engineer Guilty Of Conspiracy, Tax Evasion (PPG). 80
Man With Russian Ties Pleads Guilty In Fraud (PTR) 80
Man Pleads In Russia Nuclear Cash Case (WP/AP) 81
FBI Returns For More From Stevens' Office (ADN) 82
No Leniency: Ailing Gambino Captain Sent To Prison For 12 Years (NSDY/AP) 84
Judge Has No Mercy For Gambino Gabber (NYDN) 84
Politicos Mull Data Retention By Web Hosts, Registrars (CNET) 85
D.C. Police Seize Electronics From Home Where Lawyer Was Killed (LAW) 86
Supreme Court Accepts Arizona Death Penalty Case (LAW/AP) 86
Biker Brawl Trial Opens In Las Vegas (FINDLAW/AP) 87
How A Google Search Can Become A Security Threat (NYT) 87
Surging Losses, But Few Victims In Data Breaches (NYT) 89
Execution Sought For Two D.C. Men (WT) 91
US Arrest Threat To Gambling Executives (FT) 92
Gang Named In Violent Spell (BSUN) 93
MS-13's Primary Goal Is Killing, Prosecutor Says At Start Of Trial (WP) 94
Deaths Of 3 D.C. Teens Shock City (WP) 95
Copper Thieves Get Killed Cutting Into Power Lines (USAT) 96
Man Charged In Fake-robbery Scams (PHI) 97
Feds Charge Repeat 'Victim' (PHI) 98
Feds: Seven Scammed Katrina Aid (DEN) 98
7 Charged With Obtaining Fraudulent Katrina Relief From FEMA (AP) 99
Ex-paper Chief Sent To Prison (NSDY) 99
He Destroyed North Country Mills, Now He's In Jail (MANUL) 100
Former American Tissue CEO Sentenced To 15 Years (AP) 101
Ex-Paper Chief Gets 15-Year Term In Fraud (NYT) 102
Money Laundering Conspiracy Sends Man To Prison (LYNNA) 103
How A Reviled Court System Has Outlasted Many Critics (NYT) 103
Forensic Skills Seek To Uncover Hidden Patterns Of Elder Abuse (NYT) 107
Old-fashioned Land Scams Go High-tech (USAT) 109
'Girls Gone Wild' Filmmaker Fined $2.1 Million (WT) 111
BWXT Worker Pleads Guilty (KNOXNS) 111
San Diego And The SEC (WSJ) 112

Civil Law:

Justices To Decide On Use Of Union Fees For Politics (WP) 113
Top Court To Hear Union Fees Case (WT) 114
Justices To Hear Case On Use Of Union Fees (NYT) 115
Wacky Tobacco Lawsuit (LAT) 116

Civil Rights:

Gonzales Asked To Probe Prosecution Of Agents (WT) 117
She Took Badge To Nab Hub Officer (BOS) 118
Disgraced Cop Quits Force (BOSH) 119
Boston Police Officer Facing Civil Rights Charges (AP) 119
Forced Labor Case Expanded (KCS) 120
Men Charged With Forced Labor Of Russian Students (BVND) 120
Cambodia Gets Tough On Child Sex Trade (CSM) 121
Hate Crimes Wake Charles's Sleeping Giant (WP) 122
Judge Says St. Landry School Case On Target (BRADV) 124
House Passes Abortion Bill On Minors (NYT/AP) 124
Abortion Vote In House May Be Too Late To Boost GOP (LAT) 125
GOP Pushes 'Values' Legislation (WT) 126
House OKs Bill On Religious Expression (AP-Y) 127
House Passes Measure On Religion Suits (WP) 128
Texas Case Involving Marital Counseling Is Latest To Test Line Between Church And State (NYT) 129

DOJ_NMG_0069704

Antitrust:

Wright Backers Hopeful (DMN) 130
Wright Compromise Bill Faces More Opposition (DALLASBIZ) 132
J&J Sues Boston Sci, Abbott Over Guidant (AP) 133
J&J Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant (UPI) 134
J&J Sues Boston Scientific Over Guidant Acquisition (Update7) (BLOOM) 134
Judge Dismisses Parts Of AMD's Case Against Intel (WSJ) . 135
DeCode Genetics Sues Ex-Workers, Claiming Trade-Secret Violations (WSJ) 136
Microsoft's Precrimes (WSJ) 136
FTC Clears Regent Buy Of 5 CBS Stations (AP) 138
U.S. 'lobbied' The EC Over Microsoft Fine (CNET) 138
New Jersey MLS Tosses Restrictions For Display Of Listings (INMAN) 139

Environment:

U.S. Judge Says Lawsuit Over California Auto Emissions Can Go Forward (FINDLAW/AP) 140
White House Said To Bar Hurricane Report (AP) 141
How A Tiny Law Firm Made Hay Out Of Tainted Spinach (WSJ) 142
As A Test Lab On Dirty Air, An Ohio Town Has Changed (NYT) 144

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Cali Drug Chiefs Given 30-year Prison Terms (USAT) 145
With Guilty Pleas, Cali Cartel Finished, U.S. Says (WP) 146
Colombian Drug Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty In Miami (Update1) (BLOOM) 146
U.S. Officials Say Guilty Pleas By Colombian Brothers Put An End To Infamous Cali Drug Cartel (AP) 147
Two Brothers Who Ran Cartel Plead Guilty (AP) 148
Colombian Drug Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty (NYT) 149
Cartel Leaders Plead Guilty (MH) 150
Founders Of Cali Cartel Plead Guilty (WT/UPI) 151
Cali Cartel Drug Kingpins Plead GuiltyColombian Brothers Get 30 Years, Also Agree To Forfeit $2.1B In Assets (CBS/AP) 151
Colombian Drug Lords Jailed In US (BBC) 153
Judge Sentences Founders Of Cali Cartel To 30 Years (MCT) 153
Despite Cali Cartel Plea Deal, Challenges Remain In Colombian Drug War (ABC) 155
Pakistani Gets 18 Years In Missile Scheme (LAT) 155
Mexican Drug Cartels' New Scare Tactic: Beheadings (SAEN) 156
Mexico's Calderon: Key Areas Overwhelmed By Drug Violence (AP) 156
The War On Drugs: Ambushed In Jamund? (CSM) 157
House OKs New Gun-show Rules (RTD) 160
ATF Seeks To Create Gang Field Office In Seattle Area (AP) 161

Immigration:

Supreme Court To Rule On Immigrant Car Theft (LAT) 162
More Than Two Dozen People Detained On Fort Bragg (FAYOBS) 163
U.S. Judge Orders Deportation Of 3 Egyptian Students Who Disappeared From University Exchange Program (FINDLAW/AP) 164
Senators Criticize Border Security Measures (NYT) 164
Senator Rejects Immigration Addition To Defense Bill (USAT/AP) 164 States, Counties Begin To Enforce Immigration Law (WP) .. 165

Tax:

Inside Politics (WT) 167

Congress-Administration:

House OKs $70B For Iraq, Afghanistan (AP) 169
House OKs $70B For Iraq, Afghanistan (WP/AP) 170
Democrats Delay GOP Bills In Senate (WT) 171
Reid Sees New Beginning (RC) 172
Our Pathetic Congress (LAT) 174
Spending Data Going Online With New Law (USAT) 175
New Law To Create Online Budget Database (AP-Y) 176
Bush Signs Bill To Create Spending Database (WT) 176
Bush Admin Wants To Have Say In Next Farm Bill -USDA Secy (DJ) 177
Spellings Back Ideas To Shake Up College (AP) 178
Spellings Outlines New Proposals For Higher Education (MCT) 179
Spellings Aims To Impose New Standards On Colleges (WSJ) 180
Secretary Vows To Improve Results Of Higher Education (NYT) 181
Spellings Calls For Tracking Of Students' Performance (WP) 182
College Overhaul Called 'overdue' (USAT) 183
Spellings Presses U.S. Colleges To Prove Their Worth (Update2) (BLOOM) 184
Swagel Nominated To Treasury Post (WSJ) 186
Report Criticizes Pentagon's New Travel Booking System (WP) 186

DOJ_NMG_0069705

In the Loop (WP) 187
Hill Salary Site Proves Too Big A Hit (WP) 187
The Threat To Judicial Independence (WSJ) 188
Help Youths In Need (WT) 190

Other News:

Cheaper Oil Lifts US Consumer Confidence (FT) 191
Consumer Confidence Rebounds Amid Declines In Gasoline Prices (WSJ) 191
Consumers' Outlook On The Economy Slightly More Upbeat (USAT) 192
Economic Forum Warns U.S. Of Budget Deficit's Ill Effects (WSJ) 192
No Longer No. 1, And No Wonder (WP) 194
Dow's Rally Puts It In Range To Strike Record (WSJ) 195
Clinton TV Interview Energizes GOP, Dems (AP-Y) 196
Sen. Clinton Hits Back At Rice Over 9/11 (AP-Y) 197
Clinton Defends Husband's Tack, Adding That All Democrats Should Take A Hint (NYT) 198
Bush And Clinton Teams Debate Pre-9/11 Efforts (WP) 199
Another Clinton Seduction (NYT) 200
What President Clinton Didn't Do . . . (WSJ) 201
New Campaign Ads Have A Theme: Don't Be Nice (NYT) 203
Why Some Republicans Want To Lose (WSJ) 205
Marriage Gap Could Sway Elections (USAT) 206
'Fertility Gap' Helps Explain Political Divide (USAT) 207
Dems Seek K St. Cash (HILL) 208
GOP Opponent Asks DOJ For Murtha Probe (RC) 209
New Report That Senator Uttered Slurs (NYT) 210
Webb Dodges Question On Racial Epithet (AP) 211
Allen Urged To Focus On Successful Record (WT) 211
Democrats Snarl At Steele In TV Ad, But He Bites Back (WT) 212
Democrats Dismiss Steele's Puppy Commercial (WP) 213
The 'Moderate Republican' Scam (WP) 214
RNC Takes Lead In Key Senate Tilts (RC) 215
Bachmann: NRCC Overdrive (RC) 217
GOP Scandals Dog Ohio Candidate (WP) 218
Campaign 2006: The Battle For Ohio, Round Two (TIME) 219
Hospital Defends Promotion, Raise For Senator's Wife (CHIT) 221
Bill Would Reimburse States For Printing Alternate Ballots (NYT) 222
Ensign To Lead NRSC (RC) 223
Richardson Emerges As Possible Democratic Presidential Candidate (MCT) 224
Bill Richardson (CSM) 225
Ready To Rumble (RC) 226
Police Stop Protest At Senate Building (WP) 228
High Court Will Examine Role Of Credit Ratings In Insurance (WSJ) 228
Health-Care Premiums Rise 7.7%, Outpacing Wages And Inflation (WSJ) 229
High-deductible Health Policies Don't See Growth (USAT) 230
Health Premiums Rise More Slowly (WP) 231
Health Care Costs Rise Twice As Much As Inflation (NYT) 232
Passing The Buck To Mom And Dad (NYT) 233
Change Comes To A Carolina (WSJ) 234
Russia Agrees To Send Fuel For Iran Nuclear Plant (NYT/AP) 234
Tehran Denies Secret Nuke Deal (WT) 235
Iranian Ex-Lawmaker Alleges Torture (WP) 236
Rice Gives North Korea Nuclear Talks Effort Six Weeks To Resume (AFP) 237
Israel Sets Goal Of Pulling Troops Out Of Lebanon By Sunday (NYT) 238
Bush Signs US-Oman Trade Pact (AFP) 239
Korean Leads Race To Succeed Annan (WT) 240
After Annan, What Kind Of UN Leader? (CSM) 241
Japan Vows To Step Up Bid For Security Council Expansion (AFP) 243
New Premier Seeks A Japan With Muscle And A Voice (NYT) 243
Japan PM Vows To Speed Up Reforms (FT) 245
Abe's Cabinet Picks Indicate A Steady Course (WSJ) 245
In Valedictory Speech, Blair Declines To Name Departure Date (NYT) 246
Blair In Tough And Tender Farewell (FT) 247
Blair: Strong Ties With U.S. Essential (USAT/AP) 248
Blair's Farewell Stresses Alliance (WT/AP) 248
Blair Bids Fellow Laborites Farewell (LAT) 249
In Parting Words, Advice For Labor (WP) 250
The Rebranding Of British Conservatives (WSJ) 251
Washington Wire (WSJ) 253
Senate May Delay Vote On Punitive Tariffs On China (WSJ) 256
Calpers Looks At Investing In China (FT) 257
Opera Canceled Over A Depiction Of Muhammad (NYT) 257
Opera Canceled For Fear Of Muslim Ire (WT) 259
Germans Jeering Opera's Bow To Islamic Extremists (LAT) 260
Fear Of Muslim Backlash Cancels Opera (WP) 261
Bulgaria, Romania To Join EU (WT) 262
Romania, Bulgaria Favored To Join E.U. (WP) 263
Through Lens In Darfur, 'I Was A Witness To Genocide' (USAT) 264
U.S. Pushes Anti-Castro TV, But Is Anyone Watching? (NYT) 267

DOJ_NMG_0069706

Unhappy Couple Run Against Each Other For Congress In Brazil (WSJ) 269
Fill 'Er Up With Dictators (NYT) 270
Don't Play Politics With Kazakhstan (WP) 271
Shinzo Abe's Asian Challenge (NYT) 273

TERRORISM NEWS:

Deal Is Likely On Detainees But Not On Eavesdropping (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Congress on Tuesday was headed toward a split decision on President Bush's pre-election national security agenda, moving closer to passage of legislation on the handling of terrorism suspects while all but giving up hope of agreeing on a final bill to authorize the administration's eavesdropping program.

Lawmakers in both the House and Senate said it now appeared doubtful that bills covering the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program could pass both houses and be reconciled before Congress adjourns this weekend, an outcome that would deny Republicans one of the main achievements they hoped to take into the election.

"We would like to, but I think that might be a stretch," said Representative John A. Boehner, the House majority leader, about getting a final agreement. He said the House would still proceed with its own measure this week in hopes of working out disagreements with the Senate after the election.

But Republicans were optimistic about eliminating last-minute concerns over a separate measure laying out rules for interrogating terrorism suspects and trying them before military tribunals. They said they were hoping to send the bill to Mr. Bush by the end of the week for a signing ceremony that could help them kick off the home stretch of the campaign with a message that Republicans were taking strong steps to protect the nation from terror attacks.

"I think we are good to go," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina and one of three Republican senators who last week forced the administration into negotiations over the detainee measure.

Democrats, while being careful to say that they had made no decision to block the detainee bill, expressed rising concerns about changes to the proposal that they said went beyond what Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, had described Monday as merely "technical changes."

The changes had been made over the weekend, as negotiators from the House and White House adjusted a compromise that had been reached between the White House and Senate Republicans on Thursday.

In one change, the original language said that a suspect had the right to "examine and respond to" all evidence used against him. Mr. Graham and his colleagues in resisting the White House, Senators John W. Warner of Virginia and John McCain of Arizona, had insisted that the provision was necessary to prevent so-called secret trials. The bill submitted late Monday dropped the word "examine" and left only "respond to," reviving complaints about secret trials, this time from Democrats.

In another, the original compromise said that evidence seized "outside the United States" could be admitted in court even if it had been obtained without a search warrant, a provision Republicans and Democrats agreed was necessary to deal with the unusual circumstances of seizing evidence on the battlefield.

The bill introduced Monday dropped the words "outside the United States," which Democrats said meant that prosecutors could ignore American legal standards on search warrants within the country. The bill also broadened the definition of an unlawful enemy combatant, from anyone "engaged in hostilities against the United States" to include anyone who "has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States."

"These are significant changes, not technical changes," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, where the original bill backed by Senators Warner, McCain and Graham was approved. "It's hard to know how to vote on a bill that's this much in motion."

DOJ_NMG_0069707

Republicans and the White House defended the change on unlawful combatants. It is narrower than the definition originally proposed by the White House, which said that anyone who materially supported hostilities could be prosecuted because it added the phrase "intentionally and purposefully." Senate and White House staff members said this would resolve the problem of what one Senate aide described as "the grandmother in Switzerland" who writes a check for charity that ends up going to a terrorist organization.

"Most of us feel if someone is engaged in actively assisting Al Qaeda or terrorists that they should fall under this legislation," Mr. McCain said.

Republicans and the White House explained the change to the provision about viewing evidence as, in Mr. Graham's words, "literally just a drafting error," and said the word "examine" would be restored.

Republicans also said they were trying to reach a compromise on the habeas corpus provision of the bill, which would deny a suspect the right to challenge his detention in court.

Democrats, who have found themselves on the losing end of the national security debate the past two national elections, said the changes to the bill had not yet reached a level that would cause them to try to block it altogether.

"We want to do this," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader. "And we want to do it in compliance with the direction from the Supreme Court. We want to do it in compliance with the Constitution."

Though there was momentum in both the House and Senate for the surveillance legislation, lawmakers were taking different approaches, and those involved said it had become apparent that a final resolution could not be quickly achieved. As a result, senators said they doubted that scarce floor time would be consumed moving it through the Senate before the recess when a final bill was out of reach.

"I don't think it is likely we will address it this week," said Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire and one of the lawmakers who has been negotiating the legislation with the Department of Justice.

The House bill, sponsored by Representative Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican who serves on the Intelligence Committee, could reach the House floor for a vote on Thursday. It seeks to "modernize" wiretapping law but, in the view of critics, would also give the president broader authority to conduct surveillance without court orders as long as he reported to Congress after doing so.

The bill has major differences from a Senate plan that would submit the entire wiretapping program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to rule on its constitutionality.

No Compromise On Wiretap Bill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

A high-profile Republican effort to clarify the legality of President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program will almost certainly not pass before Congress recesses at week's end for the fall campaign, leaving the legislation in deep trouble, congressional leaders conceded yesterday.

Efforts to reach agreement on a single version of the bill that could be brought before the Senate and House this week foundered yesterday on the insistence of key House members that they vote on a House version that they say is significantly tougher than the Senate's. House Republican leaders are deferring to the House bill's primary author, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), who is locked in one of the tightest House election contests of the season.

"I don't think that's possible," Wilson said of the House and Senate reaching agreement on a compromise bill. "Our focus has to be on passing the House bill."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said GOP leaders would still like to pass a bill this week "but that may be a bit of a stretch."

Failure to act this week would jeopardize Congress's ability to ever authorize the National Security Agency's surveillance efforts, which Republicans see as vital to national security but which many Democrats and civil libertarians regard as unconstitutional. GOP leaders say that if legislation is not completed, they will revisit the issue in a lame-duck session of Congress that will be convened after the Nov. 7 elections.

DOJ_NMG_0069708

But most independent political analysts expect Democrats to pick up between three and five seats in the Senate, and possibly more. Without the political pressure of a looming election and with a strengthened hand coming in the next Congress, Senate Democrats would probably filibuster Republican wiretapping legislation this year, congressional Democrats said.

Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, warned that a bill could still appear Friday night or Saturday morning, appended to other legislation. But she added, "If it doesn't happen at 3 a.m. Saturday, it will be become much harder for them to pass a bad bill."

Bills to authorize warrantless wiretapping and military commissions were supposed to pass this month as the twin centerpieces of a legislative agenda designed to bolster the party's national security credentials. But the surveillance bill was in trouble from the start.

White House officials never thought they needed congressional action to continue the NSA's warrantless surveillance, but Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and White House officials did work out legislation that would allow but not require the administration to submit the program to a secret court for constitutional review. Specter maintains that his bill would restore judicial review to a program that President Bush has made the domain of the executive branch alone.

But criticism of the Specter measure has been bipartisan. Opponents say a broad review of the program's constitutionality will do nothing to restore oversight of individual wiretaps. And recent changes to the bill have raised still more questions.

At administration insistence, Senate negotiators agreed to steer legal rulings about the president's broad surveillance to the Court of Review, a little-known appeals court created by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The three-judge court has rendered only one opinion in its 30-year history, and that opinion included its view that the president has inherent constitutional authority to eavesdrop without warrants as part of the U.S. effort against terrorism.

The Court of Review's commentary in its 2002 ruling has become the language cited by Bush and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales as proof the program passes constitutional muster.

Members of the Senate and administration have repeatedly said in public statements since June that their surveillance legislation would submit the president's program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court for review. But the FISA court and the Court of Review are quite dissimilar.

The 10-member FISA court does a brisk, nearly daily business considering whether to allow the government secret warrants to surveil terrorism and international-spying suspects. And several of the FISA court's members were disturbed last year to learn the president had authorized spying behind the court's back; some have pointedly questioned the program's legality in private discussions with top Justice Department officials.

Wilson drafted legislation that she said would restore some congressional oversight to the wiretapping program and maintain the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's right to issue warrants on wiretaps.

Detainee Bill In Final Stages (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

White House national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley met with Republican senators yesterday in an effort to reach final agreement on legislation that would govern the military trials of terrorism suspects, but they did not resolve a dispute over whether the captives should have access to U.S. courts.

The complex measure, which President Bush has called a top legislative priority, nonetheless appears likely to win approval by the time Congress adjourns at the end of this week. A vote is expected in the House today on a version of the legislation that the White House supports. It was unclear yesterday evening whether Republican leaders would allow any amendments to it.

The Senate-White House negotiations centered on what is known as a "court-stripping" provision that bars U.S. courts from considering habeas corpus filings by detainees over their confinement and treatment. It affirms the Bush administration's assertion that it has an incontestable right to hold persons detained as "unlawful enemy combatants" for the duration of the battle against terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0069709

"Habeas has to be resolved," and it will most likely be addressed on the Senate floor, John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told reporters after meeting with Hadley. Senate Republican leadership aides said that the floor debate could begin today and that the legislation setting rules for military commissions, as they are known, might be combined with a bill to create a new fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Three foes of the habeas corpus provision -- Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) -- introduced yesterday an amendment to overturn the administration-backed provision by allowing foreign nationals in military or CIA custody to challenge the legality of their detentions after one year.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who supports the suspension of the habeas corpus process, predicted that the Specter amendment "will be defeated, I think, in a bipartisan fashion, with a solid vote." But Graham said he has been exploring a different amendment on the matter, which he declined to describe.

Administration officials have said that the controversial provision is warranted because "unlawful enemy combatants" are not entitled to the same rights as regular soldiers or U.S. citizens; because isolation and the threat of indefinite detention aid U.S. interrogations; and because habeas corpus petitions could obstruct or delay the military trials of detainees.

But human rights groups and defense lawyers have condemned the provision as unconstitutional. They said it could leave detainees "to rot" in jail.

Thirty-one former ambassadors, including 20 who served in Republican administrations, jointly wrote Congress this week that "to eliminate habeas corpus relief for the citizens of other countries who have fallen into our hands cannot but make a mockery" of the administration's efforts to promote democracy. They also said that it would set a precedent that could jeopardize U.S. diplomats and military personnel overseas.

The negotiators also discussed yesterday a recent administration-backed change in the legislation to broaden the definition of potential unlawful enemy combatants in a way that would allow the government to detain and try a wider range of foreign nationals than envisioned earlier.

Other recent changes to the bill aroused controversy yesterday. In one, the administration and its House allies would give the defense secretary wide latitude to depart, without independent judicial scrutiny, from the rules and detainee protections the legislation would create. It would allow him to do so whenever he deems it "practicable or consistent with military or intelligence activities."

Georgetown University law professor Neal K. Katyal, who represented Salim Ahmed Hamdan in a case in which the Supreme Court overturned in June the administration's previous military-trial procedures, said the discretion, as written, is broad enough for the Defense Department to suspend a presumption of innocence for defendants. The new rules "themselves build in all the flexibility the secretary of defense needs to depart massively," Katyal said.

Other defense lawyers criticized yesterday recent changes that make it easier for prosecutors to introduce evidence without challenge and that eliminate defendants' right to examine all the evidence presented against them. The draft bill would, however, preserve defendants' right to respond to that evidence.

A Last Hurdle For Bill On Detainees: Access To US Court (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON

Some 56 months after the first terrorism suspects arrived at the US prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, Congress is rushing to pass new legislation on how to bring them to trial - or not.

It's the "not" - President Bush's claim that any "enemy combatant" can be detained indefinitely, without access to US courts - that is the last obstacle to finishing a bill this week.

The White House and a trio of Republican senators already resolved how trials would handle secret evidence and evidence obtained using harsh interrogation techniques, allowing detainees to see evidence against them, but in redacted form. Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina also forced the White House to back off its intent to reinterpret terms of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, especially the ban on "humiliating and degrading treatment."

DOJ_NMG_0069710

But the deal did not affect a provision that critics say is a more fundamental threat to the rule of law and the nation's reputation: a bid to strip federal courts of jurisdiction to hear cases brought by "unlawful enemy combatants" seeking to challenge their detainment.

Supporters say the action is needed because a flood of pending habeas cases is a distraction from the war on terror and strains military resources. Critics say that's no justification for curbing a fundamental constitutional right.

"A persuasive argument can be made that the Writ of Habeas Corpus, the Great Writ, is the single most important bulwark in protecting our rights and freedoms ... and those who have suspended it have often been treated harshly by history," said John Huston, a retired rear admiral and former top lawyer in the Navy, at a hearing called Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"It is too facile to say that the men detained in Guantánamo 'are all terrorists,' 'the worst of the worst,' and 'all killers.' Maybe they are. Maybe they aren't. The point of habeas corpus is to answer those questions," he adds.

Monday's hearing, attended by three senators, marks the only hearing on the habeas corpus provision before the House and Senate vote on the bill. The legislation may come before the full House as early as Wednesday.

"This is momentous, far-reaching legislation, which is being rushed through on the eve of elections," added Thomas Sullivan, a former US Attorney for the northern district of Illinois, who has represented 10 Guantánamo detainees, three of whom were released in May 2006.

Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, who called Monday's hearing after reviewing last week's deal on military commissions, says he wants to offer an amendment simply deleting the provision eliminating habeas corpus.

The US Constitution says there are only two conditions for abolishing habeas corpus: rebellion or invasion when "the public safety may require it." Senator Specter and some conservative critics of the draft bill on military commissions say that neither condition is currently met.

"The United States is neither in a state of rebellion nor invasion. Consequently, it would be problematic for Congress to modify the constitutionally protected writ of habeas corpus under current events," Kenneth Starr, the former independent prosecutor on the Whitewater investigation during the Clinton presidency, wrote in a letter to Specter.

The issues involved in this legislation are complex and important, say those on both sides. Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, who backs the legislation, said annual status review hearings, called for under the Detainee Treatment Act, give war-on-terror detainees the same access to meaningful review as habeas corpus.

"The level of due process that the detainees are getting far exceeds the level of due process accorded to any combatants - captured combatants, lawful or unlawful - in any war in human history," says David Rivkin, a Washington attorney who consults with the White House on detainee issues. It's a "fair and balanced approach to judicial review, eliminating repetitive challenges, banning forum shopping, and yet preserving the necessary essentials of a judicial review for detained unlawful combatants," he adds.

In debate this week, both sides will be watching how aggressively Democrats defend the habeas provision. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, was the only member of his party to attend Monday's hearings. He says he worries that only about 5 percent of the Guantánamo detainees were picked up by US troops on the battlefield, and that some innocents may have been turned over to the US to "settle a score" or for a bounty.

The issue has the potential to affect every American, says Eric Freedman, a constitutional lawyer at Hofstra Law School and author of a book on habeas corpus. "Every story about an innocent business traveler or tourist picked up through error is [one] that could happen to anybody," he says. "The whole concept of checks and balances is that when the executive branch acts as judge, jury, and executioner, government power is going to be exercised wrongly."

Rush To Error (WP)

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

AFTER BARELY three weeks of debate, the Senate today will take up a momentous piece of legislation that would set new legal rules for the detention, interrogation and trial of accused terrorists. We have argued that the only remedy to the mess made by the Bush administration in holding hundreds of detainees without charge at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere since 2001 was congressional action. Yet rather than carefully weigh the issues, Congress has allowed itself to be stampeded into a vote on hastily written but far-reaching legal provisions, in a preelection climate in which dissenters risk being labeled as soft on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0069711

As we have said before, there is no need for Congress to act immediately. No terrorist suspects are being held in the CIA detention "program" that President Bush has so vigorously defended. Justice for the al-Qaeda suspects he has delivered to Guantanamo has already been delayed for years by the administration's actions and can wait a few more months. What's important is that any legal system approved by Congress pass the tests set by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) months ago: that the United States can be proud of it, that the world will see it as fair and humane, and that the Supreme Court can uphold it.

The compromise legislation cobbled together in the past week by administration officials and a group of Republican senators, including Mr. Warner, doesn't pass those tests. It would improve greatly on the administration's past practices as well as its original plans for trials of enemy combatants, but critical flaws remain. If these are not corrected, U.S. treatment of foreign prisoners is likely to remain a source of global controversy that undermines the war against terrorism. Senators -- and this includes Democrats who have been largely and cravenly absent from this month's debate -- would do best to postpone action on the bill. Failing that, they should support amendments to correct the worst problems.

Foremost among these is the legislation's attempt to prevent U.S. courts from ruling on the treatment of prisoners in the future, including any procedures the Bush administration might adopt for interrogations. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) fought for language in the bill that he believes would stop practices such as simulated drowning, prolonged sleep deprivation and induced hypothermia, but many lawyers believe the administration could interpret the law to permit such abuse. Normally the courts would provide a check on administration policies, but the bill would prevent this by banning prisoners from bringing lawsuits over their detention and treatment. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has promised an amendment to restore judicial oversight. Without it, the Bush administration's abuse of detainees is likely to continue.

A second major problem with the bill is its definition of who could be regarded as an enemy combatant and thus be subject to the exceptional detention and trial procedures. Another hasty agreement over the weekend would allow foreign civilians in the United States or even U.S. citizens to be arrested and held without charge indefinitely on grounds that they "supported hostilities against the United States." This goes far beyond current case law, which reserves unlawful-combatant status for detainees engaged in an armed conflict against the United States or its allies. Endorsement of this standard by Congress would give extraordinary power to the Defense Department to arrest and hold foreigners and Americans without charge, and it would set a dangerous precedent for other nations. It's not hard to imagine civilian American aid workers being arrested by foreign governments as "enemy combatants" for helping people deemed to be terrorists.

White House pressure may have persuaded many in Congress that the easiest course is to quickly approve the detention bill in its present form and leave town. If so, their actions almost surely will come back to haunt them. Until this country adopts a legal system for the war on terrorism that meets Mr. Warner's standard, the war itself will be unwinnable.

Detainees Compromise: Lose-lose (USAT)

By Nat Hentoff

USA Today, September 27, 2006

The rebellion by Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina against the president's proposed legislation to comply with the Supreme Court's June decision on the treatment of enemy combatants (Hamdan v. Rumsfeld) has ended — with fanfare — in a “compromise.”

McCain, who has insisted that the principles he fought for are more important than his chances for the presidency, declared: “There's no doubt that the integrity and letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved.” He also said, “We got what we wanted.”

But the Supreme Court, in rebuking the president for having violated Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions (to which the United States is a signatory), made plain both the letter and spirit of this minimal standard of “humane treatment.”

DOJ_NMG_0069712

Article 3 prohibits "at any time and in any place whatsoever … cruel treatment and torture … (and) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment."

The president is also pleased with this compromise because, he says, it preserves "the CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets."

The CIA program involved, as the president has said, "alternative techniques" of interrogation — details of which have been revealed by human rights groups, reporters and McCain himself as specifically and vividly violating the letter and spirit of Article 3.

How, then, does this compromise, as McCain says, result in no losers, only winners and winners? The agreement prohibits — under our own 1996 War Crimes Act — such "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions as torture, rape and murder. (These are actual war crimes under that 1996 statute.)

But, in this three-card-monte game of compromise, it is the president who will have the dominant role in deciding, by executive order, which alternative techniques are grave breaches. How will we know whether the CIA, or any of our interrogators, are committing these war crimes? We won't know all of them, and maybe none.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley points out that "specific techniques" used on terrorism suspects are classified. (We can't let the terrorists know what's in store for them once they're taken into custody.)

As for practitioners of such "coercive" interrogations that could lead to charges of war crimes under American law, the "compromise" protects them from prosecution for past violations. This is known in our lingo as a "get-out-of-jail-free card."

Logically, I would think this amnesty would also include those all the way up the chain of command who authorized "alternative techniques" constituting "grave breaches" of the Conventions.

I'm not surprised that the CIA also agrees with the main belligerents that there are no losers in this agreement. And CIA operatives who have been buying government-funded liability insurance for fear of prosecution under the War Crimes Act need worry no longer.

This pact's most radical failure to adhere not only to the Geneva Conventions but also to a core right in our Constitution is in its allowing the three celebrated senators and the president to revoke habeas corpus petitions on conditions of confinement by any alien detainee — not only those at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba — designated, with or without charges, as an "enemy combatant."

This view of The Great Writ as an irritating inconvenience in the war on terrorism — particularly denounced by Graham for "clogging the courts" with detainee petitions — is embedded in the renowned Senate Armed Services Committee bill generated by McCain, Warner and Graham. It is also included in House legislation dealing with detainees and will be enfolded in the compromise produced by the same three senators applauded by some civil libertarians for standing up to the president.

The result will be that hundreds of detainees, among them many who have never been charged with any crime, will no longer have lawyers to bring their claims of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment by guards and interrogators. This is contrary to the Supreme Court having authorized such habeas petitions in the 2004 Rasul v. Bush ruling and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

Despite all the purported obeisance to the Geneva Conventions in this agreement that ended the McCain-Warner-Graham mutiny, there will be no way for Americans or the world to know whether these "enemy combatants" — many of whom might be innocent — have been subjected to the same outrages upon personal dignity that this epic struggle by the three senators presumably prevents.

During a previous "victory" by McCain over the president — much publicized around the world — he secured an amendment in the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 banning "cruel, inhumane and degrading" treatment of prisoners.

But in moving that legislation, including the famous McCain amendment, into law, the president added one of his elastic "signing statements" that he would not necessarily implement the amendment if it interfered with national security.

President Bush needn't slip in a signing statement this time around. With the elimination of habeas petitions on conditions of confinement, all of our interrogation centers around the world in which alien detainees are held as enemy combatants will become "black sites" — wholly outside of laws.

There will be losers after all.

Nat Hentoff is an authority on the U.S. Constitution and author of The War on the Bill of Rights and the Gathering Resistance.

DOJ_NMG_0069713

EU To Probe Bank Data Monitoring By U.S. (AP)

By Constant Brand

AP, September 26, 2006

European data protection officials agreed Tuesday to investigate further allegations that a Belgian-based company's sharing of confidential banking records with U.S. authorities for anti-terror probes could have violated EU laws.

After their talks, the European Union's 25 national data protection officers said the problem raised "immediate concerns about the lack of transparency which has surrounded" a secret transfer deal between the U.S. Treasury and Belgian-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT.

"The issue is complex, both factually and legally," said a statement issued by the panel's vice-chair, Jose Luis Pinar Manas, director of Spain's data protection agency. "Recognizing the seriousness of the questions that have been raised, the working party agreed to continue fact-finding and conduct further analysis based on all relevant factual and legal elements."

EU spokesman Friso Roscam Abbing said the EU experts will meet again in November and would then issue an opinion, including possible stronger safeguards that EU governments should adopt to prevent the misuse of trans-Atlantic transfer of private banking records.

The November meeting will also assess an investigation the Belgian data privacy commission has launched into the SWIFT case, to see whether the firm violated Belgian privacy rules and similar EU rules. The Belgian report is due in a few weeks.

The review is in response to questions about the legality of SWIFT's sharing of banking records with U.S. authorities for use in anti-terror investigations.

The U.S. Treasury has acknowledged that since the Sept. 11 attacks it has tracked millions of confidential financial transactions handled by SWIFT.

SWIFT routes about 11 million financial transactions daily between 7,800 banks and other financial institutions in 200 countries, recording customer names, account numbers and other identifying information.

Before Tuesday's panel talks, German Data Protection Commissioner Peter Schaar said all clients of financial institutions "have a right to know" what happens to their confidential data.

Both SWIFT and the U.S. authorities say records were subpoenaed as part of targeted investigations into suspected terrorist activity.

In its defense, SWIFT reiterated on Monday that it received "significant protections and assurances" that the data transferred to the U.S. was used confidentially.

In a statement signed by SWIFT's CEO Leonard H. Schrank, the company said the U.S. Treasury does not have unlimited access to data stored by SWIFT, and the information it got was used only "for the exclusive purpose of terrorism investigations."

The European Parliament has demanded that EU governments, the European Central Bank and the European Commission fully explain the extent to which they were aware of the secret data transfer deal, and has put pressure on them to prevent such transfers if they violate EU law.

The commission and Finland, which currently holds the EU presidency, have said their hands were tied and that it was up to the Belgian authorities to make sure their data protection laws were in line with EU regulations.

The Belgian government said in June that Washington had subpoenaed data only from SWIFT's U.S. office — but not its global headquarters outside Brussels.

EU Justice and Home Affairs Commissioner Franco Frattini said he had never been informed about SWIFT's program.

Europe Panel Defers Report On Bank Data Sifting (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 26 — A panel of European data security officials on Tuesday put off a final report on the legality of an American program to monitor millions of international banking transactions. But they said they had “immediate concerns” about the arrangement.

DOJ_NMG_0069714

The officials agreed to investigate further whether European Union laws were being violated by a Belgium consortium's sharing of confidential banking records with American counterterrorism officials.

After their meeting here, the European officials said they had concerns about "the lack of transparency" of the arrangement between the Treasury Department and the banking consortium, known as Swift, which stands for the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication.

"The issue is complex, both factually and legally," said a statement issued by the panel's vice chairman, José Luis Piñar Mañas, director of Spain's data security agency. The data officers "agreed to continue fact-finding and conduct further analysis based on all relevant factual and legal elements." Some officials had pushed for a report this week.

A spokesman for the European Union, Friso Roscam Abbing, said the data officials would meet again in November and would then issue an opinion, including possible recommendations for safeguards that union governments should adopt to prevent the improper trans-Atlantic transfer of private banking records.

The November meeting will also assess an investigation into the Swift case by the Belgian National Bank, to see whether the banking consortium violated Belgian privacy policies and similar European Union rules. The Belgian report is due in a few weeks.

The review comes in response to questions about the legality of Swift's sharing of banking records with American authorities for use in antiterror investigations.

The Treasury has acknowledged that since the Sept. 11 attacks it has tracked millions of confidential financial transactions handled by Swift. The banking consortium routes about 11 million financial transactions daily between 7,800 banks and other financial institutions in 200 countries, recording customer names, account numbers and other identifying information.

Disputing An 'Obscure' Organization's Spokesman (WP)

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

When Nadia Bilbassy-Charters, Washington correspondent for the Dubai-based newspaper al-Arabiya, was called on by President Bush at yesterday's news conference, she asked about remarks attributed to Gijs de Vries, the European Union's antiterrorism coordinator.

Bilbassy-Charters: If I may, Mr. President, do you agree with the analysis from the counter chief European -- counterterrorism chief European spokesman who said today that the international support for terrorism has receded. Do you agree with that?

Bush : . . . First of all, I didn't -- what was this person a spokesman for?

Bilbassy-Charters: Counterterrorism chief in Europe.

Bush : Some obscure spokesman?

Bilbassy-Charters: No, actually, he has a name.

Bush : Okay, he's a got a name. Well, no, I don't agree with the spokesman for the obscure organization that said that the international commitment to fighting terror is declining.

Guantanamo Makes Adjustments For Ramadan (AP)

By Michael Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 27, 2006

Muslim detainees at Guantanamo Bay entered Ramadan with traditional sweets, dates and honey — but without a military chaplain to lead them in prayer during Islam's holy month.

Nearly all the alleged al-Qaida and Taliban members held at the detention center in Cuba are observing Ramadan, officials said Tuesday. Meals are offered before dawn and after sunset to accommodate their fasting during daylight hours.

The adjustments for Ramadan, which began Saturday, come as the U.S. prison faces accusations of religious insensitivity.

A court challenge seeking the return of a full-time Muslim chaplain to the base has been filed by one detainee's attorney, who said that regular religious services would help "preserve the sanity" of the detainees.

"I think it would preserve order and discourage these suicides that are happening there," attorney Gaillard Hunt said.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the motion, citing ongoing litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0069715

Muslim chaplains — who regularly counseled detainees in the prison's early years — have been assigned to U.S. commands with larger numbers of Islamic service members, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand.

"The detainee population generally rejects outside religious guidance," he said.

Detainees meet their religious needs primarily by relying on each other, with cell blocks designating an imam or prayer leader, he said.

Ramadan arrived this year with elevated security following three suicides in June.

A newspaper published for soldiers on the U.S. base ran a front-page article earlier this month stressing Ramadan's significance to Muslims.

Fasting detainees will have a meal before dawn, and a "double portion" meal in the evening to ensure they receive enough nutrition. Medical personnel will monitor their health, Durand said.

Guantanamo does have an Islamic cultural advisor who meets with the detainees to discuss their concerns, and chaplains are available to come in and handle delicate tasks, such as the Islamic funeral prayer for the suicide victims in June, Durand said.

Separately, a Red Cross delegation that began a two-week visit to the Guantanamo prison on Monday has met with base officials and was hoping to get a first glimpse of 14 high-level terror suspects previously locked up in CIA secret prisons.

Simon Schorno, a spokesman for the Red Cross in Washington, said the delegation would interview other detainees as it waits for the newest arrivals, including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, to accept their offer for a meeting.

U.S. Army Gen. Bantz J. Craddock said last week that the detainees would be made available around Oct. 1.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Officials Forgo Supreme Court Appeal In DHS Labor Case (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, September 27, 2006

Government officials on Monday night passed up their last chance to seek reversal of a court decision blocking proposed labor relations reforms at the Homeland Security Department.

The solicitor general's office, which brings cases to the Supreme Court on behalf of government agencies, let a midnight deadline pass without filing an appeal at the high court.

"We're OK with that because it allows the department to move forward in implementing our labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in the litigation process," said Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman.

In June, an appeals panel unanimously upheld, and even broadened, an earlier ruling that the proposed system would illegally curtail collective bargaining rights for employees by giving management the ability to cancel negotiated agreements. DHS and Justice Department officials in August decided against challenging that decision before the full appellate court, but left open the option for a Supreme Court appeal.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on why the solicitor general chose not to pursue the Supreme Court appeal.

Orluskie said DHS officials will begin talks soon on how to rework the system so it meets legal standards.

"What we're going to do moving forward is sit down with our component agencies, sit down with the unions, and discuss how we move forward and where we go from here," Orluskie said.

Representatives of the federal employee unions that brought the case were pleased at the government's decision.

"DHS has made the right decision," said Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union. "It is now time for DHS to put this adversarial proceeding behind it and to join with NTEU in focusing solely on the agency's critical mission of protecting the American people."

"This is the smartest thing DHS has done in quite some time," said Mark Roth, a lawyer for the American Federation of Government Employees. "DHS management was in a battle they knew they couldn't win."

DOJ_NMG_0069716

If DHS wants to rework its collective bargaining scheme, it must re-enter the meet-and-confer process with the unions representing its employees and resubmit the regulations to the Federal Register. The department is free, however, to move ahead with personnel changes that don't involve labor relations.

"We are working full-on with performance management," Orluskie said. He noted that DHS has trained 11,000 managers and supervisors on the new system, which focuses on job performance and will eventually link pay raises to performance ratings.

"It is my expectation that DHS will now engage in meaningful discussions with unions and management associations [on labor relations plans]," said Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, ranking member of a Senate federal workforce oversight subcommittee, in a statement Tuesday.

The law that created DHS, and allowed officials to rewrite personnel rules, gave the department five years for labor relations changes. As a result, department's authorization to modify the bargaining system ends in January 2009.

No Supreme Court Appeal For MaxHR (FCW)

By Wade-Hahn Chan

Federal Computer Week, September 27, 2006

The Homeland Security Department has decided not to pursue an appeal to the Supreme Court for the MaxHR human resources system. The agency has now passed on all available options for appeal regarding the labor-relations portions of the pay-for-performance system.

Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman, said the decision came from the Justice Department's Office of the Solicitor General late Sept. 25. The decision allows the agency to move forward to "pursue labor relations flexibilities rather than spending additional time in litigation," Orluskie said.

"If we go to the Supreme Court, we'd go on and on and on," he said. "What we're going to do is engage with our other partners, with the components, OPM, sit down with the unions and consider all available options."

MaxHR had been tied down in courts because of problems with ensuring collective bargaining rights for employees. The original court decision, in August 2005, blocked labor-relations portions of MaxHR and was eventually reaffirmed by an appeals court in June.

Unions applauded the decision and agreed with DHS on the need to move past the court battles.

"DHS has made the right decision — for itself, for its employees and for our nation," said Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union. The union led the fight against MaxHR in court. "It is now time for DHS to put this adversarial proceeding behind it and to join with NTEU in focusing solely on the agency's critical mission of protecting the American people."

"DHS management was in a battle they knew they couldn't win," said Mark Roth, general counsel of the American Federation of Government Employees. "The decision not to appeal was the right thing to do for management, and more importantly for DHS employees."

Currently, nearly 11,000 managers and supervisors are subject to MaxHR's performance management program, with almost 4,000 nonbargaining unit employees under the program. An additional 6,700 managers and employees will convert from the General Schedule system to MaxHR in October.

Administration Opts Not To Appeal Court Rejection Of DHS Personnel System (FEDTIMES)

By Tim Kauffman

Federal Times, September 27, 2006

The Bush administration won't appeal a June court decision striking down key parts of the Homeland Security Department's personnel system, a department spokesman said.

The government had until midnight Sept. 25 to appeal the case to the Supreme Court. The decision not to appeal was made by the Justice Department, which was representing Homeland Security in the case, Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said.

Justice had no comment.

DOJ_NMG_0069717

The focus now will shift to figuring out how to proceed from here, Orluskie said, adding that Homeland Security soon will meet with officials from inside the department, the Office of Personnel Management and the unions to begin those discussions.

The department will "consider all available options in going forward from here," Orluskie said.

The head of the National Treasury Employees Union, which led a coalition of five unions that sued the department over the personnel changes, said the government made the right decision.

"It is now time for DHS to put this adversarial proceeding behind it and to join with NTEU in focusing solely on the agency's critical mission of protecting the American people," NTEU National President Colleen Kelley said.

The June 27 decision from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit invalidated changes the department had proposed making to the Title 5 rules governing collective bargaining, labor management procedures, and employee appeals of disciplinary actions.

The department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the reformed personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors will convert on Oct. 1, Orluskie said.

Similar changes to the labor management and appeals systems designed for the Defense Department were ruled illegal in February by a judge with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia; an appeal of that decision is scheduled to be argued this fall.

Homeland Security Department Ends Litigation On Workplace Rules (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

At the Department of Homeland Security, litigation over new workplace rules is out.

The Bush administration, after losing three times to a labor coalition led by the National Treasury Employees Union, has decided not to file a petition at the Supreme Court, a spokesman for the department said yesterday.

The union had argued in federal district court and before a three-judge appeals panel that the administration's plan would gut the collective-bargaining rights of Homeland Security Department employees and undermine their rights to fair hearings when they sought to appeal major disciplinary action.

The courts found that the department had overreached and blocked the introduction of key parts of the new rules.

"I am very pleased," Colleen M. Kelley, president of the union, said of the decision not to continue litigation. "I think they did the right thing for the department, the employees and the country. We are looking forward to working with them on the priorities for the department."

Larry Orluskie, a spokesman for Homeland Security, said that Paul D. Clement, solicitor general at the Justice Department, informed officials late Monday that he would not take the case to the high court.

"This decision is okay with the Department of Homeland Security because it allows us to move forward toward implementing labor-relations flexibility rather than spending additional time in litigation," Orluskie said. "We will continue to engage with our components and partners in the unions to consider all options in moving forward."

Administration officials declined to discuss what Clement's decision means for the Defense Department, which also has been stopped by a federal court from trying to curb union rights as part of the new National Security Personnel System. The Pentagon has appealed the court ruling, but Mark Roth, general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, said that the Defense Department "would be smart to end this now."

Four years ago, Congress gave the Homeland Security Department a green light to overhaul how it pays, promotes and disciplines about 110,000 employees as part of the larger reorganization to strengthen homeland security and fight terrorism. But the rollout of the new system was slowed by legal setbacks in the past two years, and the department no longer has "a hard timeline," as one official put it, for completing the new personnel system.

About 4,000 supervisors and nonunion employees at Homeland Security headquarters, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center have been placed under a new performance-management system. An additional 6,700 managers and supervisors at Citizenship and Immigration Services and Customs and Border Protection will convert to the new performance system next month.

DOJ_NMG_0069718

Under the new system, managers and employees set goals, link those goals to the department's objectives, and measure how well they meet expectations laid out for their performance. About 11,000 people have been trained on the new system.

The department hopes to use the system to tie job performance ratings to pay raises and bonuses but has no deadline for shifting employees to performance-based pay.

Rollout of the new pay system also has suffered from turnover in the department. Almost all officials who designed or planned the new workplace rules have retired or left the government. Marta Brito Perez, who had served as a top policy official at the Office of Personnel Management, was recently named as the top personnel adviser to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and will play a key role in deciding the department's next steps.

Union officials said they envision that the department and unions will meet to discuss possible options for replacing the rules blocked by the courts. Administration officials declined to discuss their next steps but did not rule out more talking, making changes through a presidential order or returning to Congress for a change in law.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, "is hopeful" that the department and unions "will approach the next round of discussions with an open mind," a spokeswoman said.

In a statement, Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (Hawaii), the ranking Democrat on the Senate's federal workforce subcommittee, said, "it is my expectation that DHS will now engage in meaningful discussions with unions and management associations."

Chertoff, Democrats Disagree Over Cargo Scans (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday sparred with Democratic lawmakers over the feasibility of scanning cargo for nuclear materials at foreign ports before ships depart for the United States.

Mr. Chertoff told the House Homeland Security Committee that total screening is unrealistic and that other measures are being implemented to protect U.S. ports from such terrorist threats.

Cargo is screened by manifest and cargo lists, but is not scanned for radiation until it reaches U.S. ports, where Mr. Chertoff said the goal is to screen 80 percent of the cargo by year's end.

"Why can't we do it on the other side of the ocean before they depart?" asked Rep. Peter A. DeFazio of Oregon. "Why has there been resistance on the part of the administration and the majority here, to screening all the containers on the other side of the ocean?"

In response, Mr. Chertoff said, "For one thing, we don't own foreign ports, Congressman."

The hearing focused on the department's goals for 2007, including border protection, and members on both sides of the aisle asked that grants to various cities, including Washington, be increased.

Mr. Chertoff said U.S. and foreign officials soon will conduct some screening at the ship's point of departure, but the answer did not satisfy Mr. DeFazio.

"We retain the right of sovereignty in international trade and we can refuse the entry of any cargo," said the Oregon Democrat. "The Chinese regularly do this for commercial purposes; we can sure as heck do it for homeland security purposes.

"Anybody who isn't cooperating with us, we say, 'Well, that's fine, but guess what? Nothing's leaving your port to the United States of America anymore.' It's pretty simple."

Such action, Mr. Chertoff said, would cut off 75 percent of international trade and lead to a depressed economy.

Mr. DeFazio proposed a three-year period to implement such a strategy, but Mr. Chertoff balked and called it an "artificial deadline" that would be "as unrealistic as passing a law that says in three years cancer has to be cured."

Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat, called Mr. Chertoff's statements "a terrible message."

"You are saying that after the terrorists are in the air coming to the United States from another country that it's already too late, that the same thing is also true with a nuclear bomb in a ship heading for a port in the United States," he said.

The Homeland Security secretary said officials are meeting with shippers and foreign governments to better secure cargo.

DOJ_NMG_0069719

One constraint is that some ports are on land already "full of radioactive material" that would constantly set off false alarms.

"We all would desire to have radiation scanning before things are loaded on ships," Mr. Chertoff said. "But I'm not going to sell the American people pie in the sky. I'm going to give something that's realistic, actionable and produces real results."

Air Travelers Glad To Have Liquids, Gels Back (AP)

By Daniel Yee

The AP, September 26, 2006

ATLANTA - Happy that new security rules have cleared their liquids and gels for takeoff, air travelers presented small, clear plastic bags filled with toiletries for inspection Tuesday, but long lines grew at some airports as others confused about the changes filled trash cans with containers that were too large.

Most toiletries can be in containers no larger than 3 ounces, and they must be zipped up in plastic bags that are quart-sized or smaller. Those limits threw off passengers who scrambled at security checkpoints to toss out bottles of shaving cream and hand lotion or to find the proper plastic bags.

"It's an inconvenience," said Ginni Dewbray, whose husband finally found a bag to carry a small bottle of lotion after asking several fellow travelers in a security line at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

"If they're going to stand there and ask you to have plastic bags, they should give them out. They're not that expensive," she said.

Trash bins outside airport security checkpoints filled up with forbidden items, though not as much as they did last month when a broader ban was put in place. Many travelers were grateful for the relaxed rules, which allow them to carry drinks, makeup and other items on board their flights.

"I was glad to see (the changes)," said Vicki McGowan, a professional meeting planner at Oakland International Airport for a flight to Reno, Nev. "How can lipstick or mascara put people at risk?"

The new rules, announced Monday by the federal Transportation Security Administration, allow travel-sized toiletries to be carried aboard flights in a sealable clear plastic bag. Some items are permitted in any amount: saline solution, eye drops and prescription and nonprescription medicine, according to Transportation Security Administration spokesman Christopher White.

Drinks, liquids and gels purchased in airport stores inside security checkpoints can be carried into passenger cabins. Baby formula is allowed but must be inspected.

The rules replace an outright ban on liquids, lotions and gels ordered Aug. 10 after an alleged plot to bomb U.S.-bound jetliners was foiled.

TSA chief Kip Hawley said the stricter ban is no longer needed, and that he was pleased Tuesday's transition to the new rules went as smoothly as it did.

"I woke up scared to death this morning," Hawley told reporters in Washington. "It went great today."

Parents were some of the happiest beneficiaries of the new rules, glad to have regained some of their tools in the challenging job of keeping young children content on a plane.

Leslie Walker of Plano, Texas, was planning to carry drinks for her 5-year-old daughter and 18-month-old son onto their flight from Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport to El Paso.

"It was really a relief to know that I didn't have to get here this morning and repack everything. It saved me a little time," she said.

Airport retailers were thrilled at the news, and some had already begun stocking up on plastic, zip-top bags. The Paradies Shops, an Atlanta-based company with more than 500 stores in 60 airports across the U.S. and Canada, will hand out clear plastic bags to customers for free.

"It's good news for everybody," said Bobbi Passavanti, the company's spokeswoman. "It's great for the traveler."

San Francisco airport spokeswoman Kandace Bender said it was too early to tell if sales are up but concessionaires selling liquids beyond security checkpoints were "very happy campers," on Tuesday.

The rules were too much bother for some passengers, such as Pat Henderson, of Palm Coast, Fla., who threw away the deodorant and toothpaste in his carryon before entering the security check line at the Atlanta airport.

DOJ_NMG_0069720

"It's not worth the hassle," he said. "I just don't want to deal with it."

By 8 a.m., a trash bin at a checkpoint in Atlanta was 3 feet deep with water bottles and 16-ounce containers of toiletries, including shaving gel and hand lotion. But TSA officials there were going easy on travelers the first day of the new rules, allowing them to carry proper-sized toiletries in gallon-sized plastic bags.

After testing a variety of explosives, the FBI and other laboratories found that tiny amounts of substances - so small they fit into a quart-size plastic bag - can't blow up an airliner.

In Washington, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the new rules "are likely to be with us for the foreseeable future." Testifying before the House Homeland Security Committee, Chertoff said the new rules would be in place for at least six weeks, but he declined to say whether they would remain as long as six months.

Fliers Allowed Liquids, But Some Get Frustration (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Larry Copeland

USA Today, September 27, 2006

Travelers went to airports Tuesday with the right to carry liquids and toiletries on planes again, but they also found occasional long lines and strict security rules that made some wonder if their toothpaste was worth the trouble.

New rules allow passengers to bring small amounts of liquids, gels and travel-size toiletries through checkpoints, provided the items are in 1-quart clear plastic bags.

"For all practical purposes, you still have to put everything in a checked bag," Matt Daniels said as he waited for his luggage at the baggage carousel in Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport. "Who goes around carrying liquids in plastic bags?"

Some passengers said they were confused by a requirement that the bottles fit in the 1-quart plastic bag. Others stumbled over a policy limiting each traveler to one bag. And a few were frustrated with trying to find the right size of bag.

Mike Pattani, who owns a Candy Express store at Hartsfield-Jackson, gave 80 to 100 bags to travelers who came in frantically looking for Transportation Security Administration (TSA)-approved toiletry storage. Then he started charging 25 cents a bag.

"So many people were asking for them, I had to start charging," Pattani said.

The new rules caused logjams of more than double the normal wait times at the security checkpoints at Hartsfield-Jackson from 7 to 8:30 a.m., according to Christopher White, TSA spokesman for the Southeastern region. The usual wait time on Tuesday morning is no more than 20 minutes. Passengers waited in line for 45 minutes Tuesday, he said.

"Anytime we change procedures, there is a period of time before the public is fully aware of them and used to using them," White said, noting that Atlanta wait times returned to normal by 9 a.m.

Several airports saw routine lines and conditions. At Washington's Ronald Reagan National Airport, an airport employee stood near the security checkpoint handing out 1-quart plastic bags. TSA screener Chloe Oxendine asked everyone entering the checkpoint area, "Do you have liquids, creams or gels?" and checked them for appropriate size before people got in line.

Cyril Daniel, a screener at National, said 40%-50% of travelers were bringing liquids through security Tuesday, but many carried them in containers or bags that exceeded size limits. When Daniel told travelers the items weren't allowed, "they didn't make much of a fuss about it."

Gloria Cabe was one of the travelers who got it right. She says she read every word of the newspaper coverage of the rule change Tuesday before boarding her flight from Washington to White Plains, N.Y., for an overnight trip.

"It makes an unspeakable difference," Cabe gushed about her ability to carry on toiletries. "There's not an adequate word to describe the difference."

TSA chief Kip Hawley said he felt "everything went smoothly across the country" on the first day since the ban was relaxed. The ban had been put in place seven weeks ago after authorities announced they had foiled a plot by terrorists to blow up several trans-Atlantic planes with liquid bombs.

Hawley said FBI tests have since shown that small amounts of liquids on planes are extremely unlikely to be used to bring down a plane.

DOJ_NMG_0069721

For travelers who don't want to carry their liquids or toiletries through checkpoints, the new rules allow passengers to bring toiletries or drinks of any size on to a plane — provided they have been purchased at shops located in secure airport areas. But frequent traveler Jon Morris of Devon, Pa., said he's worried about price-gouging.

"Prices are already sky-high for water and other toiletries" at airports, he said. "They probably will increase prices until there is an outcry about that as well."

Carolyn Wright discovered a surprising nuance when she showed up Tuesday morning at Austin-Bergstrom International Airport in Texas. Wright figured that her half-empty 6-ounce toothpaste tube would comply with the 3-ounce limit.

She had no luck. A screener confiscated it. Wright was too startled to complain. "I just said, "You can have it. I'll buy a new one." Frank reported in Washington; Copeland in Atlanta. Contributing: Martin Kasindorf in Los Angeles.

Air Travelers Make Dry Runs Despite Rules (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Many air travelers, given the opportunity to once again bring toothpaste, shampoo and other toiletries aboard flights, yesterday decided instead it was more convenient to forgo their new rights.

"I stuck to my old routine, it's just easier," said Laura Zlomek of Frostburg, Md., who was flying from Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport to attend a wedding in Hilton Head Island, S.C. "This way I don't have to say I have any liquids."

Many passengers coming or going from Washington-area airports yesterday echoed Miss Zlomek's rationale.

"We were scared to bother to even try," said Donna Joule, 43, of McAllen, Texas, at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. "When I learned of the ban a few weeks ago I thought, 'Oh, now we can't bring liquids anymore.' But then I realized we really didn't need that stuff anyway."

At BWI, "I just got in the habit of checking my bags, it's just easier that way," said Kia Baskerville, 34, of Annapolis, before boarding a flight. "I appreciate the security measures, and I accept the rules as they are."

Lauren Harvard, 18, of Olney, said she has no plans to take any liquids on board in the near future.

"I'll just have to wait and see," said Miss Harvard while waiting for a United Airlines flight to Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. "I knew the ban was being lifted, but I didn't want to take any chances."

Beginning yesterday, liquid, lipstick, and gel and cream toiletries in 3-ounce containers or smaller were allowed on commercial flights if they are in a clear, plastic, quart-size or smaller reclosable bag. Only one plastic bag per passenger is allowed.

Some items are permitted in any amount: saline solution, eye drops and prescription and nonprescription medicine, the Transportation Security Administration said.

Drinks, liquids and gels bought in airport stores inside security checkpoints can be carried into passenger cabins; baby formula is allowed but will be inspected.

Some passengers said it was too confusing keeping up with rules, particularly because the Homeland Security Department just announced them Monday.

Irene Riker of Marietta, Ga., sat sipping a can of Coca-Cola before a flight at BWI yesterday after being told that she couldn't bring it past the security checkpoint.

"I heard about the new rules last night, but I didn't have time to read any papers," Mrs. Riker said. "I don't have a problem with [the rules] as long as they keep us informed. It would've been nice if they could've e-mailed ticket-holders about it."

Terry Townsend, 56, of Chattanooga, Tenn., said he applauds the tighter security but is frustrated because of inconsistencies among airports.

"I fly a lot, and some airports let you take some stuff on and others wouldn't -- you just wouldn't know," he said at Reagan Airport. "That's the biggest frustration I have."

Patricia French, 55, who arrived at BWI yesterday from Atlanta, successfully carried small bottles of hair spray and contact lens solution on board a flight from the Georgia capital. But some of her fellow passengers weren't as fortunate.

DOJ_NMG_0069722

"They were very strict about the size of the bag -- I saw them make people throw some away because they were too large," Mrs. French said.

Security lines generally moved briskly at Washington-area airports. That wasn't the case, however, in Atlanta, Mrs. French said.

"I've never waited in security lines as long as I have today in Atlanta," she said. "If they would've asked me one more time about my bag, I would've thrown it away."

Passengers weren't the only ones getting used to the new rules. Transportation Security Administration officials at Reagan Airport regularly deferred to clipboards with the updated regulations. And a sign outside an hourly parking garage at the airport still informed passengers that all liquids were banned on board flights, ignoring the updated rules.

Teresa Usher, 44, of Bel Air, Md., said the relaxed rules almost seemed too good to be true. So just in case they weren't, she wasn't going to risk losing any expensive cosmetics while going through security at BWI.

"I just took my lipstick; put it in my pocket so if they told me I couldn't take it, I could just throw it away," she said before boarding a United Airlines flight to see her mother in Portland, Ore. "Everything else I left at home. I just didn't want to take any chances."

Airport Security Adjusts To New Rules On Liquids (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

Security was relatively smooth at U.S. airports yesterday, as travelers adjusted to new rules allowing them to bring aboard planes small amounts of liquids and gels in their carry-on bags. But it took some flexibility on the part of authorities to make things work. Many people did not know about revisions to month-long rules banning most liquids and gels from passenger cabins.

For example, consider Ted Koppel and the requirement that containers of 3 ounces or less had to fit easily into clear plastic bags.

The former host of ABC's "Nightline" arrived at Washington's Reagan National Airport yesterday morning for a flight to Dallas without a clear plastic bag and a too-large tube of toothpaste in his shaving kit.

A supervisor with the Transportation Security Administration rushed to the rescue. She gave Koppel the necessary plastic bag and determined that he had already used enough of the toothpaste to meet the new limits for such gels. He put the tube into the plastic bag and sailed through security.

Under the rules that went into effect yesterday morning, passengers are allowed to board with small amounts of toiletries in containers of 3 ounces or less, as long as the items are visible in a clear plastic 1-quart bag. The bags have to be pulled out of carry-on luggage to be examined separately at security checkpoints. Under the new rules, passengers may purchase drinks in secure areas and bring those aboard planes.

The TSA banned nearly all liquids and gels from passenger cabins in August after British authorities said they uncovered a terrorist plot to blow up transatlantic airliners with liquid bombs. Large containers of liquids and gels still must be checked or left behind, officials said.

TSA officials said they eased the rules because they had studied the threat and were confident that the revisions balanced the risk of attack against inconvenience for travelers.

TSA officials said they worked hard yesterday to help travelers make it through security, even if they didn't meet the letter of the new requirements.

"It went great today," said Kip Hawley, director of the TSA, before speaking at the Aero Club of Washington's monthly luncheon. "Everything I have heard suggests it went smoothly across the country . . . We worked with the security officers so they have discretion, particularly on the first day."

Hawley said officials rolled out the revisions on a Tuesday because it usually is one the least busy for passengers. Security lines were fairly short at National yesterday morning.

Rob Yingling, a spokesman for the Washington Metropolitan Airports Authority, which runs National and Washington Dulles International airports, declined to comment on security lines at either airport or how the new rules affected travelers. He referred calls to the TSA. Security lines "moved very efficiently" at Baltimore-Washington Thurgood Marshall International Airport, an airport spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0069723

At National, passengers said they were happy that the TSA eased the restrictions, though several didn't know about the changes until they were told by a reporter.

Susan Garfield, 33, a director of women's health for a biotech company, called the original ban a "pain in the rear end" because it forced her to check her luggage and wait 40 minutes at the carousel after her flight.

But Garfield said her frustration largely evaporated yesterday when she packed her toothpaste, lip gloss and nail polish into a clear cosmetics bag with a zipper -- technically, a violation of the new rules -- and whipped through security at Boston's Logan International Airport.

"This seems like a much better approach," Garfield said.

Elliot Kash, 34, a salesman for a car-rental agency who travels between New York and the District twice a week, said he heard about the revisions yesterday and immediately bought a small silver mesh case for his toiletries -- not the clear bag the TSA requires.

Screeners at LaGuardia Airport allowed him to pass through security anyway, he said. As he opened his luggage to show a reporter the bag at National, he realized that he had toothpaste, spray-on deodorant and some cream jammed in other parts of his bag -- missed or ignored by the screeners. He said he had forgotten the items were there.

Latest Airport Security Rules Trip Up Travelers In L.A. (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

Some passengers discover that the end of a ban on carry-on liquids doesn't mean shampoo gets a free ride.

Dave Johnson heard about the new flight safety rules as he was preparing to leave for Washington, D.C. He thought he had come to Los Angeles International Airport properly prepared, with all his toiletries in a large plastic sack the size of a freezer storage bag.

But when he reached the X-ray line, the security checker did a double-take.

"Whoa! OK, sir that's much too big! That's much larger than we allow."

"Well, do you have a smaller one?" asked Johnson, a 65-year-old program manager with the Navy.

"Sorry, we don't supply the bags, sir."

"Well, where can I get one?"

Nowhere at the airport, actually, and Johnson was forced to rush back to the ticket counter to check one of his carry-on bags along with the toiletries.

As Johnson left, the man who had been behind him in line held up a similarly oversized plastic bag and said, "I probably have the same problem."

On the first day of the relaxed transportation safety rules, travelers and security personnel at LAX spent much of the morning working through minor kinks and confusion caused by the new guidelines.

Though liquids and gels such as shampoo, toothpaste and shaving cream now are allowed in carry-on bags, no bottles, tubes or jars larger than 3 ounces are permitted and all must fit into a clear plastic container the size of a quart bag.

Many travelers simply heard the words "clear bag" and assumed that any clear bag would do.

Others brought several clear bags packed with things, but only one per person is allowed.

"Basically, you can bring anything you want as long as it's 3 ounces and as long as it's in a Baggie," said a Transportation Security Administration checker named Chris, who declined to give his full name because of agency regulations. Passengers are allowed to bring on more than 3 ounces of medicine or infant formula if they receive clearance from the TSA checker on the scene.

"By tomorrow, the word will be out through the media and everything will be better," Chris said.

On Tuesday, however, many people had either misunderstood the clear-bag rule or misjudged how much the restrictions had been eased.

DOJ_NMG_0069724

"I assumed that today all the restrictions were gone," said a man flying home to San Francisco. He had bought a travel-sized tube of toothpaste the night before but had no plastic bag to put it in.

"I'm going to take it up there and see if they'll let me through," said the passenger, who declined to give his name.

TSA spokesman Nico Melendez spent several hours at LAX on Tuesday morning and said the new travel measures didn't seem to create significant additional delays or longer lines. He encouraged all travelers to check the TSA's website, http://www.tsa.gov for precise information on the new rules.

"We expect a bit of a learning curve," Melendez said. "Whenever we do something like this, it's a couple days' process to get the word out and get everyone on the same page."

The lack of available plastic bags at the airport created a bit of a bottleneck. Anthony Bourke, who had flown into L.A. early Tuesday, noted that airport officials in San Francisco were passing out plastic bags to travelers who needed them.

More than one traveler said a clever entrepreneur could have made good money by simply bringing sandwich bags to the airport and selling them for $1 each.

Still, a healthy percentage of the passengers did show up in step with the new rules. One man, who described himself as a "120,000-mile-per-year traveler," came with a regulation-sized plastic bag that even bore his initials in black marker.

Most of the others, however, were in the clear simply because they had long since abandoned taking any liquids or gels onto the plane.

"I'm traveling every week," said Marion Lowry, who was flying to San Francisco, "and I've come to the conclusion that I'm just bringing no toiletries, no belt, and wearing slip-on shoes."

*

ashraf.khalil@latimes.com

A Retreat On Carry-On Liquids (NYT)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

The federal government's relaxation of the rules for carrying liquids and gels aboard airplanes is being greeted with sighs of relief by many passengers, airlines, airports and businesses that sell bottled beverages or other liquids at the airport. But we sure wish we could be confident that the Transportation Security Administration was not simply trying to placate airlines and other businesses concerned about possible loss of revenues.

The new rules that went into effect yesterday allow passengers to carry liquids in three-ounce containers provided they all fit comfortably into a single quart-sized, clear plastic, zip-top bag. The rules also permit passengers to carry aboard beverages and other items purchased in the secure area of the airport, after they have passed through the security screening checkpoints.

The head of the T.S.A. said the near total ban was no longer needed because extensive testing by the F.B.I. and others had found that small containers don't pose a real threat and because items bought in the airport's secure area have already been screened on the way in.

But even an amateur can see holes in that argument. It would seem relatively easy for a small group of terrorists to combine their liquids after all have passed through security checkpoints, either in the airport's secure area or even aboard the plane. And one has to wonder whether a corrupt worker or terrorist might find a way to sneak a liquid bomb into the secure area despite enhanced surveillance and background checks.

Perhaps officials have really worked all this out in a methodical and disinterested manner. But it is disquieting that a former inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security, writing in USA Today, declared himself "skeptical" that such a determination had been made. A safer course of action would retain the near total ban on liquids and let the airlines supply passengers with ample beverages.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Orders Intel Report Declassified (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

DOJ_NMG_0069725

The AP, September 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Tuesday that critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naive, and he ordered the partial declassification of a high-level intelligence analysis that has stirred heated election-season argument on the subject.

At a White House news conference, Bush acknowledged that the fighting in Iraq has been used as a recruitment tool for extremists - one finding of the intelligence assessment that suggests the Iraq war has nourished terrorists' ranks.

But he rejected any suggestion that the war was a mistake. "I think it's naive. I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe," Bush said, standing alongside Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

Many Democrats have argued that the U.S. needs to chart a new course to stabilize Iraqi society and eventually shift American military forces away.

After three days of criticism concerning leaked portions of the intelligence analysis, Bush asked National Intelligence Director John Negroponte to declassify key judgments of the 30-page assessment from the nation's top analysts who are spread across 16 different spy agencies.

The document's leaked contents had sparked an intense debate.

Democrats saw the conclusions - particularly that the overall terror threat has grown since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 - as political ammunition. Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Carl Levin of Michigan both said release of the key findings alone wouldn't give Americans enough information, and they accused the administration of selective declassification.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., sought a rare secret session of the House to discuss the report's classified findings. Her request was rejected - 217-171 - on a nearly straight party-line vote.

Such a session hasn't occurred in the House since July 1983, when the chamber went into a closed session to discuss U.S. support for paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

In an interview, Pelosi said the secret session was needed to allow members to better understand the intelligence community's most recent assessment on global terrorism. Judging by media reports, she said, the intelligence estimate "is the administration's worst nightmare. It is not a corroboration of what the president is saying. It is a contradiction of what the president is saying."

In a sometimes-testy exchange with reporters, Bush said the document was leaked "coming right down the stretch in this campaign in order to create confusion in the minds of the American people."

He rejected the suggestion that his decision to release a version of the report was a political act, as well. "I want you to read the document so you don't speculate about what it says ... as opposed to relying on gossip," he said.

Bush listed a number of terrorist attacks that predated the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq: the hijackings of Sept. 11, 2001, the 2000 attack on the USS Cole, the 1998 bombings on U.S. embassies in East Africa and the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

"To suggest that if we weren't in Iraq we would see a rosier scenario, with fewer extremists joining the radical movement, requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Bush said.

Bush Goes Public With Terror Study (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

After its findings are leaked in news stories, part of an intelligence report calling the Iraq war a 'cause celebre' for jihadists is declassified.

WASHINGTON — Declassified portions of a high-level intelligence report released Tuesday describe the war in Iraq as a major catalyst for Islamic radicalism around the world, while also citing other causes for the expanding terrorist threat.

President Bush took the highly unusual step of releasing key findings of the classified intelligence study in an attempt to blunt a growing furor in Washington over news reports this week in which intelligence officials described sections of the document that indicate the war in Iraq has made the terrorism problem worse. The White House said the initial news stories about the National Intelligence Estimate, a report offering a consensus view of U.S. intelligence agencies, did not represent the whole document.

DOJ_NMG_0069726

But the release of its principal findings appeared likely to fuel the election-season debate over the impact of the war in Iraq, and provided scant support for the president's position that the U.S. occupation of the country has made America safer.

At a White House news conference, Bush lashed out at what he suggested was a politically motivated leak of the report's conclusions, and at critics who have cited the intelligence estimate to question his administration's course in Iraq and argue that the drawn-out conflict is adding to the danger of terrorism.

"Some people have, you know, guessed what's in the report and have concluded that going into Iraq was a mistake," Bush said, appearing alongside Afghan President Hamid Karzai. "I strongly disagree. I think it's naive. I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe."

The section released by the White House does not include an explicit conclusion that the war in Iraq has increased the terrorist threat to Americans. But the thrust of the report's "key judgments" is that the terrorist danger is morphing and growing and that the Iraq war is a major contributing force in that trend.

"We assess that the Iraq jihad is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives," reads one of the main conclusions of the report.

"The Iraq conflict has become the 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

Among other findings, the report said that Al Qaeda was exploiting the war in Iraq to attract new donors and recruits; that fighters with experience in Iraq were likely to function as leaders in a new generation of militants; and that foreign Al Qaeda fighters were free to leave the country and focus on other targets as more Iraqi militants took their place within Iraq.

Bush did not say who he thought leaked the classified report. Atty. Gen Alberto R. Gonzales indicated Tuesday that the Justice Department could investigate the disclosure once the agency that classified the report — in this case the director of national intelligence — reported the leak.

Bush said he ordered the key judgments declassified — four pages out of the 30-page document — so that "everybody can draw their own conclusions about what the report says." Other officials said it was designed to bolster statements from administration officials in recent days that the report was wide-ranging, and that assessing the impact of the Iraq war was not its main focus.

The portion made public includes six references to the conflict in Iraq, describing it as a recruiting tool for Islamic fundamentalists, a training ground for Muslim fighters and a laboratory for lethal new terrorist methods that are increasingly being exported to other countries.

Overall, the excerpt offers a bleak assessment of the evolving terrorist threat.

Although counter-terrorism operations have damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda, the report concludes that the global jihadist movement "is spreading and adapting to counter-terrorism efforts," and that if current trends continue, "threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide."

The threat from "self-radicalized cells will grow in importance to U.S. counter-terrorism efforts," according to the report, which described Europe as "an important venue for attacking Western interests."

The document even warns that rising anti-U.S. sentiment could fuel other radical ideologies, prompting leftist, nationalist or separatist groups in other parts of the world "to adopt terrorist methods to attack U.S. interests."

The National Intelligence Estimate represents the U.S. intelligence community's most authoritative and comprehensive examination of global terrorism trends. The document was produced by a senior group of analysts under the direction of National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte.

The report, titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States" was completed in April. Some members of Congress were briefed on the report this year, but its conclusions on Iraq were not publicly disclosed until this week, when The Times and other news organizations published articles based on accounts from government officials familiar with its contents.

DOJ_NMG_0069727

The NIE lists other factors contributing to the growth in Islamic fundamentalism, including "entrenched grievances" among Muslims such as "fear of Western domination" as well as the slow pace of economic, social and political reforms in many Muslim nations.

It identifies factors that could curb the spread of Islamic extremism, including the limited appeal of militant ideology. The document also indicates that a string of setbacks for insurgents in Iraq could mean that "fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

Frances Fragos Townsend, assistant to Bush for homeland security, told reporters that suggestion "underscores the president's point about the importance of our winning in Iraq."

Even so, the excerpt concludes that the "factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities," suggesting that Islamic radicalization is likely to grow in strength.

Democrats pounced on the report.

"What I conclude from it is that our failed strategy in Iraq has made the world more dangerous," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. Harman said the declassification of the document could have immediate repercussions, shifting debate on Capitol Hill away from the White House agenda.

Sen. John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said the report's judgments "make it clear that the intelligence community — all 16 agencies — believe the war in Iraq has fueled terrorism."

Republicans downplayed the report's language on Iraq, and pointed out that most of the document's findings are consistent with previous reports and testimony describing terrorist networks as increasingly decentralized.

"Despite Democrats' dubious claims, the NIE report indicates that America's success against Al Qaeda has led to the enemy becoming more diffuse and independent," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

In his news conference with Karzai, Bush sought to refute the suggestion that the war was exacerbating the terror problem by ticking off attacks against American targets before the invasion. He mentioned the 1993 car bombing of the World Trade Center, the 1998 bombings of American embassies in east Africa, and the 2000 attack on the U.S. warship Cole in a Yemen harbor.

"To suggest that if we weren't in Iraq we would see a rosier scenario with fewer extremists joining the radical movement requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Bush said. "The best way to protect America is defeat these killers overseas so we do not have to face them here at home."

But the implication that there was a connection between Baghdad and any of those attacks — or the Al Qaeda terrorist network — was not supported by intelligence estimates before the war, and has been widely discredited since.

At one point, Bush defended the invasion by saying the war on terrorism requires "going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people."

However, the most comprehensive intelligence estimate on Iraq before the war — a National Intelligence Estimate published in October 2002 — concluded that Baghdad was "drawing a line short of conducting terrorist attacks" against the United States, and that only "if sufficiently desperate" was Hussein likely to seek a partnership with a terrorist organization such as Al Qaeda.

More recently, the Republican-controlled Senate Intelligence Committee concluded a two-year investigation that turned up no evidence that Hussein had ties to Al Qaeda or was plotting against the United States. Instead, the report found that the Iraqi leader had issued a general order barring anyone in his government from having dealings with the terrorist network.

American intelligence agencies are working on an NIE that focuses exclusively on the conflict in Iraq. Townsend said the report is scheduled to be completed in January. Harman said she is concerned that the administration is seeking to delay release of the document until after the November elections.

*

greg.miller@latimes.com

Bush Declassifies Some Iraq Intelligence Documents (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

DOJ_NMG_0069728

Chicago Tribune, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Tuesday attempted to blunt criticism that the war in Iraq has emboldened a new generation of terrorists, ordering the release of a select summary of a classified National Intelligence Estimate concluding that U.S.-led counter-terrorism efforts have "seriously damaged" the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations.

At the same time, a carefully screened summary of the NIE concludes that a holy war in Iraq is "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." It reports that the conflict has become "the 'cause celebre' for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

While reports of a small portion of the NIE revealed by weekend newspapers focused on the war in Iraq serving as a recruiting and breeding ground for Islamic radicals, the president maintained that the assessment released Tuesday supports his contention that the U.S. and its allies have succeeded in weakening terrorist networks, dispersing their operatives and undermining their plans.

Nonetheless, the intelligence community's assessment that the war in Iraq has spawned new terrorism and inflamed anti-U.S. sentiment in the Muslim world served to buttress opposition to the war in Congress as the critical Nov. 7 elections approach.

The NIE is a consensus report of 16 government intelligence agencies. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte released a select, four-page summary after screening it for sensitive intelligence, although the White House had described the still-classified summary of the report's "key judgments" as a nine-page document.

The report's most alarming finding—that the war in Iraq has generated new terrorism—serves as a powerful challenge to the president's insistence that removing Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq has made the world safer. This is the argument Bush has embraced for the U.S.-led invasion since pre-war intelligence about suspected weapons of mass destruction in Iraq proved to be wrong.

"Some people have, you know, guessed what's in the report and have concluded that going into Iraq was a mistake," Bush said during a White House press conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. "I strongly disagree. I think it's naive.

"To suggest that, if we weren't in Iraq, we would see a rosier scenario with fewer extremists joining the radical movement requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Bush said. He cited a series of terrorist attacks that occurred before the invasion of Iraq, including both the 1993 and Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center in New York.

The revelation of first a portion of the NIE that was produced in April and now the broader, declassified summary is likely to stir new debate over the war in Iraq at a time when the president and fellow Republicans are attempting to maintain control of Congress in November, contending the GOP is the party most committed to national security.

Citing the NIE as evidence, Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), declared, "Iraq was a strategic mistake. The Bush administration's mishandling of the war has increased the number of radical Islamic fundamentalists and resentment and hatred of the United States."

Bush angrily denounced whoever revealed the report's findings before he decided to declassify a summary of it.

"You know, what's interesting about the NIE… it was an intelligence report done last April," Bush told reporters in the East Room. "And here we are, coming down the stretch of an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspaper. Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes."

The White House complained that news reports focused on one paragraph taken "wildly out of context" from a nine-page summary of the NIE known as the "key judgments." Still, much of the four-page summary released Tuesday focuses on the role that Iraq has played in fomenting terrorism.

Among the judgments of the April report released by Negroponte:

* U.S.-led counter-terrorism has "seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations," but Al Qaeda continues to pose the greatest threat to the U.S.

* The global jihadist movement is spreading, and adapting to counter-terrorism efforts, and should this continue "threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide." Yet the movement is "decentralized, lacks a coherent strategy and is becoming more diffuse."

DOJ_NMG_0069729

* The Iraq jihad is "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives," and perceived success there would inspire more fighters elsewhere. The Iraq conflict has become "the cause celebre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

* Al Qaeda, merged with the network of then-elusive Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq, is "exploiting the situation in Iraq to attract new recruits and donors." Zarqawi was later killed.

* As jihadist groups use improvised explosive devices and suicide attacks in urban centers, fighters with experience in Iraq are "a potential source of leadership" for jihadists, and with anti-American sentiment on the rise, this could prompt other groups to adopt terrorist methods for attacking the U.S.

* This "radicalization… is occurring more quickly, more widely and more anonymously in the Internet age," making the likelihood of surprise attacks by unknown groups more likely.

Negroponte, calling the report a comprehensive assessment based on a series of judgments, maintained that "characterizing only a small handful of those judgments distorts the broad strategic framework the NIE is assessing—in this case, trends in global terrorism."

Yet Bush's critics contended that releasing select portions of the NIE, formally titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," withholds information that would enable the public to fully judge the report.

"For more than three years, President Bush and the Republican Congress have repeatedly claimed the war in Iraq is making America safer," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). "The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects. The last thing we need is another selective declassification of portions of the report in a desperate attempt by the administration to avoid disclosing the truth."

While complaining of election-season politics in the leak of a portion of a report, the president was asked if his own release of a summary of the NIE is also a political act.

"I want you to read the documents, so you don't speculate about what it says… as opposed to relying upon gossip and somebody, you know, who may or may not have seen the document trying to classify the war in Iraq one way or the other," Bush said, with apparent frustration over leaks. "I guess it's just Washington—where… there's no such thing as classification anymore, hardly."

Backing Policy, President Issues Terror Estimate (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Portions of a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism that the White House released under pressure on Tuesday said that Muslim jihadists were “increasing in both number and geographic dispersion” and that current trends could lead to increasing attacks around the globe.

The report, a comprehensive assessment of terrorism produced in April by American intelligence agencies, said the invasion and occupation of Iraq had become a “cause célèbre” for jihadists. It identified the jihad in Iraq as one of four underlying factors fueling the spread of the Islamic radicalism, along with entrenched grievances, the slow pace of reform and pervasive anti-American sentiment.

The intelligence estimate said American-led counterterrorism efforts in the past five years had “seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations.” But it said that Al Qaeda continued to pose the greatest threat to American interests among terrorism organizations, and that the global jihadist movement overall was “spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts.” [Text and news analysis, Page A16.]

The estimate predicted that over the next five years the factors fueling the spread of global jihad were likely to be more powerful than those that might slow it.

The White House ordered portions of the intelligence estimate declassified to counter what it described as mischaracterizations about its findings in news reports.

DOJ_NMG_0069730

The Bush administration had initially resisted releasing the document but changed course after being pressured to declassify the report by Republicans, including Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, and by the conservative editorial page of The Wall Street Journal.

At a news conference on Tuesday where he announced the release of portions of the document, President Bush suggested forcefully that news reports in the past two days about the document had been based on politically motivated leaks.

"You know, to suggest that if we weren't in Iraq we would see a rosier scenario, with fewer extremists joining the radical movement, requires us to ignore 20 years of experience," Mr. Bush said. He added: "My judgment is: The only way to protect this country is to stay on the offense."

The intelligence estimate says that if jihadists who leave Iraq perceive themselves, or are perceived by others, to have failed, fewer fighters will be inspired to keep fighting.

Democrats seized on the document's conclusions as proof that the invasion of Iraq was a mistake.

"The war in Iraq has made us less safe," said Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee. Mr. Rockefeller said the judgments contained in the intelligence estimate "make it clear that the intelligence community — all 16 agencies — believe the war in Iraq has fueled terrorism."

The estimate was the first formal appraisal of the terrorism threat by American intelligence agencies since the invasion of Iraq began in March 2003. The public release of any portion of such a document is highly unusual. The White House declassified fewer than 4 pages of what officials described as a document of more than 30 pages, saying that to release more of it would endanger intelligence sources and methods.

The release of the findings added fuel to an intense political debate about the administration's record in combating terrorism. Mr. Bush used the news conference to reassert his view that the Iraq war was not to blame for the growth of Islamic radicalism.

He also attributed the disclosure of some of the assessment findings to what he said were government officials leaking classified information to "create confusion in the minds of the American people" weeks before an important Congressional election.

The first article on the findings was published Sunday in The New York Times after more than five weeks of reporting. More than a dozen United States government officials and outside experts were interviewed for the article, including employees of several government agencies and both supporters and critics of the Bush administration.

Democrats also criticized the White House for only declassifying part of the report, and the House minority leader, Nancy Pelosi of California, tried and failed to persuade Republicans to agree to a vote that would have shut the doors of the House of Representatives to allow members to read the entire classified report.

Officials who have read the entire document said the still-classified portion contained a more detailed analysis of the impact of the Iraq war on the global jihad movement. Representative Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, said that what the White House released Tuesday was broadly consistent with the classified portion of the report.

National intelligence estimates are the most authoritative documents that American intelligence agencies produce on a specific national security issue. They represent the consensus view of the 16 intelligence agencies in government, and are approved by John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence.

The release on Tuesday of portions of the document was the second time that the Bush administration had come under political pressure to declassify a national intelligence estimate.

In July 2003, the White House released the principal judgments of an October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq's weapons programs in an attempt to address a furor over the origins of President Bush's statement, made in a State of the Union address, that Saddam Hussein had been trying to buy nuclear materials in Niger.

In recent months, without disclosing the existence of the intelligence estimate on terrorism, some senior American intelligence officials have given glimpses into its conclusions. During a speech in San Antonio in April, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who was then Mr. Negroponte's deputy, said new jihadist networks and cells were increasingly likely to emerge.

DOJ_NMG_0069731

"If this trend continues, threats to the U.S. at home and abroad will become more diverse and that could lead to increasing attacks worldwide," General Hayden said, using the exact language of the intelligence assessment made public on Tuesday. General Hayden is now director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

But the intelligence assessment paints a starker picture of the role that the Iraq war is playing in shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders than that presented either in recent White House documents or in speeches by President Bush tied to the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The intelligence report specifically cited the role of the Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who led the Iraqi group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, in attracting new recruits for the jihad cause in Iraq, and stated that "should al-Zarqawi continue to evade capture and scale back attacks against Muslims, we assess he could broaden his popular appeal and present a global threat."

He was killed by American forces in June.

Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, suggested to reporters on Tuesday that the killing of Mr. Zarqawi might ultimately help dampen the appeal of jihad in Iraq.

At the same time, the report concludes that the increased role of Iraqis in managing the operations of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia "might lead veteran foreign jihadists to focus their efforts on external operations."

To be successful in combating the spread of a radical ideology, the assessment states, the United States government "must go well beyond operations to capture or kill terrorist leaders."

Bush's Leak Comments Heighten Debate Over Security (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Tuesday accused unnamed people of leaking part of a classified intelligence report on Iraq as an act of political sabotage, intended to "create confusion in the minds of the American people" in advance of the November elections.

Bush's assertion, along with his decision to release portions of the same report in response to the leaks, were the clearest signs yet that the ongoing debate over the Iraq war and its effect on U.S. security has grown to a fever pitch as the two parties struggle to shape public opinion before election day.

"Here we are, coming down the stretch of an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspaper," Bush said, referring to news stories Sunday on the intelligence report, which said the Iraq war, among other factors, was fueling an expansion of Islamic terrorism. "Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes."

Bush's comments marked the latest in a string of highly public and politically charged clashes over national security that both major parties believe have implications for the elections. They have included a fight over whether President Clinton took sufficient anti-terrorism steps while in office, disputes on Capitol Hill over interrogation and domestic wiretapping laws, and differing interpretations of the classified intelligence report.

With Congress entering its final days before adjourning for the fall election campaign, the two parties are fighting over which image will be uppermost in voters' minds Nov. 7: That the U.S. has taken on the terrorism challenge by invading Iraq, or that the invasion and its bloody aftermath have left the United States less safe.

Clinton has become embroiled in the debate, marking a rare foray by a former president into a present-day political fight. Clinton used a Sunday interview with the Fox News Channel to defend his efforts to stop Osama bin Laden and, in an unusually sharp rebuke of Bush's policies, to argue that the Republicans who followed him in office had ignored bin Laden until the Sept. 11 attacks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice accused Clinton of making "flatly false" claims about the Bush administration's efforts against bin Laden, when asked about the former president's remarks Monday by the New York Post.

DOJ_NMG_0069732

Democrats have been reluctant to challenge the GOP on national security matters, because the issue has benefited Republicans in recent cycles and Democrats have been divided on Iraq. On Tuesday, they made it clear they intended to fully engage on the security front this time.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., argued -- albeit unsuccessfully -- for the House to go into private session to discuss the intelligence report on terrorism and call for a full declassification. And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., the former first lady and a possible candidate for president in 2008, not only defended her husband's handling of terrorism but suggested he would have heeded warnings signs that she said were ignored by the Bush White House.

Republicans have sought to portray Democrats as inadequate to the job of protecting the nation, pursuing an election-year strategy of trying to mobilize conservative voters in key districts by arguing that Democrats would "cut and run" from Iraq and thus embolden terrorists.

Democrats, citing shrinking public support for Bush and the Iraq war, have tried to portray the administration as incompetent. However, disagreements among leading Democrats over whether to embrace a troop withdrawal plan in Iraq have left the party with a muted message. This week, citing the intelligence report and other questions about Bush's leadership, the party is attempting to overcome that disunity and beat the GOP at its own game.

"There was a debate as recently as two weeks ago about whether Iraq is advancing or debilitating America's interests," said Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who leads Democratic strategy for House campaigns. "You have now the best the minds of American intelligence saying it's debilitating, and that is affecting the political terrain for this election."

In a sense, former President Clinton's appearance Sunday and Bush's news conference Tuesday offered a split screen debate between each party's most influential leader.

Clinton accused Bush of spending billions of dollars in Iraq and losing focus on capturing bin Laden in Afghanistan. "If I were still president, we'd have more than 20,000 troops there trying to kill him," Clinton said.

"Now, I've never criticized President Bush, and I don't think this is useful," Clinton added. "But you know we do have a government that thinks Afghanistan is only one-seventh as important as Iraq."

Clinton also offered a critique of Bush's broader agenda of promoting democracy overseas, subtly contesting the current president's frequent argument that free elections in Iraq and Afghanistan are signs of progress.

"Democracy is about way more than majority rule," Clinton said. "Democracy is about minority rights, individual rights, restraints on power. ... But I don't think that's all we can do in the Muslim world. I think they have to see us as trying to get a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. I think they have to see us as willing to talk to people who see the world differently than we do."

Bush declined to respond directly to Clinton's comments, turning aside a question about the former president by saying his administration is working to make the country safer.

"I've watched all this finger-pointing and naming of names, and all that stuff," Bush said. "Our objective is to secure the country. ... So I'm not going to comment on other comments."

White House Releases Portions Of Iraq-War Critique (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House, under mounting pressure from Congress, released declassified portions of a government intelligence report that concludes the Iraq war is a "cause célèbre" shaping a new generation of militant Islamists and terrorists.

The four pages of findings from the National Intelligence Estimate, representing the input of 16 government agencies, follow days of criticism sparked by portions that were leaked last week. They also come in the run-up to midterm elections in which the conflict has become a defining issue. In them, analysts conclude that while the leadership of al Qaeda has suffered serious damage in Iraq and the wider war on terror, the threat from Islamic extremists has spread in numbers and geographic reach.

DOJ_NMG_0069733

Leaders from both parties immediately seized on the findings to argue that their position on the Iraq war would better secure the U.S.

President Bush called those who believe the war has worsened terrorism "naïve," and said to withdraw from Iraq could only further embolden militant groups to spread their influence across the Middle East and the Islamic world.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.) senior Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, countered that, "The reality is, the war in Iraq has inflamed Islamic extremism ... and it has created a training ground for the next generation of terrorists."

The White House initially sought to dismiss the NIE's leaked portions on Iraq as being mischaracterized, but ultimately agreed to release the report's "Key Judgments." None of the conclusions about Iraq had been redacted, said Francis Fragos Townsend, Mr. Bush's top counter-terrorism official.

The NIE seeks to assess the near-term capabilities of al Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups. It said U.S.-led counter-terrorism operations have "seriously damaged" al Qaeda's senior leadership, but the group continues to spread its ideology by breaking into more diffuse cells and communicating through the Internet. The NIE said Islamists have made particular gains in spreading their influence into Europe, and warned that non-Muslim groups in Latin America and Asia who share al Qaeda's anti-American agenda could also resort to terrorist activities.

President George Bush and Afghan President4 Hamid Karzai hold a joint press conference to discuss the Iraq policy and the leaking of classified information for political purposes.

On Iraq, the report said the war has aided al Qaeda's efforts to recruit globally by "breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world." It said U.S. success in stabilizing Iraq and promoting democracy, however, could ultimately bring fewer fighters into the fight. "We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities" in the near term, the report said.

As the White House and its critics traded charges over the findings, Congress was poised to approve rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected foreign combatants, as Democrats eager to avoid political fallout before the elections said they aren't likely to block the measure. The House will take up its bill today and the Senate could follow today or tomorrow.

Some critics of the legislation, which would set up military commissions to try "enemy combatants," want to propose changes. But even without those revisions, Democrats aren't likely to filibuster and many might decide to vote for it, Senate aides said.

One sticking point is a change made in recent days that expands the definition of "enemy combatant." Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) called it "much broader than anyone simply caught in terrorist activity." Another is a provision that would prevent suspects held at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention with a habeas corpus petition. Human-rights groups have said this would invite abuse of prisoners and allow the government to hold suspects indefinitely.

In related action, the House approved a $447 billion Pentagon budget for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, including $70 billion in emergency funding for military operations overseas. But a companion defense authorization bill remains stymied by a standoff between Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and the Senate.

Bush On Offensive Over Leaked Iraq Report (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

The Bush administration on Tuesday formally declassified parts of the leaked National Intelligence Estimate, revealing that Iraq had become a “cause célèbre for jihadists” and warning that an increasing number of Muslims identified themselves with the cause.

Publishing the key judgments in the NIE marked a White House effort to limit the political fallout from the admission that the Iraq war had fostered terrorism and to show that the findings were just one part of a wider analysis of terrorism trends.

President George W. Bush said he had declassified parts of the report as he wanted to “stop all the speculation, all the politics about somebody saying something about Iraq”. But he angrily denounced the leak as an effort to influence the election and “confuse the American people about the nature of this enemy”.

DOJ_NMG_0069734

"We are coming down the stretch in an election campaign and it's on the front page of your newspapers. Isn't that interesting? Somebody's taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes," he said, in some of his most pointed political remarks of the mid-term election campaign.

The four-page NIE document said that a small but growing percentage of Muslims identified themselves as jihadist. It warned that Iraq was breeding deep resentment of US involvement in the Muslim world and that fighters trained there could become leaders elsewhere.

Yet it affirmed that, if these fighters failed in Iraq, "we judge fewer . . . will be inspired to carry on the fight".

Mr Bush took a direct swipe at critics who have called for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq. He said it was "naive and a mistake" to suggest that if the US was not in Iraq "we would see a rosier scenario, with fewer extremists joining the radical movement. It requires us to ignore 20 years of experience".

Leaks from the classified document that was written in April were published at the weekend. News reports drew attention to the fact that the Iraq war had exacerbated Islamic terrorism and that the dangers had increased after September 11 2001. Democrats have seized on the leaked NIE report to suggest that the Iraq war has undermined the "war on terror" and made the US less safe.

The National Strategy for Combating Terrorism, issued by the White House last month, had played down the threat posed by Iraq. In a list of seven challenges it cited, concerns about Iraq came sixth. "The ongoing fight for freedom in Iraq has been twisted by terrorist propaganda as a rallying cry," it said.

Democrats in the House of Representatives tried on Tuesday to force a rare closed session to discuss intelligence on terrorism, but the Republican-controlled body rejected their move.

Mr Bush declined to respond to comments made in a Fox News interview this weekend by former President Bill Clinton who said that in the first nine months in office the Bush administration had held no meetings on the threat from Osama bin Laden. "I don't have enough time to finger-point," he said.

Bush Hits 'Political' Leak (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

An angry President Bush said yesterday that a secret terrorism assessment had been leaked for "political purposes" and disputed that the classified report had concluded the Iraq war is spreading Islamic extremism across the world.

But despite misgivings that it "would be a bad habit for our government to declassify every time there's a leak," the president ordered National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte to declassify key judgments on terrorism in Iraq from the 30-page document, drafted by the nation's top analysts in 16 spy agencies.

The four-page section declassified yesterday calls the Iraq war a "cause celebre" for Islamic terrorists and says that despite U.S. troops' wreaking serious damage on al Qaeda leadership, the number of terrorists is spreading in number and geographic dispersion.

"If this trend continues, threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide," the document says. "The confluence of shared purpose and dispersed actors will make it harder to find and undermine jihadist groups."

Although the report -- completed in April and based on data collected through February -- states that the "global jihadist movement is decentralized, lacks a coherent global strategy and is becoming more diffuse," the document also says that new jihadist networks are increasingly likely to emerge and that they will be harder to track or infiltrate.

But at the White House, the president called critics who say the Iraq war was a mistake "naive."

"I think it's a mistake for people to believe that going on the offense against people that want to do harm to the American people makes us less safe," he said.

He also took issue with the conclusion that the Iraq war is responsible for creating new terrorists, saying that those who "see a rosier scenario with fewer extremists joining the radical movement" if not for the Iraq war are ignoring 20 years of history.

DOJ_NMG_0069735

"We weren't in Iraq when we got attacked on September 11. We weren't in Iraq when thousands of fighters were trained in terror camps," Mr. Bush said. "We weren't in Iraq when they first attacked the World Trade Center in 1993. We weren't in Iraq when they bombed the Cole. We weren't in Iraq when they blew up our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania."

At a joint press conference with Mr. Bush, Afghan President Hamid Karzai echoed the president's sentiment.

"They came to America on September 11th, but they were attacking you before September 11th in other parts of the world. We are a witness in Afghanistan to what they are and how they can hurt. You are a witness in New York. Do you forget people jumping off the 80th floor or 70th floor when the planes hit them? Can you imagine what it will be for a man or a woman to jump off that high?" he said.

In a pointed jab at Democrats just six weeks before the midterm congressional elections, Mr. Bush said that politics was behind the sudden leaking of a five-month-old document.

"Here we are, coming down the stretch in an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspapers," the president said. "Isn't that interesting? Somebody has taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes," he said of the story, which first appeared Sunday in the New York Times.

Mr. Bush charged that political opponents had disclosed only select parts of the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), the administration's assessment on global terrorism. To counter those opponents, the president announced in the East Room that he would declassify the document "because I want you to read the documents so you don't speculate about what it says."

"We'll stop all the speculation, all the politics about somebody saying something about Iraq, somebody trying to confuse the American people about the nature of this enemy," Mr. Bush said. "Then everybody can draw their own conclusions about what the report says."

Democrats on Capitol Hill, meanwhile, failed to win a motion for a closed House session to discuss classified intelligence from the NIE. The proposal from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, was denied by a vote of 217-171.

Key Democrats issued a slew of coordinated statements calling on Mr. Bush to declassify the entire report, not just the portions that help the administration's position.

"The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts said. "The last thing we need is another selective declassification of portions of the report in a desperate attempt by the administration to avoid disclosing the truth."

"It's high time for this administration to ... acknowledge that Iraq is undermining the security" of Americans, said Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat.

Mrs. Harman, the ranking member of the House intelligence committee, also said she hears there is a second, more recent NIE report and that "its contents are grim."

Although the redacted report had several bleak assertions, it also said:

•"Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

•"The underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities and are likely to do so for the" next five years.

•A newly increased role of Iraqis in fighting al Qaeda could lead the terror group's veteran foreign fighters to focus their efforts outside the country.

•Iran and Syria are the most active state sponsors of terror, but many other countries will be unable to prevent their resources from being exploited by terrorists.

•Four underlying factors are fueling the spread of the jihadist movement -- entrenched grievances, such as corruption, injustice, and fear of Western domination, leading to anger, humiliation, and a sense of powerlessness; the Iraq war; the slow pace of real and sustained economic, social, and political reforms in many Muslim majority nations; and pervasive anti-U.S. sentiment among most Muslims.

"Exposing the religious and political straitjacket that is implied by the jihadists' propaganda would help to divide them from the audiences they seek to persuade," the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0069736

Looking ahead, the report also predicts that the loss of key leaders -- Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri and Abu Musab Zarqawi, killed in June -- in "rapid succession" would likely split central leadership and cause the group to fracture.

Part Of Iraq Intelligence Report Is Released (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday released portions of a classified intelligence estimate that says the global jihadist movement is growing and being fueled by the war in Iraq even as it becomes more decentralized, making it harder to identify potential terrorists and prevent attacks.

The war in Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, breeding resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and drawing new adherents to the movement, the assessment says. The growth in the number of potential terrorists is also being fed by corruption, slow-moving political reform in many Muslim countries and "pervasive" anti-American sentiment, according to the report.

The jihadist movement is potentially limited by its ultra-conservative interpretation of Islam and could be slowed by democratic reforms in the Muslim world, says the document, which reflects the collective judgment of the nation's 16 intelligence agencies. In addition, it asserts that if jihadists are perceived to be defeated in Iraq, "fewer fighters would be inspired to carry on the fight."

Still, terrorists with experience constructing roadside bombs and other deadly devices in Iraq "are a potential source" of leadership in attacks elsewhere, the report says.

President Bush took the extraordinary step of releasing portions of the classified report, which was completed in April, to counter assertions made after information from the document was leaked to media outlets over the weekend. Articles based on those leaks said the report blames the war in Iraq for worsening the global terrorist threat -- an interpretation that the administration calls a distortion of its contents.

Speaking at a White House news conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Bush angrily called the leak a political act intended to affect the upcoming midterm elections. "Somebody has taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes," he said.

The president added that it is naive to think that terrorism would be any less pervasive if the United States had not invaded Iraq, repeating his oft-made point that extremists attacked U.S. interests around the world long before the start of the war.

"My judgment is, if we weren't in Iraq, they'd find some other excuse, because they have ambitions," Bush said. "They kill in order to achieve their objectives."

Bush said he reluctantly ordered the release of the National Intelligence Estimate so people can form their own conclusions about it. "You can read it for yourself," he said. "We'll stop all the speculation, all the politics about somebody saying something about Iraq, somebody trying to confuse the American people about the nature of this enemy."

Disclosure of parts of the document, which represents the U.S. intelligence community's first formal assessment of terrorist threats since the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, did nothing to quell the partisan storm that has been brewing since the first stories about it surfaced.

Democrats have seized on the document to bolster their contention that the war in Iraq has been a debacle that has hindered broader anti-terrorism efforts, even as the administration calls Iraq the central front in a global struggle.

For the third straight day, Democrats sought to draw attention to the issue with news conferences and political maneuvers. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) moved to put the House into secret session to discuss the intelligence estimate, but the motion was defeated along party lines.

"With such a devastating and authoritative analysis of the Bush administration's failures in Iraq, the president and the Republican-controlled Congress now have a choice to make," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.). "Will they stubbornly follow a failed stay-the-course strategy that America's intelligence community has concluded makes America less safe, or will they finally admit their mistakes and change course?"

DOJ_NMG_0069737

Democrats challenged the White House to release the full report. "The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.). "President Bush should declassify the entire NIE as the Republican chairman of the Senate intelligence committee has suggested so the American people can read the plain facts for themselves."

Bush announced his decision to declassify parts of the terrorism assessment after a meeting with Karzai. During the meeting, he told the Afghan leader that the United States will stand by him in his battle against a resurgent Taliban and other Islamic extremists.

"I know there are some in your country who wonder whether or not America has got the will to do the hard work necessary to help you succeed," Bush told Karzai. "We have got that will."

Bush restated his commitment to help the Afghan government as he is working to warm the increasingly frosty relations between Karzai and another critical ally in the U.S. anti-terrorism efforts, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, president of neighboring Pakistan. Bush met with Musharraf on Friday, and the three leaders are scheduled to meet and have dinner this evening at the White House.

The fruitless search for al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and the surging violence by Taliban fighters, particularly in southern Afghanistan, have contributed to friction between Karzai and Musharraf. They have blamed each other for the continued trouble, with Karzai suggesting that Musharraf is not doing enough to find bin Laden, who is widely believed to be hiding in one of the remote tribal-controlled areas of Pakistan.

Musharraf counters that Karzai has not done enough to address the grievances of Afghan people who have joined the Taliban or who support it.

Although the intelligence report offers a sobering picture of the global terrorist threat, it points to counterterrorism successes, including the killing or capture of much of the al-Qaeda leadership, and the condemnation of extremist views by "a few notable Muslim clerics."

It also says that a backlash could develop against Islamic radicals if they continue to kill fellow Muslims.

Still, the assessment warns, the underlying factors fueling the spread of jihadists' radical ideology "outweigh its vulnerabilities," a situation the report says is likely to continue for some time.

Karzai, speaking at the news conference, offered passionate support for Bush's efforts to combat terrorism. "These extremist forces were killing people in Afghanistan and around for years," he said. ". . . They came to America on September 11th, but they were attacking you before September 11th in other parts of the world. . . . Should we wait for them to come and kill us again?"

Intel Report: Iraq War Cultivating Militancy (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And David Jackson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Iraq war has become the “cause célèbre” for Islamic militants, breeding resentment in Muslim nations and cultivating supporters worldwide, according to portions of a secret intelligence study the Bush administration released Tuesday.

The administration report also says that the militant Islamic movement is “spreading and adapting” to counterterrorism efforts and militants are “increasing both in number and geographic dispersion.”

If this trend continues, the report warns, “threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide.”

However, it also echoes President Bush's insistence on succeeding in Iraq. “Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves … to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight.”

Bush ordered more than three pages of the National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism made public Tuesday after several days of Democratic attacks based on media reports about the classified document.

DOJ_NMG_0069738

Democrats have trumpeted the report, completed in April and a reflection of the analysis of the 16-agency U.S. intelligence community, as the first admission by the administration itself that Bush's policy in Iraq has made the problem of global terrorism worse.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the report confirms "what the American people have long believed: The Bush administration's failed policies in Iraq are fueling global terrorism and making America less safe."

The "key judgments" of the report released Tuesday cite the Iraq war for "breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

Fran Townsend, the president's counterterrorism adviser, emphasized the more positive aspects of the document to reporters. An example: U.S. counterterrorism efforts have "seriously damaged the leadership of al-Qaeda and disrupted its operations," the report says.

As for the Iraq war's impact, Townsend said, "The fact is they were fighting us long before we were in Iraq."

Leading Democrats such as Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., called for the entire intelligence document to be released. "The entire report should be declassified — period," Levin said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., tried unsuccessfully Tuesday to call for a closed House session to debate the report. The move failed, 217-171.

Iraq Is 'Cause Celebre' For Extremists (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader And Jennifer Loven

AP, September 26, 2006

The war in Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists, breeding deep resentment of the U.S. that probably will get worse before it gets better, federal intelligence analysts conclude in a report at odds with President Bush's portrayal of a world growing safer.

In the bleak report, declassified and released Tuesday on Bush's orders, the nation's most veteran analysts conclude that despite serious damage to the leadership of al-Qaida, the threat from Islamic extremists has spread both in numbers and in geographic reach.

Bush and his top advisers have said the formerly classified assessment of global terrorism supported their arguments that the world is safer because of the war. But more than three pages of stark judgments warning about the spread of terrorism contrasted with the administration's glass-half-full declarations.

"If this trend continues, threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide," the document says. "The confluence of shared purpose and dispersed actors will make it harder to find and undermine jihadist groups."

The intelligence assessment, completed in April, has stirred a heated election-season argument over the course of U.S. national security in the years following the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Virtually all assessments of the current situation were bad news. The report's few positive notes were couched in conditional terms, depending on successful completion of difficult tasks ahead for the U.S. and its allies. In one example, analysts concluded that more responsive political systems in Muslim nations could erode support for jihadist extremists.

Bush ordered a declassified section of the secret report released after several days of criticism sparked by portions that were leaked to the news media over the weekend.

At a news conference, Bush said critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naive and mistaken, noting that al-Qaida and other groups have found inspiration to attack for more than a decade. "My judgment is, if we weren't in Iraq, they'd find some other excuse, because they have ambitions," he said.

The unclassified document said:

• The increased role of Iraqis in opposing al-Qaida in Iraq might lead the terror group's veteran foreign fighters to refocus their efforts outside that country.

• While Iran and Syria are the most active state sponsors of terror, many other countries will be unable to prevent their resources from being exploited by terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0069739

• The underlying factors that are fueling the spread of the extremist Muslim movement outweigh its vulnerabilities. These factors are entrenched grievances and a slow pace of reform in home countries, rising anti-U.S. sentiment and the Iraq war.

• Groups "of all stripes" will increasingly use the Internet to communicate, train, recruit and obtain support.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, a U.S. ally in Washington for a Thursday meeting with Bush, found himself drawn into the political dispute. He was asked in a CNN interview about an assertion in his new book that he opposed the invasion of Iraq because he feared that it would only encourage extremists and leave the world less safe.

"I stand by it, absolutely," Musharraf said. "It has made the world a more dangerous place."

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend took issue with one of the report's most damning conclusions: that the number of jihadists has increased.

"I don't think there's any question that there's an increase in rhetoric," she said. But "I think it's difficult to count the number of true jihadists that are willing to commit murder or kill themselves in the process."

The intelligence assessment also lays out weaknesses of the movement that analysts say must be exploited if its spread is to be slowed. For instance, they note that extremists want to see the establishment of strict Islamic governments in the Arab world — a development they say would be unpopular with most Muslims.

The report also argues that the loss of key al-Qaida leaders — Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — in "rapid succession" would probably cause the group to fracture. Al-Zarqawi was killed in June, but the top two al-Qaida leaders have remained elusive for years.

National intelligence estimates are compilations of the best thinking of U.S. intelligence agencies, meant to provide the broadest guidance to government policymakers.

But they can be wrong. A 2002 assessment, for example, concluded that Iraq had continued its development of weapons of mass destruction, held arsenals of chemical and biological weapons and "probably will have a nuclear weapon during this decade." None of those assertions turned out to be true.

Hours before the terrorism report was made public, Democrats seized on the political ammunition. Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Carl Levin of Michigan both said release of the key findings alone wouldn't give Americans enough information, and they accused the administration of selective declassification.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., sought a rare secret session of the House to discuss the report's classified findings. Her request was rejected — 217-171 — on a nearly straight party-line vote. In an interview, she said the intelligence estimate "is not a corroboration of what the president is saying. It is a contradiction of what the president is saying."

Waging The War On Terror: Report Belies Optimistic View (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26 — Three years ago, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote a memo to his colleagues in the Pentagon posing a critical question in the “long war’’ against terrorism: Is Washington’s strategy successfully killing or capturing terrorists faster than new enemies are being created?

Until Tuesday, the government had not publicly issued an authoritative answer. But the newly declassified National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism does exactly that, and it concludes that the administration has failed the Rumsfeld test.

Portions of the report appear to bolster Mr. Bush’s argument that the only way to defeat the terrorists is to keep unrelenting military pressure on them. But nowhere in the assessment is any evidence to support Mr. Bush’s confident-sounding assertion this month in Atlanta that “America is winning the war on terror.’’

While the spread of self-described jihadists is hard to measure, the report says, the terrorists “are increasing in both number and geographic dispersion.”

It says that a continuation of that trend would lead “to increasing attacks worldwide’’ and that “the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities.’’

DOJ_NMG_0069740

On Tuesday evening the White House issued what it called a fact sheet lining up the intelligence estimate's findings with President Bush's own words in recent months, comparing, for example, the report's account of the the spread of new terror cells independent of Al Qaeda to Mr. Bush's references to "homegrown terrorists'' from Madrid to Britain.

But there is a difference in tone between Mr. Bush's public statements and the classified assessment that is unmistakable.

The report says that over the next five years "the confluence of shared purpose and dispersed actors will make it harder to find and undermine jihadist groups.''

It also suggests that while democratization and "exposing the religious and political straitjacket that is implied by the jihadists' propaganda'' might dim the appeal of the terrorist groups, those factors are now outweighed by the dangerous brew of fear of Western domination, the battle for Iraq's future and the slow pace of real economic or political progress.

Yet the intelligence report bears none of Mr. Bush's long-range optimism. Rather it dwells on Mr. Rumsfeld's darker question, which he put cheekily as, "Is our current situation such that 'the harder we work, the behinder we get?' "

Tuesday's declassified report asked a more subtle version of that question. It notes that while democratization might "begin to slow the spread'' of extremism, the "destabilizing transitions'' caused by political change "will create new opportunities for jihadists to exploit.''

And while Mr. Bush talks often of transforming the Middle East, the report speaks of the "vulnerabilities'' created by the fact that "anti-U.S. and antiglobalization sentiment is on the rise and fueling other radical ideologies.''

The result, it said, was that other groups around the world are radicalizing "more quickly, more widely and more anonymously in the Internet age.''

In short, it describes a jihadist movement that, for now, is simply outpacing Mr. Bush's counterattacks.

"I guess the overall conclusion that you get from it is that we don't have enough bullets given all the enemies we are creating,'' said Bruce Hoffman, a professor of security studies at Georgetown University.

What was most remarkable about the intelligence estimate, several experts said, was the unremarkable nature of its conclusions.

"At one level it is unsurprising stuff,'' said Paul Pillar, who was the national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia on the intelligence council until last year. "But there is definitely much there that you haven't heard the president say,'' he added, "including the role that Iraq has played'' in inspiring disaffected Muslims to join an anti-American jihadist movement.

Administration officials expressed their certainty on Tuesday that the leak of parts of the report was an example of politically inspired cherry picking, to use a term from earlier arguments over intelligence about unconventional weapons.

"Here we are, coming down the stretch in an election campaign, and it's on the front page of your newspapers,'' Mr. Bush said at a news conference with President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan. "Isn't that interesting? Somebody has taken it upon themselves to leak classified information for political purposes.''

And at the center of the political debate is Iraq. Frances Fragos Townsend, the director of homeland security at the White House, used a conference call with reporters on Tuesday evening to call attention to the intelligence finding that "the Iraq conflict has become a cause célèbre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world, and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement.''

"Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves and be perceived to have failed,'' the findings went on, "we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight.''

Ms. Townsend argued that "this really underscores the President's point about the importance of our winning in Iraq,'' she said.

As a political matter, at least for the next few weeks, the intelligence findings will only fuel the argument over Iraq on both sides. Mr. Bush has grown increasingly insistent that nothing he has done in Iraq has worsened terrorism. America was not in Iraq during the first World Trade Center attack in 1993, he said, or during the bombings of the U.S.S. Cole or embassies in Africa, or on 9/11.

But that argument steps around the implicit question raised by the intelligence finding: whether postponing the confrontation with Saddam Hussein and focusing instead on securing Afghanistan, or dealing with issues like Iran's nascent nuclear capability or the Middle East peace process, might have created a different playing field, one in which jihadists were deprived of daily images of carnage in Iraq to rally their sympathizers.

DOJ_NMG_0069741

Sobering Conclusions On Why Jihad Has Spread (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

In announcing yesterday that he would release the key judgments of a controversial National Intelligence Estimate, President Bush said he agreed with the document's conclusion "that because of our successes against the leadership of al-Qaeda, the enemy is becoming more diffuse and independent."

But the estimate itself posits no such cause and effect. Instead, while it notes that counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged and disrupted al-Qaeda's leadership, it describes the spreading "global jihadist movement" as fueled largely by forces that al-Qaeda exploits but is not actively directing. They include Iraq, corrupt and unjust governments in Muslim-majority countries, and "pervasive anti-U.S. sentiment among most Muslims."

The overall estimate is bleak, with minor notes of optimism. It depicts a movement that is likely to grow more quickly than the West's ability to counter it over the next five years, as the Iraq war continues to breed "deep resentment" throughout the Muslim world, shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and cultivating new supporters for their ideology.

In describing Iraq as "the 'cause celebre' for jihadists," the document judges that real and perceived insurgent successes there will "inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere," while losses would have the opposite effect. It predicts that the elimination of al-Qaeda leaders, particularly Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahiri and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed after the estimate was completed in April, would probably leave that organization splintered into disparate groups that "for at least a time, pose a less serious threat to U.S. interests" than the current al-Qaeda structure.

On the relative bright side, the assessment notes the unpopularity with "the vast majority of Muslims" of the jihadists' brutal tactics and ultraconservative ideology. Democratic reforms and peaceful political alternatives in Muslim countries will also counter terrorist aims, it says.

But "the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities and are likely to do so for the duration of the timeframe of this estimate," the report notes. An intelligence official who was not authorized to speak on the record said the time frame is until early 2011.

The key judgments released yesterday made up slightly more than three pages of a much longer document that includes supporting background information. The judgments were intact except for what the official called "a small amount, and I emphasize small, of sensitive text" that was removed "to protect sources or address sensitivities" of allied intelligence agencies, or to "protect tactical recommendations that could become a part of future policy actions."

"What you're seeing here is really the key judgments," the official said.

Descriptions of the unseen document in media reports last weekend quoted intelligence officials as saying it described a global terrorist threat that was worsening as a result of the Iraq war. The reports led to an explosion of reaction, with the Bush administration and leading congressional Republicans saying that the published portions did not reflect the document's balanced view of successes and remaining challenges. It was no accident, Bush charged, that selective and potentially damaging parts had been "leaked" on the eve of the midterm elections.

Democrats, sensing advantage, contended that the administration had withheld a negative assessment for political reasons and demanded its release. The clamor apparently led Bush, in a meeting yesterday with Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, to authorize publication of the judgments.

Democratic claims of an administration coverup seemed less justified yesterday as it became apparent that the complete classified report had been made available to lawmakers within days of its completion in April.

Copies of the NIE were sent to the House and Senate intelligence, armed services and foreign affairs committees at the time, through normal electronic information channels available to all members, intelligence and congressional sources said. It arrived at the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence on April 26.

DOJ_NMG_0069742

In the House, "there was a bit of a snafu with this particular document," said a spokesman for Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), the intelligence committee chairman. "We had a massive computer failure on our classified side." The first that the committee knew of its existence was late last week, when "it was requested specifically by a member. That was when it was found and scanned into our system."

Whether the document was ignored or disappeared into cyberspace, however, it seemed to have made little impact on Capitol Hill at the time. No one in either chamber, on either side of the aisle, requested a briefing or any further information on its conclusions until now, the sources said.

The intelligence community has had its own problems with the attention the document is now receiving. Several active and retired intelligence officials stressed that the judgments were nothing new and followed a series of similar assessments made since early 2003 about the impact of the Iraq war on global terrorism.

"This is very much mainstream stuff," said Paul R. Pillar, the CIA's national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005. "There are no surprises."

Several active and retired intelligence officials, who were not authorized to speak on behalf of the intelligence community, expressed resentment at the administration's decision to have Negroponte issue the first official reaction to the weekend reports. They said he should not have become involved in what quickly became a political battle.

Decision To Declassify (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday released a summary of the National Intelligence Estimate on terror, and we're happy to take credit for the suggestion made in our editorial yesterday, "Declassify the Terrorism NIE." But of course it was hardly rocket science to come to this decision.

In its umpteenth such "leak" story Sunday, the New York Times acknowledged the NIE was the product of 16 intel agencies, and then, based wholly on conversations, shrunk the whole document down to: The Iraq war made terrorism worse. So Mr. Bush deserves some credit in now giving the whole country the opportunity, if it is so inclined, to look at one of these multi-bureaucracy, on-the-one-hand, on-the-other-hand NIEs.

The one policymaker who appears to have been swept away on the basis of the leak is House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. After Mr. Bush made his announcement, Ms. Pelosi called for the House to go into a "closed" session -- the first since 1983 -- to discuss the NIE. We'll set aside the manifest absurdity of the House going into "secret session" to discuss a classified document being made public. The point of Ms. Pelosi's stunt is to gain traction for the Democratic campaign strategy of telescoping the national-security debate down to her party's proposal to withdraw from Iraq, thereby neutralizing the GOP's advantage when the debate is on the broader war on terror.

We reprint nearby Mr. Bush's remarks on all this at his news conference yesterday because, amid all the flak thrown up by this subject, we think it is a succinct summary of the policy course he has chosen since 9/11. On balance, we have supported that policy, just as we have supported a more robust, pro-active policy against Islamic terror since its emergence more than three decades ago at the Munich Olympics.

We will hold an election in this country in six weeks and a bigger one in 2008. The war on terror -- with or without Iraq -- will be central to those votes. If declassifying this national intelligence estimate helps voters in that decision, so much the better.

The Fine Art Of Declassification (NYT)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

It's hard to think of a president and an administration more devoted to secrecy than President Bush and his team. Except, that is, when it suits Mr. Bush politically to give the public a glimpse of the secrets. And so, yesterday, he ordered the declassification of a fraction of a report by United States intelligence agencies on the global terrorist threat.

Mr. Bush said he wanted to release the document so voters would not be confused about terrorism or the war when they voted for Congressional candidates in November. But the three declassified pages from what is certainly a voluminous report told us what any American with a newspaper, television or Internet connection should already know. The invasion of Iraq was a cataclysmic disaster. The current situation will get worse if American forces leave. Unfortunately, neither the report nor the president provide even a glimmer of a suggestion about how to avoid that inevitable disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0069743

Despite what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, have tried to make everyone believe, one of the key findings of the National Intelligence Estimate, which represents the consensus of the 16 intelligence agencies, was indeed that the war in Iraq has greatly increased the threat from terrorism by "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives."

It said Iraq has become "the cause célèbre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement." It listed the war in Iraq as the second most important factor in the spread of terrorism — after "entrenched grievances such as corruption, injustice and fear of Western domination." And that was before April, when the report was completed. Since then, things have got much worse. (The report was written before the killing in June of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq. The authors thought such an event would diminish the danger in Iraq. It has not.)

Mr. Bush decided to release this small, selected chunk of the report in reaction to an article on the intelligence assessment that appeared in The Times over the weekend. As a defense of his policies, it serves only to highlight the maddening circular logic that passes for a White House rationale. It goes like this: The invasion of Iraq has created an entire new army of terrorists who will be emboldened by an American withdrawal. Therefore, the United States has to stay indefinitely and keep fighting those terrorists.

By that logic, the more the United States fights, the longer the war stretches on.

It's obvious why Mr. Bush did not want this report out, and why it is taking so long for the intelligence agencies to complete another report, solely on Iraq, that was requested by Congress in late July. It's not credible that more time is needed to do the job. In 2002, the intelligence agencies completed a report on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction in less time. Mr. Bush also made selected passages of that report public to buttress his arguments for war with Iraq, most of which proved to be based on fairy tales.

Then, Mr. Bush wanted Americans to focus on how dangerous Saddam Hussein was, and not on the obvious consequences of starting a war in the Middle East. Now, he wants voters to focus on how dangerous the world is, and not on his utter lack of ideas for what to do about it.

The Big Question Democrats Are Ducking (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

No matter how you slice it, the National Intelligence Estimate warning that the Iraq war has spawned more terrorism is big trouble for President Bush and his party in this election year. It goes to the heart of Bush's argument for invading Iraq, which was that it would make America safer.

Many Democrats act as if that's the end of the discussion: A mismanaged occupation has created a breeding ground for terrorists, so we should withdraw and let the Iraqis sort out the mess. Some extreme war critics are so angry at Bush they seem almost eager for America to lose, to prove a political point. Even among mainstream Democrats, the focus is "gotcha!" rather than "what next?" That is understandable, given the partisanship of Republican attacks, but it isn't right.

The issue raised by the National Intelligence Estimate is much grimmer than the domestic political game. Iraq has fostered a new generation of terrorists. The question is what to do about that threat. How can America prevent Iraq from becoming a safe haven where the newly hatched terrorists will plan Sept. 11-scale attacks that could kill thousands of Americans? How do we restabilize a Middle East that today is dangerously unbalanced because of America's blunders in Iraq?

This should be the Democrats' moment, if they can translate the national anger over Iraq into a coherent strategy for that country. But with a few notable exceptions, the Democrats are mostly ducking the hard question of what to do next. They act as if all those America-hating terrorists will evaporate back into the sands of Anbar province if the United States pulls out its troops. Alas, that is not the case. That is the problem with Iraq -- it is not an easy mistake to fix.

DOJ_NMG_0069744

An example of the Democrats' fudge on Iraq was highlighted yesterday by Post columnist Dana Milbank in his description of retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste's appearance before the Senate Democratic Policy Committee. Senators cheered Batiste's evisceration of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld but tuned out Batiste's call for more troops and more patience in Iraq, and his admonition: "We must mobilize our country for a protracted challenge."

Here's a reality check for the Democrats: There is not a single government in the Middle East, with the possible exceptions of Iran and Syria, that favors a rapid U.S. pullout from Iraq. Why? The consensus in the region is that a retreat now would have disastrous consequences for America and its allies. Yet withdrawal is the Iraq strategy you hear from most congressional Democrats, whether they call it "strategic redeployment" or something else.

I wish Democrats (and Republicans, for that matter) were asking this question: How do we prevent Iraq from becoming a failed state? Many critics of the war would argue that the worst has already happened -- Iraq has unraveled. Unfortunately, as bad as things are, they could get considerably worse. Following a rapid American pullout, Iraq could descend into a full-blown civil war, with Sunni-Shiite violence spreading throughout the region. In this chaos, oil supplies could be threatened, sending prices well above $100 a barrel. Turkey, Iran and Jordan would intervene to protect their interests. James Fallows titled his collection of prescient essays warning about the Iraq war "Blind Into Baghdad." We shouldn't compound the error by being "blind out of Baghdad," too.

The Democrat who has tried hardest to think through these problems is Sen. Joseph Biden. He argues that the current government of national unity isn't succeeding in holding Iraq together and that America should instead embrace a policy of "federalism plus" that will devolve power to the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. Iraqis are already voting for sectarian solutions, Biden argues, and America won't stabilize Iraq unless it aligns its policy with this reality. I disagree with some of the senator's conclusions, but he's asking the right question: How do we fix Iraq?

America needs to reckon with the message of the National Intelligence Estimate. Iraq has compounded Muslim rage and created a dangerous crisis for the United States. The Democrats understandably want to treat Iraq as George Bush's war and wash their hands of it. But the damage of Iraq can be mitigated only if it again becomes the nation's war -- with the whole country invested in finding a way out of the morass that doesn't leave us permanently in greater peril. If the Democrats could lead that kind of debate about security, they would become the nation's governing party. But what you hear from most Democrats these days is: Gotcha.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://www.washingtonpost.com. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

Justice Dept. Might Probe Leak (USAT)

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday that the Justice Department will determine whether to investigate the weekend leak of an intelligence assessment that found the war in Iraq is exacerbating terrorism.

“We have a standard procedure in place that is followed with respect to leaks of classified information,” Gonzales said when asked at a news conference whether a criminal investigation would be launched, as it was in the case of an earlier leak of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists by the National Security Agency.

“I suspect that standard procedure will be followed in this case,” he said. That procedure requires the agency that classified the document to request a criminal investigation and then to answer 11 questions about how widely the document was circulated and how much the agency is willing to divulge in court if a case is brought to trial. The answers usually determine whether an investigation is opened.

Bush Brings Afghanistan, Pakistan To The Table (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

President Bush met yesterday with Afghanistan President Harmid Karzai and last Friday with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Tonight, joined by Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, he will bring both men into the old family dining room of the White House for a private chat. "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Bush told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0069745

Bush said he was "kind of teasing" about watching the body language, but the intimate dinner has all the earmarks of a peace conference. Karzai and Musharraf have been sniping at each other from long-distance for months, and Rice was dispatched to Kabul and Islamabad last June to try to ease tensions.

The meeting comes as chaos is increasing in southern Afghanistan, as the Taliban grows bolder and the Afghan government's grip on power weakens. Meanwhile, Musharraf recently signed a deal with tribal chiefs that many experts believe turned over much of the area along Afghanistan's border to the control of Pakistani-based Taliban forces.

"Our interests coincide," Bush said yesterday, saying both Karzai and Musharraf want Osama bin Laden captured. "There is an understanding that by working together it is more likely that all of us can achieve common objectives, which are stable societies that are hopeful societies, that prevent extremists from stopping progress and denying people a hopeful world."

Administration officials noted that this is the second meeting Bush has brokered between the two men, and it was an effort to build a common strategy between two countries that have been at odds for decades. "When the three leaders sit down, they will not be talking about the short-term tactics," said an administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the meeting had not taken place. "They are talking about the long-term situation that helps those two countries put their relations on a sound footing."

Carlos Pascual, vice president at the Brookings Institution and former coordinator for Reconstruction and Stabilization at the State Department, said the dinner is necessary for setting the foundation for greater cooperation on their borders. He said both the Taliban and drug lords now move at will across the border, which is potentially destabilizing to both countries.

"This summit is an American effort to try to make Karzai and Musharraf recognize each other's problems," said Husain Haqqani, director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University and a former Pakistani government official and journalist. "I think what Bush hopes to achieve -- he wants to look Musharraf in the eye once again, and he wants to look Karzai in the eye -- and he wants them to make promises to one another."

But Haqqani said such personal diplomacy "can only succeed if it is followed by detailed and meticulous intelligence work and diligent diplomacy at a lower level," adding: "It's not like sitting down with two quarrelling kids and saying let's forget about it and move on. . . . Both sides have historic agendas, problems and issues."

All three presidents have faced difficulties and disappointments in their fight against the Taliban this year.

The United States has turned over the southern part of Afghanistan to NATO forces. But NATO forces have come under unexpected attack from Taliban forces, potentially delaying a reduction of U.S. troops.

Meanwhile, U.S. aid to Afghanistan has gotten crunched as it has become more difficult to fund through emergency appropriations. In the fiscal year ending this month, the administration requested $3.3 billion for Afghan reconstruction and the buildup of security forces (including a supplemental request), down from $4.35 billion in fiscal 2005. For 2007, the administration has requested $1.1 billion, though some experts feel the current crisis will require yet another emergency spending bill.

Karzai is straining to hold his country together but is losing popular support because of increasing violence, corruption, drug trafficking and an inability to demonstrate tangible progress since the fall of the Taliban. He has complained that he is being undercut by Islamabad's failure to rein in jihadists operating out of Pakistan, a charge Musharraf disputes.

"My fear is that Afghanistan is beginning to look like Iraq -- we're seeing the beginning Iraqification of Afghanistan," said Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a senior State Department official in Bush's first term.

Musharraf's peace deal with tribal chiefs comes as elections are scheduled for next year in Pakistan -- and after three assassination attempts against him. The fight against the Taliban has resulted in high casualties among the Pakistani military and is unpopular among Pakistanis.

There are signs that Musharraf -- who seized power in a bloodless coup nearly seven years ago -- is maneuvering to extend his presidential term. U.S. officials have been wary about pressing Musharraf too hard, seeking to balance demands for action against extremist groups with tangible U.S. rewards, such as sales of F-16 fighter jets.

Bush Reiterates U.S. Support For Karzai (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0069746

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 26, 2006

President Bush reassured Afghanistan's leader on Tuesday that the United States will stick by him five years into a democratic experiment that both men acknowledged has suffered setbacks.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai said the insurgent violence in his country can be tamed, and he called the staggering growth in Afghanistan's illegal drug production an embarrassment.

"You got a tough job," Bush told his guest at the start of a White House press conference.

"Sometimes it is," a slightly rueful Karzai agreed.

Karzai lives under constant threat of assassination and has seen his popularity slide at home while Taliban violence and illegal drug production spike. Suicide bombings, once unknown in Afghanistan, have spread to the capital Kabul.

Afghanistan is a tough job for the Bush administration as well, as American support for the war slips and some of the hard-fought democratic gains in Afghanistan appear threatened. The White House is trying to contain the damage ahead of midterm elections this fall.

Afghanistan is suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban was toppled in late 2001 for harboring al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

According to an Associated Press count, based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, at least 2,800 people have died so far this year in violence nationwide. The count, which includes militants and civilians, is about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

Bush lamented the killing "in cold blood" Monday of a teacher and women's rights advocate who ran an underground school for girls during Taliban rule. Safia Ama Jan's assassination underscored the increasingly brazen attacks by militants on government officials and schools in Afghanistan.

"Our country will stand with the free people of Afghanistan," Bush told Karzai, adding that he knows some in Afghanistan question American resolve to finish the job of securing and rebuilding the country.

"We have got that will," Bush said.

"Wonderful," Karzai replied.

Afghanistan stands as the best success story in the Bush administration's twin drives to rout terrorism and seed democracy in the Muslim world, with a constitutional democracy in place where the repressive Taliban militants had ruled until their ouster by a U.S.-led force.

Democrats and other critics claim that Bush took his eyes off the ball soon after, and that the war in Iraq bled resources from Afghanistan's reconstruction. Although the Bush administration vigorously denies the charge, Karzai's presence, and the joint visit on Wednesday of Karzai and Pakistani President General Pervez Musharraf, underscore the changed circumstances in Afghanistan.

The United States views both leaders and their region as crucial to stopping terrorism. U.S. officials have been irritated at recent feuding between Karzai and Musharraf over who is doing more to combat terrorism and whose country is bin Laden's likely hiding place.

"I'll be good," Karzai joked ahead of the three-way White House meeting.

Bush and Karzai said they had a frank discussion of the narcotics problem in Afghanistan, where opium cultivation rose 59 percent this year to produce a record 6,100 tons of opium — a massive 92 percent of total world supply. The Taliban had all but eradicated poppy cultivation.

The U.N.'s Office on Drugs and Crime said this month only six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces are opium-free. It said some 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit more than $3 billion.

"It is an embarrassment to Afghanistan," Karzai said.

Militants have stepped up attacks in southern Afghanistan in recent months, including the use of roadside and suicide bombs. Most of the fighting is in the country's volatile south, where some 8,000 NATO forces took military control from the U.S.-

DOJ_NMG_0069747

led coalition on Aug. 1. NATO commanders are calling for up to 2,500 more troops, plus greater air support to crush the Taliban threat more quickly.

The Taliban-led militants increasingly have been using Iraqi-style tactics, including suicide, car and roadside bombings, in a bid to topple the U.S.-backed Karzai government. That includes attacks on Afghan officials, like the governor of eastern Paktia province, a friend of Karzai's, who was killed in a Sept. 10 suicide bombing.

Suicide bombings have killed 173 people in Afghanistan this year, NATO announced this month.

"Now we are at a stage of bringing more stability and trying to get rid of them forever," Karzai said of the militants.

"The desire is to do that sooner, but a desire is not always what you get," he added. "So it will take time, and we must have the patience to have the time spent on getting rid of them for good."

Karzai Questions Pakistan Peace Deal (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

On the eve of a White House effort to address rising Taliban violence in Afghanistan, Hamid Karzai, Afghanistan's president, expressed scepticism about a key agreement to stop potential insurgents from crossing the Pakistani border, saying he would "wait and see" how it would be implemented.

Referring to a recent peace agreement struck by President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan related to the North Waziristan region, which borders Afghanistan, Mr Karzai said: "My initial impression was that this was a deal signed by the Taliban – and then later I learned that they actually signed with the tribal chiefs. It will have a different meaning if it is signed with the tribal chiefs."

On Wednesday President George W. Bush will host a White House dinner for Mr Karzai and Gen Musharraf. "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language between these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Mr Bush said.

In the past few days Gen Musharraf and Mr Karzai have added to tensions. Gen Musharraf has suggested the root cause of Afghanistan's problems is its own history. On Monday Mr Karzai, blamed outsiders: "We must remove the need for groups, organisations or state entities – and here I am beginning to be very careful in my remarks – of reliance on religious radicalism as instruments of policy."

US Democrats have been seeking to refocus attention on Afghanistan as the central front of the "war on terror". At the weekend, Bill Clinton said that if he were still president, "we'd have more than 20,000 troops there".

Robert Templer, director of the Asia programme at the International Crisis Group, was pessimistic about the prospects for a breakthrough in relations at the dinner: "Musharraf and Karzai absolutely hate each other. Musharraf sees him as a jumped-up nobody who was plucked from obscurity, while he regards himself as an extraordinary historic figure, the indispensable man who saves Pakistan."

Bush Guests Are Both Allies — Of The U.S., At Least (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush tests his mediation skills today when he brings together a pair of feuding neighbors who are both essential to the U.S. war on terrorism: Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan.

The White House dinner is an attempt at trilateral negotiations for Bush, who wants the two leaders to work on clearing out Taliban insurgents who camp in Pakistan and launch attacks in Afghanistan. He also wants to focus on areas where national interests coincide, including the capture of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

"It will be a chance for us to work on how to secure the border," Bush said Tuesday after a meeting with Karzai.

The Taliban militia gained control of nearly all of Afghanistan in 1996 after a civil war that followed the withdrawal of Soviet forces. The Taliban ruled the country with Pakistan's backing until the regime was toppled by a U.S.-led coalition in 2001, after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Relations between Karzai, the Afghan president since shortly after the fall of the Taliban, and Musharraf, his Pakistani counterpart, have been testy at best.

DOJ_NMG_0069748

Karzai has accused Musharraf and Pakistan of allowing safe havens for Taliban insurgents across the border from Afghanistan. Musharraf has said Karzai needs to look within his own country to quell the rising Taliban insurgency.

That insurgent violence threatens to undermine the post-9/11 victory over the Taliban, analysts say. "Afghanistan is on the brink of becoming a failed state once again," said Beth DeGrasse, senior program officer with the U.S. Institute of Peace, a non-partisan think tank funded by Congress. "It's ours to lose again."

DeGrasse said the Bush administration deserves a share of the blame for growing problems in Afghanistan, along with NATO, which leads the international stabilization force there, and other coalition members such as Britain, Germany and Italy.

"No one's in charge," she said. "It's an uncoordinated mess."

James Dobbins, a U.S. envoy to Afghanistan from 2001 to 2002, said the United States should do more to help Afghanistan pressure Pakistan to crack down on Taliban operations in Pakistani territory.

"It's better that we be the bad cop, and Karzai be the good cop," Dobbins said, "because the Karzai government is weaker."

Dobbins also said the United States and its allies "failed to take advantage of a period of relative tranquility" after their victory in 2001. He said a resurgent Taliban is "taking advantage of a weak government and a very light international troop presence."

The U.S.-led coalition dislodged the ruling Taliban for harboring al-Qaeda, which carried out the 9/11 attacks.

About 20,000 U.S. troops remain in Afghanistan; the Pentagon has reported at least 335 American deaths since October 2001.

Bush met one-on-one with Karzai on Tuesday. They discussed a variety of challenges to the new democracy in Afghanistan, including production of opium and the illegal drug trade and the need to develop schools and hospitals.

Bush met with Musharraf on Friday, before the Pakistani leader told an audience at George Washington University that his government is in the process of "mainstreaming" religious schools in his country that breed extremism.

Karzai has protested these Islamic schools, called madrassas, in which he says young, poor children are "preached hatred and hatred alone."

"They are told, 'Go, kill yourself in Afghanistan, commit suicide and kill as many as you can of the international community or Afghans,' " Karzai said Monday.

In another shot at his neighbors, Musharraf charged in a speech Monday that more Afghans may be helping the Taliban with its attacks: "As soon as President Karzai understands his own country's environment, the easier it will be for him."

Given his guests' rhetoric, Bush said he is looking forward to the meeting. "It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," he said.

Get Musharraf And Karzai On Same Page (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

THE WAR ON TERROR BEGAN not as a fuzzy, open-ended concept but as a U.S. military offensive against two specific entities: Al Qaeda and the Taliban. Almost exactly five years ago, President Bush promised to drive them "from place to place until there is no refuge," and he warned that "any nation that continues to harbor or support" terrorist organizations "will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime."

Tonight, the president will host a dinner for the heads of the two nations, Afghanistan and Pakistan, that harbor the most fighters from Al Qaeda and the Taliban. Yet these are not hostile regimes; they are important U.S. allies. In fact, if there's any hostility, it's between their presidents, Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, who have spent the last few days blaming each other for the Taliban's resurgence. Both men have a case.

Karzai's government has been losing control of Afghanistan's southern and eastern provinces, where an estimated 4,000 Taliban loyalists are operating. Suicide bombings are up — including one Tuesday that killed 18 people — and NATO forces in the country have suffered more fatalities in 2006 (about 150, including more than 30 this month) than they did from 2001 to 2003. When Musharraf says that Karzai doesn't know what's going on in his own country and that the Taliban problem "lies in Afghanistan," he has a point.

He's also trying to change the subject. Musharraf raised hackles around the world this month by signing a truce with tribal extremists on the Afghan border, essentially withdrawing Pakistan's security presence there in exchange for a promise to cease cross-border raids and reduce the influence of the Taliban there. Karzai slammed the deal as creating "terrorist sanctuaries," while Musharraf defended it as a "holistic approach" to fighting terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0069749

Where does Bush stand on all this? Not with the most confidence-inspiring of testimonials. When Musharraf "looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be Al Qaeda," the president said, "I believe him, you know?"

Bush's famously personal approach to diplomacy hasn't always worked out — the last leader into whose eyes he gazed, Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, has not turned out to be a reliable ally of the U.S. or of democracy — and it will be tested tonight. Somewhere between Karzai's and Musharraf's competing versions of the truth, and within the borders of the lands they nominally control, lie the leaders of the Taliban and Al Qaeda — the original enemies in this war.

Maybe Bush can trade on his friendships with Karzai and Musharraf to come up with a coordinated plan to fight the Taliban and reduce its havens in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Otherwise, he will have to explain how those countries can continue to harbor terrorists yet not be considered hostile regimes.

Punch Lines For Pakistan's President (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The president of Pakistan has been in the United States lately to discuss matters of global importance and -- in his spare time -- to flog a memoir. Last night he appeared on Comedy Central's "Daily Show" with Jon Stewart, where he demonstrated both a sense of humor and a deep desire to sell "In the Line of Fire," which, incidentally, is now available on Amazon.com for the low, low price of $16.80, plus shipping and handling.

Following Pakistani custom, Stewart started off by offering Gen. Pervez Musharraf some tea. He also gave Musharraf the "American delicacy" known as a Twinkie.

"Is it good?" Stewart asked, then followed up with: "Where's Osama bin Laden?"

"I don't know," Musharraf replied, as the audience roared with laughter. " You know where he is? You lead on, we'll follow you."

Has it really come to this? In recent days, Musharraf has promoted his memoir, published Monday, on "Hannity & Colmes," "Today," "60 Minutes" and "Charlie Rose." He has engaged in long discussions of his country's foreign policy and endured the occasional moment of awkwardness in service to the greater good of book sales.

For example, on "Charlie Rose":

Rose: " 'In the Line of Fire" seems an appropriate title for your memoir, does it not?"

Musharraf: "I think so. That's why I selected it."

Last night was the first appearance of any sitting president on "The Daily Show," and the best lines, as usual, belonged to Stewart. He asked his guest ("Mr. President") about two attempts on his life, which took place on the same bridge.

"I'd come up with a new way to go to work," Stewart advised his guest.

As usual, much of Stewart's humor was rooted in criticism of the U.S. administration. If Musharraf felt such jokes put him in an awkward position with his ally President Bush -- with whom he met on Friday and is scheduled to meet again today -- he did not say so. Rather, he chuckled and played along. For example, Stewart asked Musharraf if Bush ran against bin Laden in a low-level election in Pakistan, who would win. Musharraf responded that both would "lose miserably."

Stewart asked Musharraf why he hadn't made much reference in his book to America's war in Iraq.

"Is that because you felt like it was such a smart move, and has gone so well that to mention it would be gloating?" Stewart asked.

Musharraf laughed and said of the war, "It has led certainly to more extremism and terrorism around the world."

"So we're safer?" Stewart pressed.

Musharraf laughed again. "No, we're not."

DOJ_NMG_0069750

Stewart also asked if Bush pays attention when Musharraf meets with him, or whether he might be, say, watching television or sleeping with his eyes open. The president of Pakistan said the president of the United States paid close attention during their last meeting.

Book tours can benefit greatly from juicy details released in advance of publication, and this has proved no less true for Musharraf's book. Last week, it came to light that Musharraf claimed that former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage threatened to bomb his country "back to the Stone Age" if Pakistan did not cooperate in the war on terror. (Armitage has since denied making such a threat.)

Asked about the "Stone Age" quote at a news conference with Bush on Friday, the Pakistani president said he could not discuss his book before it came out, citing an agreement with his publisher.

"In other words, buy the book is what he's saying," Bush said.

Is there any publicity better than that? Of course -- Oprah.

Taliban Bombs Afghan Official's Compound (AP)

By Abdul Khaleq

AP, September 26, 2006

A Taliban suicide bomber killed 18 people outside a provincial governor's compound Tuesday, including several Muslim pilgrims set to travel to Mecca — another in a series of attacks directed at senior figures in President Hamid Karzai's U.S.-backed government.

The blast at the doorstep of Helmand Gov. Mohammed Daoud Safi's compound came on the same day a bombing against a NATO patrol in the Kabul area killed an Italian soldier and a child, and two weeks after militants assassinated a governor in eastern Afghanistan who had been a Karzai confidant.

Safi was inside the compound in Lashkar Gah but was not injured. Karzai was in Washington on Tuesday, meeting with President Bush.

Afghan soldiers stopped the bomber at the compound's security gate, where he detonated his explosives, said the governor's spokesman, Ghulam Muhiddin. The attacker had been walking toward a vehicle of the private military contractors who provide security for Safi, said Squadron Leader Jason Chalk, a NATO spokesman.

Nine Afghan soldiers and nine civilians were killed, said Rahmatullah Mohammdi, director of the hospital in Lashkar Gah. Seventeen people were wounded, he said.

Among the civilians waiting outside the compound were pilgrims seeking permission to travel to Mecca in Saudi Arabia, Muhiddin said. The main mosque in Lashkar Gah is across from the compound.

Qari Yousaf Ahmadi, who claims to be a spokesman for Taliban affairs in southern Afghanistan, contacted The Associated Press and said the militant group was responsible for the attack. Ahmadi's exact ties to the militants are not known.

Militants have stepped up attacks in southern Afghanistan in recent months, including the use of roadside and suicide bombs. Twenty-one people were killed in Lashkar Gah in August by a suicide bomber, and last week militants killed 19 construction workers riding on a bus in neighboring Kandahar province.

Although Muhiddin said he believed "innocent civilians and Afghan soldiers" were the targets Tuesday, the blast appeared to be another broadside fired toward a senior government figure.

Violent extremists have also been increasingly targeting Afghan officials, including the governor of eastern Paktia province — a friend of Karzai's — who was killed in a Sept. 10 suicide bombing. A women's rights activist, who was the Kandahar provincial director for Afghanistan's Ministry of Women's Affairs, was killed Monday in a drive-by shooting.

Karzai sent Safi, a former member of Afghanistan's National Security Council and like the president an ethnic Pashtun, to Helmand province last year to take over a region in the heart of the booming drug trade and the Taliban resurgence. Helmand's former governor, Sher Mohammed Akhunzada, has been accused of having links to drug gangs; he is now a lawmaker.

Two people were detained for questioning after Tuesday's attack on the NATO patrol five miles south of Kabul.

A remote-control bomb planted under a bridge detonated when a three-vehicle military convoy passed by, said Ali Shah Paktiawal, the city's police criminal director.

DOJ_NMG_0069751

Chief Corp. Maj. Giorgio Langella was killed in the blast, and five Italian soldiers were wounded, two seriously, the Italian Defense Ministry said in Rome. A child riding in a car behind the NATO convoy was killed, NATO said. Four other civilians in the car were wounded.

Italy has some 1,600 troops in the 20,000-strong NATO-led force in Afghanistan.

An Italian soldier died and two were injured on Sept. 20 when their armored vehicle overturned on a steep incline near Kabul. Four Italian soldiers were wounded Sept. 8 by a roadside bomb in the western Farah province.

Although Taliban-linked militants have stepped up their attacks across Afghanistan the last several months, attacks in Kabul are still far rarer than in the country's south — the focus of the most intense fighting since the ouster of the Taliban regime in a U.S.-led military campaign five years ago.

Attacks in the capital are mostly aimed at foreign military troops. On Sept. 8, a suicide car bomber rammed into a U.S. Humvee, killing 16 people, including two U.S. soldiers. That attack was Kabul's deadliest since the 2001 toppling of the Taliban.

In other violence, seven armed men died in Paktika province Monday when an explosives vest one of them was carrying detonated in the Yousef Kheil district, said Gov. Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak. There were no other casualties.

A suicide bomber on foot killed himself Tuesday while trying to attack a vehicle carrying security workers traveling to the border in Khost province, in eastern Afghanistan, said Gen. Mohammad Ayub, the provincial police chief. No one else was wounded in the blast, he said.

Attacks In Afghanistan Grow More Frequent And Lethal (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, Sept. 26 — Afghanistan suffered two deadly bombings on Tuesday that killed 20 people, providing another sign of the increasing size and power of suicide attacks and roadside bombs by insurgents.

The more devastating attack occurred when the police stopped a suicide bomber as he approached a security checkpoint near the governor's office in Lashkar Gah, in southern Helmand Province, and he detonated explosives strapped to his chest.

The bomber killed 18 people, 6 of them policemen and soldiers. The rest of the casualties, including a woman, were civilians who had gathered at a central mosque to sign up for the Hajj pilgrimage to Mecca, said the police chief of Helmand, Gen. Muhammad Nabi Mullahkhel.

South of Kabul, the capital, a bomb planted under a bridge struck a NATO military vehicle, killing an Italian soldier and an Afghan child nearby.

The suicide attack in Lashkar Gah was the second there in a month, and one of more than 60 in Afghanistan this year, United Nations officials said. The tactic was rarely used by insurgents a year ago.

Civilians increasingly have been paying the price of the more frequent and devastating attacks. More than 150 civilians have been killed by suicide bombings this year, the head of the United Nations mission in Afghanistan, Tom Koenigs, said recently, before the attacks on Tuesday.

The bombings, once relatively ineffective, now increasingly claim casualties in the double digits. On Aug. 3, a suicide bomber struck in the district bazaar of Panjwai, near Kandahar, killing 21. A suicide attack killed another 21 people in Lashkar Gah on Aug. 28.

On Sept. 18, a bomber in Kabul rammed his car into an American military convoy, causing a huge explosion that ripped apart an armored Humvee and killed 16 people, 2 of them American soldiers and the rest passers-by.

The use of roadside bombs has also increased. Two powerful bombs were laid on roads close to Kabul in recent weeks.

The bomb bomb near the capital, positioned under a bridge less than 10 miles south of Kabul, also wounded five soldiers and five civilians, according to officials. The hurt civilians were driving in a car behind the convoy.

Military and intelligence officials in Afghanistan are divided about whether the tactics and technology used in suicide bombings and roadside bombs have been brought from Iraq, where they are so common, or if insurgents here are simply copying those tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0069752

Canadian and American soldiers on operations in the southern province of Kandahar last week said they saw a clear connection with tactics in Iraq. One called it the "Iraqization" of the insurgency here, whether through personal contacts or the Internet.

Canadian soldiers, for instance, said they recently found a scarecrow by a roadside rigged with explosives. In Iraq, insurgents have rigged corpses beside roads with explosives.

Suicide bombers are also now using explosive vests, which are far more powerful than before, the soldiers said. In another bombing on Sept. 18, a man on a bicycle who rode up to Canadian soldiers handing out gifts to children in the southern village of Char Kota, in Pashmul, had on a vest rigged with explosives. The detonation killed four soldiers and injured several more who were in full body armor, as well as wounding two dozen children.

There are signs of more careful training as well. The bomber who killed the governor of Paktia Province on Sept. 10 managed to penetrate security by claiming to have a letter of recommendation addressed to the governor.

He then threw himself onto the hood of the governor's car, detonating his explosive vest up against the windshield and killing everyone inside the car, according to government and military officials.

The high level of civilian casualties has appeared to cause a split in the Taliban, with some apparently opposed to suicide bombing, NATO military officials said.

Taliban fighters who occupied the Panjwai district in July and August tried to distance themselves from the suicide bombing that killed so many civilians and damaged shops in August. They posted leaflets saying that outsiders, or "foreign Taliban," were responsible for the suicide bombing and that such violators would receive capital punishment.

"They were worried about their image," said Olli-Pekka Nissinen, a NATO media operations officer.

Villagers and farmers in the Panjwai area, where heavy fighting has taken place over the past three weeks, also blamed foreigners or outsiders for the suicide bombing, and said that ordinary Taliban were just intent on fighting NATO forces.

A witness of the Sept. 18 suicide bombing in nearby Pashmul, Khair Muhammad, whose two daughters were wounded in the blast, said the bomber appeared to be an Arab.

Talabani: Iraq Won't Have Civil War (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 26, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani disputed on Tuesday reports of growing violence in his country and declared, "I can assure you there will be no civil war."

At a news conference, Talabani also leveled a warning to Iraq's neighbors that interference will not be tolerated.

"Iraq is not so weak our neighbors can do anything and we will remain silent," Talabani said after delivering an upbeat speech at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

In Baghdad, the Iraqi capital, gunmen assaulted two Sunni mosques and sprayed bullets into the homes of Sunni Muslims. Three people were killed and 15 wounded.

Police in the capital also found the bodies of 23 men apparently slain by sectarian death squads.

Talabani projected a vastly different account of the security situation. He said it had improved since last year when many areas were in the control of terrorists.

Last year, he said by way of example, there were 10 to 14 car bombings a day in Baghdad and this year one to four.

Most of the fighting is centered in Baghdad, and since most media are in the capital they provide a slanted picture of Iraq's situation, Talabani said.

"The media is only focusing on the negative and exaggerating it," he said.

Talabani declined, meanwhile, to specify which neighboring countries were the intended target of his warning against interference. "We are asking all our neighbors not to interfere in our internal affairs," he said.

"We cannot tolerate more interference of our neighbors," he said at another point, with evident anger.

DOJ_NMG_0069753

